

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

B 1,015,511

{

THE
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

AUTHORISED EDITION.

FOURTH SERIES:

BEGINNING WITH THE SEVENTH SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE
UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

---

55 VICTORIAE, 1892.

---

VOLUME I.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM
THE NINTH DAY OF FEBRUARY, 1892,
TO
THE THIRD DAY OF MARCH, 1892.

---

First Volume of the Session.

---

COMPANY LIMITED,

NOTE TO THE READER

The paper in this volume is brittle or the inner margins are extremely narrow.

We have bound or rebound the volume utilizing the best means possible.

PLEASE HANDLE WITH CARE

EDITION.

[s.]

GENERAL BOOKBINDING CO., CHESTERLAND, OH

---

THE
PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES
AUTHORISED EDITION.

FOURTH SERIES :
COMMENCING WITH THE SEVENTH SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE
UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

---

55 VICTORIAE, 1892.

---

VOLUME I.
COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM
THE NINTH DAY OF FEBRUARY, 1892,
TO
THE THIRD DAY OF MARCH, 1892.

---

First Volume of the Session.

---

REUTER'S TELEGRAM COMPANY, LIMITED,
24 and 25, Old Jewry, London, E.C., PRINTERS, PUBLISHERS, AND PROPRIETORS OF
"THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES AUTHORISED EDITION."
UNDER CONTRACT WITH H.M. GOVERNMENT.

---

1892.

[FOLLOWING VOLUME CCCLVI. OF THE THIRD SERIES.]

301
, 421

ERRATA.

- 12 Feb. Page 351, line 5, should read "Half a year is not nothing."
- 23 Feb. Page 1100, line 20, should read "Mr. T. E. Ellis."
- 25 Feb. Page 1330, line 4, should read "No, it is not the same Bill."
- 29 Feb. Page 1495, line 22, should read "Lancashire, Southport."

THE MINISTRY
OF THE MOST NOBLE THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, K.G.,
AT THE OPENING OF THE SESSION ON THE 9TH FEBRUARY, 1892.

THE CABINET.

Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs . . . . .	Most Hon. Marquess of SALISBURY, K.G..
First Lord of the Treasury . . . . .	Right Hon. ARTHUR JAMES BALFOUR.
Lord Chancellor of England . . . . .	Right Hon. Lord HALSBURY.
Lord Chancellor of Ireland . . . . .	Right Hon. Lord ASHBOURNE.
Lord President of the Council . . . . .	Right Hon. Viscount CRANBROOK, G.C.S.I.
Lord Privy Seal . . . . .	Right Hon. Earl CADOGAN.
Secretary of State, Home Department . . . . .	Right Hon. HENRY MATTHEWS.
Secretary of State for the Colonies . . . . .	Right Hon. Lord KNUTSFORD, G.C.M.G.
Secretary of State for War . . . . .	Right Hon. EDWARD STANHOPE.
Secretary of State for India . . . . .	Right Hon. Viscount CROSS, G.C.B.
Chancellor of the Exchequer . . . . .	Right Hon. GEORGE JOACHIM GOSCHEN.
First Lord of the Admiralty . . . . .	Right Hon. Lord GEORGE FRANCIS HAMILTON.
President of the Board of Trade . . . . .	Right Hon. Sir M. E. HICKS BEACH, Bart.
Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster . . . . .	His Grace the Duke of RUTLAND, G.C.B.
Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant . . . . .	Right Hon. WILLIAM LAWIES JACKSON.
President of the Local Government Board . . . . .	Right Hon. CHARLES THOMSON RITCHIE.
President of the Board of Agriculture . . . . .	Right Hon. HENRY CHAPLIN.

NOT IN THE CABINET.

Field Marshal Commanding in Chief . . . . .	H.R.H. the Duke of CAMBRIDGE, K.G.
Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education . . . . .	Right Hon. Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE, Bart.
Secretary for Scotland and Vice President of the Scotch Education Department . . . . .	Most Hon. Marquess of LOTHIAN, K.T.
First Commissioner of Works and Public Buildings . . . . .	Right Hon. DAVID ROBERT PLUNKET.
Lords of the Treasury . . . . .	Hon. SIDNEY HERBERT. Colonel Sir WILLIAM HOOD WALROND, Bart. Sir HERBERT EUSTACE MAXWELL, Bart.
Lords of the Admiralty . . . . .	Admiral Sir R. V. HAMILTON, K.C.B., Vice Admiral Sir A. H. HOSKINS, K.C.B., Vice Admiral H. FAIRFAX, C.B., Rear Admiral JOHN A. FISHER, C.B., Rear Admiral F. G. D. BEDFORD, C.B., ELLIS ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, Esq.
Joint Secretaries to the Treasury . . . . .	Right Hon. ARETAS AKERS-DOUGLAS. Right Hon. Sir JOHN ELDON GORST, Q.C.
Secretary to the Admiralty . . . . .	Right Hon. ARTHUR BOWER FORWOOD.
Secretary to the Board of Trade . . . . .	Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH.
Secretary to the Local Government Board . . . . .	WALTER H. LONG, Esq.
Under Secretary, Home Department . . . . .	CHARLES BEILBY STUART WORTLEY, Esq.
Under Secretary, Foreign Department . . . . .	JAMES WILLIAM LOWTHER, Esq.
Under Secretary for Colonies . . . . .	Right Hon. Baron HENRY DE WORMS.
Under Secretary for War . . . . .	Right Hon. Earl BROWNLOW.
Under Secretary for India . . . . .	Hon. GEORGE N. CURZON.
Paymaster General . . . . .	Right Hon. Lord WINDSOR.
Postmaster General . . . . .	Right Hon. Sir JAMES FERGUSON, Bart., G.C.S.I.
Financial Secretary to the War Department . . . . .	Hon. W. St. JOHN BRODRICK.
Judge Advocate General . . . . .	Right Hon. Sir WILLIAM THACKERAY MARRIOTT.
Attorney General . . . . .	Sir RICHARD EVERARD WEBSTER, Q.C.
Solicitor General . . . . .	Sir EDWARD GEORGE CLARKE, Q.C.

SCOTLAND.

Lord Advocate . . . . .	Right Hon. Sir C. J. PEARSON.
Solicitor General . . . . .	ANDREW GRAHAM MURRAY, Esq.

IRELAND.

Lord Lieutenant . . . . .	Right Hon. Earl of ZETLAND.
Lord Chancellor . . . . .	Right Hon. Lord ASHBOURNE.
Attorney General . . . . .	Right Hon. DODGSON HAMILTON MADDEN.
Solicitor General . . . . .	J. ATKINSON, Esq.

QUEEN'S HOUSEHOLD.

Lord Steward . . . . .	Right Hon. Earl of MOUNT-EDGCUMBE.
Lord Chamberlain . . . . .	Right Hon. Earl of LATHOM.
Master of the Horse . . . . .	His Grace the Duke of PORTLAND.
Treasurer of the Household . . . . .	Right Hon. Lord WALTER GORDON-LENNOX.
Comptroller of the Household . . . . .	Right Hon. Lord ARTHUR HILL.
Vice Chamberlain of the Household . . . . .	Right Hon. Lord BURGHLEY.
Captain of the Corps of Gentlemen at Arms . . . . .	Right Hon. Earl of YARBOROUGH.
Captain of the Yeomen of the Guard . . . . .	Right Hon. Earl of LIMERICK.
Master of the Buckhounds . . . . .	Right Hon. Earl of COVENTRY.
Chief Equerry and Clerk Marshal . . . . .	Colonel Sir G. A. MAUDE, V.C., K.C.B.
Mistress of the Robes . . . . .	Her Grace the Duchess of BUCCLEUCH.

ROLL OF THE LORDS SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL
IN THE SEVENTH SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF
THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

---

55° VICTORIÆ, 1892.

---

MEM.—According to the Usage of Parliament, when the House appoints a Select Committee, the Lords appointed to serve upon it are named in the Order of their Rank, beginning with the Highest; and so, when the House sends a Committee to a Conference with the Commons the Lord highest in Rank is called first, and the rest go forth in like Order: But when the Whole House is called over for any Purpose within the House, or for the Purpose of proceeding forth to Westminster Hall, or upon any public Solemnity, the Call begins invariably with the Junior Baron.

- |                                                                                    |                                                                                                   |
|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| His Royal Highness The Prince of Wales.                                            | Edward White Archbishop of Canterbury.                                                            |
| His Royal Highness Alfred Ernest Albert Duke of Edinburgh.                         | Hardinge Stanley Lord Halsbury, Lord High Chancellor.                                             |
| His Royal Highness Arthur William Patrick Albert Duke of Connaught and Strathearn. | William Dalrymple Archbishop of York. Gathorne Viscount Cranbrook, Lord President of the Council. |
| His Royal Highness Leopold Charles Edward George Albert Duke of Albany.            | George Henry Earl Cadogan, Lord Privy Seal.                                                       |
| His Royal Highness George William Frederick Charles Duke of Cambridge.             | Henry Duke of Norfolk, Earl Marshal of England.                                                   |
|                                                                                    | Algernon Percy Banks Duke of Somerset.                                                            |

ROLL OF THE LORDS

- Charles Henry Duke of Richmond.
Augustus Charles Lennox Duke of Grafton.
Henry Charles Fitzroy Duke of Beaufort.
William Amelius Aubrey de Vere Duke of Saint Albans.
George Godolphin Duke of Leeds.
George William Francis Sackville Duke of Bedford.
Spencer Compton Duke of Devonshire.
George Charles Duke of Marlborough.
John James Robert Duke of Rutland.
William Alexander Louis Stephen Duke of Brandon. (Duke of Hamilton.)
William John Arthur Charles James Duke of Portland.
George Victor Drogo Duke of Manchester.
Henry Pelham Archibald Douglas Duke of Newcastle.
Algernon George Duke of Northumberland.
His Royal Highness Ernest Augustus William Adolphus George Frederick Duke of Cumberland and Teviotdale.
Henry Duke of Wellington.
George Granville William Duke of Sutherland.
Hugh Lupus Duke of Westminster.
Alexander William George Duke of Fife.

Augustus John Henry Beaumont Marquess of Winchester.
Henry Charles Keith Marquess of Lansdowne.
John Villiers Stuart Marquess Townshend.
Robert Arthur Talbot Marquess of Salisbury.
John Alexander Marquess of Bath.
James Marquess of Abercorn. (Duke of Abercorn.)
Hugh de Grey Marquess of Hertford.
John Patrick Marquess of Bute.
William Alleyne Marquess of Exeter.
William Marquess of Northampton.
John Charles Marquess Camden.
Henry Marquess of Anglesey.

George Henry Hugh Marquess of Cholmondeley.
George William Thomas Marquess of Ailesbury.
Frederick William John Marquess of Bristol.
Archibald Marquess of Ailsa.
Constantine Charles Henry Marquess of Normanby.
George Frederick Samuel Marquess of Ripon.
William Marquess of Abergavenny.
Gavin Marquess of Breadalbane.
Frederick Temple Marquess of Dufferin and Ava.

William Henry Earl of Mount Edgcumbe, Lord Steward of the Household.
Edward Earl of Lathom, Lord Chamberlain of the Household.
Charles Henry John Earl of Shrewsbury.
Edward Henry Earl of Derby.
Warner Francis John Plantagenet Earl of Huntingdon.
George Robert Charles Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery.
Henry Hugh Earl of Devon.
Henry Charles Earl of Suffolk and Berkshire.
Rudolph William Basil Earl of Denbigh.
Anthony Mildmay Julian Earl of Westmorland.
Montague Earl of Lindsey.
—— Earl of Stamford.
Murray Edward Gordon Earl of Winchelsea and Nottingham.
Edwyn Francis Earl of Chesterfield.
Edward George Henry Earl of Sandwich.
Arthur Algernon Earl of Essex.
George James Earl of Carlisle.
William Henry Walter Earl of Doncaster. (Duke of Buccleuch and Queensberry.) Anthony Earl of Shaftesbury.
Randal Mowbray Thomas Earl of Berkeley.
Montagu Arthur Earl of Abingdon.

SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL.

Aldred Frederick George Beresford Earl of Scarbrough.	John Poyntz Earl Spencer.
William Coutts Earl of Albemarle.	Allen Alexander Earl Bathurst.
George William Earl of Coventry.	Arthur Wills John Wellington Blundell
Victor Albert George Earl of Jersey.	Trumbull Earl of Hillsborough. (Marquess of Downshire.)
William Henry Earl Poulett.	Edward Hyde Earl of Clarendon.
John Francis Erskine Earl of Mar. (Elected for Scotland.)	William David Earl of Mansfield.
Sholto George Watson Earl of Morton. (Elected for Scotland.)	John James Hugh Henry Earl Strange. (Duke of Athole.)
Claude Earl of Strathmore and Kinghorn. (Elected for Scotland.)	William Henry Earl of Mount Edgcumbe. (In another Place as Lord Steward of the Household.)
George Earl of Haddington. (Elected for Scotland.)	Hugh Earl Fortescue.
Frederick Henry Earl of Lauderdale. (Elected for Scotland.)	George Edward Stanhope Molyneux Earl of Carnarvon.
John Trotter Earl of Lindsay. (Elected for Scotland.)	George Henry Earl Cadogan. (In another Place as Lord Privy Seal.)
David Stanley William Earl of Airlie. (Elected for Scotland.)	Edward James Earl of Malmesbury.
Ronald Ruthven Earl of Leven and Melville. (Elected for Scotland.)	John Vansittart Danvers Earl of Lanesborough. (Elected for Ireland.)
Douglas Mackinnon Baillie Hamilton Earl of Dundonald. (Elected for Scotland.)	Henry Ernest Newcomen Earl of Kingston. (Elected for Ireland.)
Sewallis Edward Earl Ferrers.	Dermot Robert Wyndham Earl of Mayo. (Elected for Ireland.)
William Heneage Earl of Dartmouth.	Hugh Earl Annesley. (Elected for Ireland.)
Charles Earl of Tankerville.	George Earl of Lucan. (Elected for Ireland.)
Charles Wightwick Earl of Aylesford.	Somerset Richard Earl of Belmore. (Elected for Ireland.)
Francis Thomas De Grey Earl Cowper.	James Francis Earl of Bandon. (Elected for Ireland.)
Arthur Philip Earl Stanhope.	James Earl of Caledon. (Elected for Ireland.)
Thomas Augustus Wolstenholme Earl of Macclesfield.	James Francis Harry Earl of Rosslyn.
Douglas Beresford Malise Ronald Earl Graham. (Duke of Montrose.)	William George Robert Earl of Craven.
William Frederick Earl Waldegrave.	William Hillier Earl of Onslow.
Bertram Earl of Ashburnham.	Charles Earl of Romney.
Charles Augustus Earl of Harrington.	Walter John Earl of Chichester.
Newton Earl of Portsmouth.	Seymour John Grey Earl of Wilton.
George Guy Earl Brooke and Earl of Warwick.	George Charles Earl of Powis.
Sidney Carr Earl of Buckinghamshire.	Horatio Earl Nelson.
William Thomas Spencer Earl Fitzwilliam.	Lawrence Earl of Rosse. (Elected for Ireland.)
Frederick George Earl of Guilford.	Sydney William Herbert Earl Manvers.
Charles Philip Earl of Hardwicke.	Horatio Earl of Orford.
Henry Edward Earl of Ilchester.	Henry Earl Grey.
Reginald Windsor Earl De La Warr.	Hugh Cecil Earl of Lonsdale.
William Earl of Radnor.	Dudley Francis Stuart Earl of Harrowby.

ROLL OF THE LORDS

Henry Thynne Earl of Harewood.	John Francis Stanley Earl Russell.
Gilbert John Earl of Minto.	Francis Earl of Cromartie.
Alan Frederick Earl Cathcart.	John Earl of Kimberley.
James Walter Earl of Verulam.	Richard Earl of Dartrey.
Adelbert Wellington Brownlow Earl Brownlow.	William Ernest Earl of Feversham.
Henry Cornwallis Earl of St. Germans.	Henry George Earl of Ravensworth.
Albert Edmund Earl of Morley.	Edward Montagu Stuart Granville Earl of Wharncliffe.
Orlando George Charles Earl of Bradford.	Thomas George Earl of Northbrook.
William Earl Beauchamp.	Herbert John Earl Cairns.
John Earl of Eldon.	Victor Alexander George Robert Earl of Lytton.
Richard William Penn Earl Howe.	Edward Earl of Lathom. ( In another Place as Lord Chamberlain of the Household. )
George Edward John Mowbray Earl of Stradbroke.	George Watson Earl Sondes.
William Stephen Earl Temple of Stowe.	Roundell Earl of Selborne.
Francis Charles Earl of Kilmorey. (Elected for Ireland.)	Walter Stafford Earl of Iddesleigh.
Charles Stewart Earl Vane. ( Marquess of Londonderry. )	Cornwallis Earl de Montalt.
William Archer Earl Amherst.	William Henry Forester Earl of Lonsdale.
John Frederick Vaughan Earl Cawdor.	Robert Viscount Hereford.
William George Earl of Munster.	James David Viscount Strathallan. (Elected for Scotland.)
Robert Adam Philips Haldane Earl of Camperdown.	Henry Viscount Bolingbroke and St. John.
Thomas Francis Earl of Lichfield.	Evelyn Edward Thomas Viscount Falmouth.
John George Earl of Durham.	George Master Viscount Torrington.
Granville George Earl Granville.	Gerald Viscount Leinster. ( Duke of Leinster. )
Henry Earl of Effingham.	Francis Wheler Viscount Hood.
Henry John Earl of Duncie.	Mervyn Edward Viscount Powerscourt. (Elected for Ireland.)
Charles Alfred Worsley Earl of Yarborough.	Henry William Crosbie Viscount Bangor. (Elected for Ireland.)
James Henry Robert Earl Innes. ( Duke of Roxburghe. )	Cornwallis Viscount Hawarden. ( Elected for Ireland. ) ( In another Place as Earl de Montalt. )
Thomas William Earl of Leicester.	Carnegie Parker Viscount St. Vincent.
William Earl of Lovelace.	Henry Viscount Melville.
Lawrence Earl of Zetland.	William Wells Viscount Sidmouth.
Charles William Francis Earl of Gainsborough.	John Campbell Viscount Gordon. ( Earl of Aberdeen )
Francis Charles Granville Earl of Ellesmere.	Edward Fleetwood John Viscount Exmouth.
George Henry Charles Earl of Strafford.	John Luke George Viscount Hutchinson (Earl of Donoughmore.)
Kenelm Charles Edward Earl of Cottenham.
William Henry Earl Cowley.
Archibald William Earl of Winton. (Earl of Eglintoun.)
William Humble Earl of Dudley.

SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL.

William Frederick Viscount Clancarty. (Earl of Clancarty.)	Daniel Lewis Bishop of Bangor.
Robert Wellington Viscount Combermere.	Henry Thurstan Lord Knutsford, One of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State.
Henry Charles Viscount Canterbury.	Dudley Charles Lord de Ros.
Rowland Clegg Viscount Hill.	Alfred Joseph Lord Mowbray.
Charles Stewart Viscount Hardinge.	George Manners Lord Hastings.
George Stephens Viscount Gough.	Edward Southwell Lord de Clifford.
Charles Lindley Viscount Halifax.	Gilbert Henry Lord Willoughby de Eresby.
Alexander Nelson Viscount Bridport.	Charles Henry Rolle Lord Clinton.
William Henry Berkeley Viscount Portman.	Robert Nathaniel Cecil George Lord Zouche of Haryngworth.
Gathorne Viscount Cranbrook. ( In another Place as Lord President of the Council. )	Rawdon George Grey Lord Grey de Ruthyn.
Robert Viscount Sherbrooke.	Charles Edward Hastings Lord Botreaux. ( Earl of Loudoun. )
Henry Bouvier William Viscount Hampden.	Francis Robert Lord Camoys.
Garnet Joseph Viscount Wolseley.	————— Lord Beaumont.
William John Viscount Oxenbridge.	Henry Lord Willoughby de Broke.
Richard Assheton Viscount Cross.	Hubert George Charles Lord Vaux of Harrowden.
Frederick Bishop of London.	Ralph Gordon Lord Wentworth.
Brooke Foss Bishop of Durham.	Alfred Thomas Townshend Lord Braye.
Anthony Wilson Bishop of Winchester.	Robert George Lord Windsor.
John Thomas Bishop of Norwich.	William Henry John Lord North.
Charles John Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.	Beauchamp Mowbray Lord St. John of Bletso.
James Bishop of Hereford.	Frederick George Lord Howard de Walden.
Arthur Charles Bishop of Bath and Wells.	William Joseph Lord Petre.
Richard Bishop of Chichester.	John Fiennes Lord Saye and Sele.
William Basil Bishop of St. David's.	John Francis Lord Arundell of Wardour.
John Charles Bishop of Liverpool.	John Stuart Lord Clifton. ( Earl of Darnley. )
Ernest Roland Bishop of Newcastle.	John Baptist Joseph Lord Dormer.
Richard Bishop of Llandaff.	Henry George Lord Teynham.
William Bishop of Oxford.	Augustus Frederick Fitz-herbert Lord Stafford.
George Bishop of Southwell.	George Frederick William Lord Byron.
William Boyd Bishop of Ripon.	Lewis Henry Hugh Lord Clifford of Chudleigh.
Edward Bishop of Lincoln.	Horace Courtenay Gammell Lord Forbes. ( Elected for Scotland. )
Edward Henry Bishop of Exeter.	Alexander William Frederick Lord Saltoun. ( Elected for Scotland. )
John Bishop of Salisbury.	Charles William Lord Sinclair. ( Elected for Scotland. ) Alwyne Bishop of Ely.
James Bishop of Manchester.
William Walsham Bishop of Wakefield.
Francis John Bishop of Chester.
Alfred George Bishop of St. Asaph.

ROLL OF THE LORDS

Charles Lord Blantyre. ( Elected for Scotland. )	Charles George Lord Lyttelton.
Alexander Hugh Lord Balfour of Burley. ( Elected for Scotland. )	Henry George Lord Mendip. ( Viscount Clifden. )
Walter Hugh Lord Polwarth. ( Elected for Scotland. )	George Lord Stuart of Castle Stuart. ( Earl of Moray. )
Richard Edmund Saint Lawrence Lord Boyle. ( Earl of Cork and Orrery. )	Alan Plantagenet Lord Stewart of Gartlies. ( Earl of Galloway. )
George Lord Hay. ( Earl of Kinnoul. )	James George Henry Lord Saltersford. ( Earl of Courtown. )
Digby Wentworth Bayard Lord Middleton.	William Lord Brodrick. ( Viscount Middleton. )
Frederick George Brabazon Lord Ponsonby. ( Earl of Bessborough. )	Frederick Henry William Lord Calthorpe.
Alfred Nathaniel Holden Lord Scarsdale.	Peter Robert Lord Gwydir.
George Florance Lord Boston.	Charles Robert Lord Carrington.
Charles George Lord Lovell and Holland. ( Earl of Egmont. )	William Henry Lord Bolton.
George William Henry Lord Vernon.	Thomas Lyttleton Lord Lilford.
Edward Henry Trafalgar Lord Digby.	Thomas Lord Ribblesdale.
George Douglas Lord Sundridge. ( Duke of Argyll. )	Edward Donough Lord Inchiquin. ( Elected for Ireland. )
Martin Bladen Lord Hawke.	William Charles Lord Carbery. ( Elected for Ireland. )
Henry Thomas Lord Foley.	John Thomas William Lord Massy. ( Elected for Ireland. )
Arthur de Cardonnel Lord Dinevor.	Francis William Lord Kilmaine. ( Elected for Ireland. )
Thomas Lord Walsingham.	Robert Lord Clonbrock. ( Elected for Ireland. )
William Lord Bagot.	Charles Mark Lord Headley. ( Elected for Ireland. )
Charles Henry Lord Southampton.	Edward Henry Churchill Lord Crofton. ( Elected for Ireland. )
John Richard Brinsley Lord Grantley.	Hercules Edward Lord Langford. ( Elected for Ireland. )
George Bridges Harley Dennett Lord Rodney.	Dayrolles Blakeney Lord Ventry. ( Elected for Ireland. )
Henry George Lord Lovaine.	Henry O'Callaghan Lord Dunalley. ( Elected for Ireland. )
Philip Reginald Lord Somers.	Eyre Challoner Henry Lord Clarina. ( Elected for Ireland. )
Richard Henry Lord Berwick.	Henry Francis Seymour Lord Moore. ( Marquess of Drogheda. )
Edward Lennox Lord Sherborne.	John Henry Lord Loftus. ( Marquess of Ely. )
Job Henry De La Poer Lord Tyrone. ( Marquess of Waterford. )	William Lord Carysfort. ( Earl of Carysfort. )
Richard Henry Lord Carleton. ( Earl of Shannon. )	George Ralph Lord Abercromby.
Charles Lord Suffield.	Charles Towneley Hamilton Lord Ellenborough.
Dudley Wilmot Lord Dorchester.	Augustus Frederick Arthur Lord Sandys.
Lloyd Lord Kenyon.
Charles Cornwallis Lord Braybrooke.
George Augustus Hamilton Lord Fisherwick. ( Marquess of Donegall. )
Henry Charles Lord Gage. ( Viscount Gage. )
Thomas John Lord Thurlow.
William Morton Lord Auckland.

SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL.

North Lord Sheffield. ( Earl of field. )	John Byrne Leicester Lord De Tabley.
n Macnaghten Lord Erskine.	Charles Stuart Henry Lord Tenterden.
John Lord Monteagle. ( Mars- s of Sligo. )	William Conyngham Lord Plunket.
d Arthur William Patrick ttings Lord Granard. ( Earl of ward. )	William Frederick Lord Heytesbury.
rford Lord Crewe.	Archibald Philip Lord Rosebery. ( Earl of Rosebery. )
— Lord Gardner.	Richard James Lord Clanwilliam. ( Earl of Clanwilliam. )
Thomas Lord Manners.	William Draper Mortimer Lord Wyn- ford.
Adrian Louis Lord Hopetoun. (Earl of Hopetoun.)	Charles Gore Lord Kilmarnock. (Earl of Errol.) d Lord Castlemaine. ( Elected for Ireland. )	Arthur James Francis Lord Fingall. (Earl of Fingall.) s Lord Meldrum. ( Marquess of Fife. )	William Philip Lord Sefton. ( Earl of Sefton. )
Egerton Lord Grinstead. (Earl of Enniskillen.)	Robert Birmingham Lord Clements. (Earl of Leitrim.) n Hale John Charles Lord Fox- . ( Earl of Limerick. )	Thomas Lord Kenlis. ( Marquess of Headfort. )
Albert Francis Charles Lord rchild.	Reginald Lord Chaworth. ( Earl of Meath. )
Robert Canning Lord Harris.	Charles Adolphus Lord Dunmore. ( Earl of Dunmore.)
ld Charles Edward Lord Col- ter.	Augustus Frederick George Warwick Lord Poltimore.
berg Henry Lord Ker. ( Mar- s of Lothian. )	Llewelyn Nevill Vaughan Lord Mostyn.
Francis Lord Minster. ( Mar- s of Conyngham.)	Henry Spencer Lord Templemore.
Edward William Theobald Lord onde. ( Marquess of Ormonde. )	Valentine Frederick Lord Cloncurry.
s Richard Lord Wemyss. ( Earl Wemyss. )	John St. Vincent Lord De Saumarez.
Strange Lord Clanbrassill. ( Earl of Odon. )	Thomas Lord Denman.
s Lord Silchester. ( Earl of Long- don. )	James Yorke MacGregor Lord Abinger.
rthy John Eyre Lord Oriel. Count Massereene. )	Philip Lord De L'Isle and Dudley.
Lord Delamere.	Francis Denzil Edward Lord Ashburton.
o Watkin Weld Lord Forester.	Edward George Percy Lord Hatherton.
William Lord Rayleigh.	Archibald Brabazon Sparrow Lord Worlingham. ( Earl of Gosford. )
Frederic Lord Gifford.	William Frederick Lord Stratheden.
t George Lord Somerhill. ( Mar- s of Clanricarde. )	Geoffrey Dominick Augustus Frederick Lord Oranmore and Browne. ( Elected for Ireland. )
Ludovic Lord Wigan. ( Earl of Wigford and Balcarres. )	Simon Joseph Lord Lovat.
John Mark Lord Ranfurly. (Earl of Ranfurly.)	William Bateman Lord Bateman.
	Algernon Hawkins Thomond Lord Kintore. ( Earl of Kintore. )
	George Ponsonby Lord Lismore. ( Vis- count Lismore. ) Derrick Warner William Lord Ross- more.

ROLL OF THE LORDS

Robert Shapland George Julian Lord Carew.	Luke Lord Annaly.
Charles Frederick Ashley Cooper Lord De Mauley.	Robert Offley Ashburton Lord Houghton.
Arthur Lord Wrottesley.	John Gaspard Le Marchant Lord Romilly.
Charles Douglas Richard Lord Sudeley.	James Herbert Gustavus Meredyth Lord Meredyth. ( Lord Athlumney. )
Paul Sanford Lord Methuen.	Windham Thomas Lord Kenry. ( Earl of Dunraven and Mount-Earl. )
Henry Edward John Lord Stanley of Alderley.	Charles Stanley Lord Monck. ( Viscount Monck. )
William Henry Lord Leigh.	John Major Lord Hartismere. ( Lord Henniker. )
Beilby Lord Wenlock.	Hedworth Hylton Lord Hylton.
William Lord Lurgan.	George Sholto Gordon Lord Penrhyn.
Thomas Spring Lord Monteagle of Brandon.	Gustavus Russell Lord Brancaster. ( Viscount Boyne. )
John Reginald Upton Lord Seaton.	John Henry Lord Kesteven.
John Manley Arbuthnot Lord Kean.	Arthur Lord Ormathwaite.
John Lord Oxenfoord. ( Earl of Stair. )	Edward Lord O'Neill.
Hussey Crespiigny Lord Vivian.	Robert William Lord Napier.
Henry William Lord Congleton.	Jenico William Joseph Lord Gormanston. ( Viscount Gormanston. )
Denis St. George Lord Dunsandle and Clanconal. ( Elected for Ireland. )	Thomas Kane Lord Rathdonnell. ( Elected for Ireland. )
Victor Alexander Lord Elgin. ( Earl of Elgin and Kincardine. )	John Hamilton Lord Lawrence.
Thomas Montague Morrison Lord Truro.	James Plaisted Lord Penzance.
Arthur Lord De Freyne.	John Lord Dunning. ( Lord Rollo. )
Edward Burtenshaw Lord Saint Leonards.	James Lord Balinhard. ( Earl of Southesk. )
George Fitz-Roy Henry Lord Raglan.	William Lord Hare. ( Earl of Listowel. )
Valentine Augustus Lord Kenmare. ( Earl of Kenmare. )	Francis Edward Lord Howard of Glossop.
Henry Lord Belper.	Bernard Edward Barnaby Lord Castletown.
Richard Wogan Lord Talbot de Malahide.	John Emerich Edward Lord Acton.
Robert Lord Ebury.	Thomas Charles Lord Robartes.
Charles Compton William Lord Chesham.	Frederick Lord Wolverton.
Frederic Augustus Lord Chelmsford.	Algernon William Fulke Lord Greville.
John Lord Churston.	Thomas Towneley Lord O'Hagan.
Henry Lord Leconfield.	William Lord Sandhurst.
Wilbraham Lord Egerton.	Francis Lord Ettrick. ( Lord Napier. )
Godfrey Charles Lord Tredegar.	James Charles Herbert Welbore Ellis Lord Somerton. ( Earl of Normanton. )
Fitz Patrick Henry Lord Lyveden.	Henry Austin Lord Aberdare.
Henry Charles Lord Brougham and Vaux.	James Lord Moncreiff.
Arthur Fitz-Gerald Lord Kinnaird.	John Duke Lord Coleridge.
Richard Luttrell Pilkington Lord Westbury.	William Lord Emly.
Francis William Fitzhardinge Lord Fitzhardinge.	Chichester Samuel Lord Carlingford. ( Lord Clermont. )

SPIRITUAL AND TEMPORAL.

Francis Lord Cottesloe.	Arthur Saunders William Charles Fox Lord Sudley. ( Earl of Arran. )
Anney Lord Hampton.	John Robert William Lord de Vesci. ( Viscount de l'esci. )
Lord Winmarleigh.	Marmaduke Francis Lord Herries.
Alexander Lord Douglas. ( Earl me. )	Hardinge Stanley Lord Halsbury. ( In another Place as Lord High Chancellor. )
George Maule Lord Ramsay. of Dalhousie. )	Mervyn Edward Lord Powerscourt. ( In another Place as Viscount Powerscourt. )
Henry Lord Fermanagh. ( Earl )	Anthony Henley Lord Northington. ( Lord Henley. )
Richard Lord Harlech.	Nathaniel Mayer Lord Rothschild.
Gerard Lord Alington.	Edward Charles Lord Revelstoke.
James Frederic Lord Tollemache.	Robert Lord Monkswell.
Cansfield Lord Gerard.	Arthur Lord Hobhouse.
Sackville Lord Sackville.	Ralph Robert Wheeler Lord Lingen.
Lord Blackburn.	Edward Lord Ashbourne.
Bowyer Lord Norton.	Rowland Lord Saint Oswald.
Lord Shute. ( Viscount Barrington )	Robert James Lord Wantage.
Lord Watson. ( A Lord of all in Ordinary. )	William Baliol Lord Esher.
ce Hesketh Lord Haldon.	George William Lord Deramore.
rtie Lord Wimborne.	Henry John Lord Montagu of Beau-
Edward Lord Ardilaun.	lieu.
Wallace Alexander Napier Lord ngton.	William Buller Fullerton Lord Elphinstone.
Frederick Lord Donington.	Charles John Lord Colville of Culross.
Edwin Lord Trevor.	Farrer Lord Herschell.
u William Lord Rowton.	Charles Henry Lord Hillingdon.
Hugessen Lord Brabourne.	Samuel Charles Lord Hindlip.
Oliver Villiers Lord Ampthill.	Edmund Lord Grimthorpe.
Montagu Lord Tweeddale. quess of Tweeddale.)	Richard de Aquila Lord Stalbridge.
Ulick Tristram Lord Howth. of Howth.)	William Lord Kensington.
James Lord Reay.	Michael Arthur Lord Burton.
rt Lord Derwent.	John Glencairn Carter Lord Hamilton of Dalzell.
James Lord Hothfield.	Thomas Lord Brassey.
Coutts Lord Tweedmouth.	Henry Lord Thring.
William Wilshere Lord Bram-	Frederick Arthur Lord Stanley of Preston.
ck Beauchamp Paget Lord Al-	Edward Lord Macnaghten. ( A Lord of Appeal in Ordinary. )
r.	Robert Lord Connemara.
Lord Tennyson.	Claude Lord Bowes. ( In another Place as Earl of Strathmore and Kinghorn. )
Lord Strathspey. ( Earl of Sea- )	George Edmund Milnes Lord Monckton. ( Viscount Galway. )
orge Lord Monk Bretton.	John Lord Saint Levan.
Charles Lord Northbourne.	James Douglas Lord Magheramorne.

ROLL OF THE LORDS.

William George Lord Armstrong.	Michael Lord Morris. ( A Lord of Appeal in Ordinary. )
George Lord Basing.	William Ventris Lord Field.
William Henry Lord De Ramsey.	Francis Richard Lord Sandford.
William Meriton Lord Cheylesmore.	Edward Cecil Lord Iveagh.
Egerton Lord Addington.	James Lord Hannen. ( A Lord of Appeal in Ordinary. )
Henry Thurstan Lord Knutsford. ( In another Place as one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State. )	George Lord Mount Stephen.
John Lord Savile.	Samuel Lord Masham.

LIST OF THE COMMONS.

THE NAMES OF MEMBERS

RETURNED TO SERVE IN THE TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND, SUMMONED TO MEET AT WESTMINSTER THE FIFTH DAY OF AUGUST, ONE THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND EIGHTY SIX, AS BY THE SEVERAL RETURNS FILED IN THE OFFICE OF THE CLERK OF THE CROWN IN CHANCERY APPEARS. CORRECTED TO THE MEETING OF THE PARLIAMENT ON THE 9TH FEBRUARY, 1892.

BEDFORD.

NORTHERN, or BIGGLESWADE DIVISION,
Viscount Baring.

SOUTHERN, or LUTON DIVISION,
Sir Cyril Flower.

BEDFORD BOROUGH.
Samuel Whitbread.

BERKS.

NORTHERN, or ABINGDON DIVISION,
Sir Philip Wroughton.

SOUTHERN, or NEWBURY DIVISION,
Sir William George Mount.

EASTERN, or WOKINGHAM DIVISION,
Sir George Russell, bt.

READING BOROUGH.
Sir Charles Townshend Murdoch.

WINDSOR (NEW) BOROUGH.
Sir Francis Tress Barry.

BUCKS.

NORTHERN, or BUCKINGHAM DIVISION,
Sir Herbert Samuel Leon.

MID, or AYLESBURY DIVISION,
Sir Ferdinand James de Rothschild.

SOUTHERN, or WYCOMBE DIVISION,
Viscount Curzon.

CAMBRIDGE.

NORTHERN, or WISBECH DIVISION,
Hon. Arthur George Brand.

WESTERN, or CHESTERTON DIVISION,
Sir Charles Hall, K.C.M.G.

EASTERN, or NEWMARKET DIVISION,
Sir George Newnes.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY.

Richard Claverhouse Jebb.
Sir George Gabriel Stokes, bt.

CAMBRIDGE BOROUGH.
Sir Robert Uniacke Penrose FitzGerald.

CHESTER.

WIRRAL DIVISION.

Colonel Edward Thomas Davenant
Cotton-Jodrell.

EDDISBURY DIVISION,
Sir Henry James Tollemache.

MACCLESFIELD DIVISION,
Sir William Bromley Davenport.

CREWE DIVISION,
Sir Walter Stowe Bright McLaren.

NORTHWICH DIVISION,
Sir John Tomlinson Brunner.

ALTRINCHAM DIVISION,
Sir William Cunliffe Brooks, bt.

List of	{COMMONS, 1892}	Members.
CHESTER—cont.
	HYDE DIVISION. Joseph Watson Sidebotham.
	KNUTSFORD DIVISION, Hon. Alan de Tatton Egerton.
	BIRKENHEAD BOROUGH. General Sir Edward Bruce Hamley, K.C.B.
	CHESTER BOROUGH. Robert Armstrong Yerburgh.
	STOCKPORT BOROUGH. Louis John Jennings, Sydney Gedge.
<hr/>
CORNWALL.
	WESTERN, or ST. IVES DIVISION, Thomas Bedford Bolitho.
	NORTH - WESTERN, or CAMBORNE DIVI- SION, Charles Augustus Vansittart Conybeare.
	TRURO DIVISION, William Bickford-Smith.
	MID, or ST. AUSTELL DIVISION, William Alexander M'Arthur.
	SOUTH-EASTERN, or BODMIN DIVISION, Rt. Hon. Leonard Henry Courtney.
	NORTH-EASTERN, or LAUNCESTON DIVISION, Charles Thomas Dyke Acland.
	PENRYN AND FALMOUTH BOROUGH. William George Cavendish Bentinck.
<hr/>
CUMBERLAND.
	NORTHERN, or ESKDALE DIVISION, Robert Andrew Allison.
	MID, or PENRITH DIVISION, James William Lowther.
	COCKERMOUTH DIVISION, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, bt.
	WESTERN, or EGREMONT DIVISION, Lord Muncaster.
	CARLISLE BOROUGH. William Court Gully.
	WHITEHAVEN BOROUGH. James Bain, kt.
<hr/>
	DERBY.
	HIGH PEAK DIVISION, William Sidebottom.
	NORTH-EASTERN DIVISION, Thomas Dolling Bolton.
	CHESTERFIELD DIVISION, Alfred Barnes.
	WESTERN DIVISION, Victor Christian William Cavendish.
	MID DIVISION, James Alfred Jacoby.
	ILKESTON DIVISION, Sir Balthazar Walter Foster.
	SOUTHERN DIVISION, Henry Wardle.
	DERBY BOROUGH. Thomas Roe,
	Rt. Hon. Sir William George Gran- Venable Vernon Harcourt, kt.
<hr/>
DEVON.
	EASTERN, or HONITON DIVISION, Sir John Henry Kennaway, bt.
	NORTH-EASTERN, or TIVERTON DIVI- SION. Col. Sir William Hood Walrond, bt.
	NORTHERN, or SOUTH MOLTON DIVIS- ION. George Lambert.
	NORTH-WESTERN, or BARNSTAPLE DIVISION, George Pitt-Lewis.
	WESTERN, or TAVISTOCK DIVISION Viscount Ebrington.
	SOUTHERN, or TOTNES DIVISION, Francis Bingham Mildmay.
	TORQUAY DIVISION, Richard Mallock.
	MID, or ASHBURTON DIVISION, Charles Seale-Hayne.
	DEVONPORT BOROUGH. Sir John Henry Puleston, kt.
	Captain George Edward Price.
	EXETER BOROUGH. Hon. Sir H. Stafford Northcote, bt., PLYMOUTH BOROUGH. Sir Edward Bates, bt.
	Sir Edward George Clarke, kt.

List of

{COMMONS, 1892}

Members.

DORSET.

NORTHERN DIVISION,
1. Edwin Berkeley Portman.EASTERN DIVISION,
1. Humphry Naipier Sturt.SOUTHERN DIVISION, liam Ernest Brymer.WESTERN DIVISION,
iry Richard Farquharson.

DURHAM.

JARROW DIVISION,
Charles Mark Palmer, bt.HOUGHTON-LE-SPRING DIVISION, holas Wood.CHESTER-LE-STREET DIVISION,
ies Joicey.NORTH-WESTERN DIVISION, wellyn Archer Atherley-Jones.MID DIVISION, in Wilson.SOUTH-EASTERN DIVISION, ut.-General Sir Henry Marshman lavelock-Allan, bt., V.C., K.C.B.BISHOP AUCKLAND DIVISION, es Mellor Paulton.BARNARD CASTLE DIVISION, Joseph Whitwell Pease, bt.DARLINGTON BOROUGH.
odore Fry.DURHAM BOROUGH.
omas Milvain.GATESHEAD BOROUGH.
n. Walter Henry James.HARTLEPOOLS (THE) BOROUGH.
istopher Furness.SOUTH SHIELDS BOROUGH.
nes Cochran Stevenson.STOCKTON BOROUGH.
Horace Davey, kt.SUNDERLAND BOROUGH.
nuel Storey,
ward Temperley Gourley.

ESSEX.

SOUTH-WESTERN, or WALTHAMSTOW
DIVISION,

Colonel William Thomas Makins.

SOUTHERN, or ROMFORD DIVISION,
James Theobald.WESTERN, or EPPING DIVISION,
Right Hon. Sir Henry John Selwin-Ibbetson, bt.NORTHERN, or SAFFRON WALDEN
DIVISION,

Herbert Colstoun Gardner.

NORTH-EASTERN, or HARWICH DIVISION,
James Round.EASTERN, or MALDON DIVISION,
Charles Wing Gray.MID, or CHELMSFORD DIVISION,
William James Beadel.SOUTH-EASTERN DIVISION,
Major Frederic Carne Rasch.COLCHESTER BOROUGH.
Lord Brooke.WEST HAM BOROUGH.
North Division,
James Forrest Fulton.South Division,
Major George Edward Banes.

GLOUCESTER.

MID, or STROUD DIVISION,
George Holloway.NORTHERN, or TEWKESBURY DIVISION,
Sir John Edward Dorington, bt.EASTERN, or CIRENCESTER DIVISION, Arthur Brend Winterbotham.FOREST OF DEAN DIVISION,
Godfrey Blundell Samuelson.SOUTHERN, or THORNBURY DIVISION,
Lord Dunsany.BRISTOL BOROUGH.
West Division,
Rt. hon. Sir Michael Edward Hicks
Beach, bt.

List of

{COMMONS, 1892}

*Members.*GLOUCESTER—cont.

North Division,
Lewis Fry.
East Division,
Sir Joseph Dodge Weston.
South Division,
Col. Edward Stock Hill, C.B.
CHELTENHAM BOROUGH.
James Tynte Agg-Gardner.
GLOUCESTER BOROUGH.
Thomas Robinson.

HANTS.

NORTHERN, or BASINGSTOKE DIVISION,
Arthur Frederick Jeffreys.
WESTERN, or ANDOVER DIVISION,
William Wither Bramston Beach.
EASTERN, or PETERSFIELD DIVISION,
Viscount Wolmer.
SOUTHERN, or FAREHAM DIVISION,
General Sir Frederick Wellington John Fitz Wygram, bt.
NEW FOREST DIVISION,
Francis Compton.
CHRISTCHURCH BOROUGH.
Charles Edward Baring Young.
PORTSMOUTH BOROUGH.
Major.-Gen. Sir William Crossman,
K.C.M.G.
Sir Samuel Wilson.
SOUTHAMPTON BOROUGH.
Alfred Giles,
Francis H. Evans.
WINCHESTER BOROUGH.
Richard Moss.

HEREFORD.

NORTHERN, or LEOMINSTER DIVISION,
James Rankin.
SOUTHERN, or ROSS DIVISION,
Michael Biddulph.
HEREFORD BOROUGH.
Sir Joseph Russell Bailey, bt.

HERTFORD.

NORTHERN, or HITCHIN DIVISION
Robert Dimsdale (Baron of the Ru Empire).
EASTERN, or HERTFORD DIVISION
Abel Smith.
MID, or ST. ALBAN'S DIVISION,
Viscount Grimston.
WESTERN, or WATFORD DIVISION
Thomas Frederick Halsey.

HUNTINGDON.

SOUTHERN, or HUNTINGDON DIVISION
Arthur Hugh Smith-Barry.
NORTHERN, or RAMSAY DIVISION,
Hon. Ailwyn Edward Fellowes.

ISLE OF WIGHT.

Sir Richard Everard Webster, kt.

KENT.

WESTERN, or SEVENOAKS DIVISION
Hon. Charles William Mills.
NORTH-WESTERN, or DARTFORD
DIVISION,
Rt. Hon. Sir William Hart Dyke, bt.
SOUTH-WESTERN, or TUNBRIDGE
DIVISION,
Robert Norton.
MID, or MEDWAY DIVISION,
Hon. John Stewart Gathorne-Hardy.
NORTH-EASTERN, or FAVERSHAM
DIVISION,
Hon. Herbert Thomas Knatchb
Hugessen.

SOUTHERN, or ASHFORD DIVISION
William Pomfret Pomfret.
EASTERN, or ST. AUGUSTINE'S DIVISI
Rt. Hon. Aretas Akers-Douglas.

ISLE OF THANET DIVISION,
Rt Hon. James Lowther.

CANTERBURY BOROUGH.
John Henniker Heaton.

List of

{COMMONS, 1892}

*Members.*NT—cont.

- CHATHAM BOROUGH.
Hon. Sir John Eldon Gorst, kt.
- DEPTFORD BOROUGH.
Charles John Darling.
- DOVER BOROUGH.
George Wyndham.
- GRAVESEND BOROUGH.
John Bazley-White.
- GREENWICH BOROUGH.
Thomas William Board.
- HYTHE BOROUGH.
Edward William Watkin, bt.
- LEWISHAM BOROUGH.
John Penn.
- MAIDSTONE BOROUGH.
Sir Wykeham Cornwallis.
- ROCHESTER BOROUGH.
1. Edward Knatchbull-Hugessen.
- WOOLWICH BOROUGH.
Colonel Edwin Hughes.

---

LANCASTER.

- North Lancashire.
- NORTH LONSDALE DIVISION,
William George Ainslie.
- LANCASTER DIVISION,
James Williamson.
- BLACKPOOL DIVISION,
Matthew White Ridley, bt.
- CHORLEY DIVISION,
Lieut.-Gen. Randle Joseph Feilden,
.M.G.
- North-East Lancashire.
- DARWEN DIVISION,
Count Cranborne.
- CLITHEROE DIVISION,
Hon. Sir Ughtred James Kay-Wentworth, bt.
- ACCRINGTON DIVISION,
Albert Trotter Hermon-Hodge.
- Rossendale Division,
1. H. Maden.

LANCASTER—*cont.

- South-East Lancashire.
WESTHOUGHTON DIVISION,
Frank Hardcastle.
- HEYWOOD DIVISION,
Isaac Hoyle.
- MIDDLETON DIVISION,
Thomas Fielden.
- RADCLIFFE-CUM-FARNWORTH DIVISION,
Robert Leake.
- ECCLES DIVISION,
Henry John Roby.
- STRETFORD DIVISION,
John William Maclare.
- GORTON DIVISION,
William Mather.
- PRESTWICH DIVISION,
Robert Gray Cornish Mowbray.
- South-West Lancashire.
SOUTHPORT DIVISION,
Hon. George Nathaniel Curzon.
- ORMSKIRK DIVISION,
Arthur Bower Forwood.
- BOOTLE DIVISION.
Lt.-Colonel Thomas Myles Sandys.
- WIDNES DIVISION,
Tom Cottingham Edwards-Moss.
- NEWTON DIVISION,
Thomas Wodehouse Legh.
- INCE DIVISION,
Colonel Henry Blundell Hollinshead
Blundell, C.B.
- LEIGH DIVISION,
Caleb Wright.
- ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE BOROUGH.
John Edmund Wentworth Addison.
- BARROW-IN-FURNESS BOROUGH.
James Archibald Duncan.
- BLACKBURN BOROUGH.
William Coddington.
- William Henry Hornby.

List of	{COMMONS, 1892}	Members.
LANCASTER—cont.
BOLTON BOROUGH.		LANCASTER—cont.
Herbert Shepherd Cross.		OLDHAM BOROUGH.
Colonel Hon. Francis Charles Bridgeman.		James Mackenzie Maclean.
BURNLEY BOROUGH.		Elliott Lees.
J. Spencer Balfour.		PRESTON BOROUGH.
BURY BOROUGH.		William Edward Murray Tomlinson.
Right Hon. Sir Henry James, kt.		Robert William Hanbury.
LIVERPOOL BOROUGH.		ROCHDALE BOROUGH.
Kirkdale Division, Sir George Smyth Baden-Powell, K.C.M.G.		Thomas Bayley Potter.
Walton Division, Miles Walker Mattinson.		SALFORD BOROUGH.
Everton Division, (Vacant)		North Division, Edward Hardcastle.
West Derby Division, Hon. William Henry Cross.		West Division, Lees Knowles.
Scotland Division, Thomas Power O'Connor.		South Division, Henry Hoyle Howorth.
Exchange Division, Ralph Neville.		ST. HELENS BOROUGH.
Abercromby Division, William Frederick Lawrence.		Henry Seton-Karr.
East Toxteth Division, Rt. Hon. Baron Henry de Worms.		STALYBRIDGE BOROUGH.
West Toxteth Division, Thomas Bland Royden.		Tom Harrop Sidebottom.
MANCHESTER BOROUGH.		WARRINGTON BOROUGH.
North-West Division, Sir William Henry Houldsworth, bt.		Sir Gilbert Greenall, bt.
North Division, Charles Ernest Schwann.		WIGAN BOROUGH.
North-East Division, Right Hon. Sir James Fergusson, bt., G.C.S.I.		Francis Sharp Powell.
East Division, Right Hon. Arthur James Balfour.		LEICESTER.
South Division, Sir Henry Enfield Roscoe, kt.		EASTERN, or MELTON DIVISION, Marquess of Granby.
South-West Division, Jacob Bright.		MID, or LOUGHBOOUGH DIVISION, Edwin Joseph Lisle March Phillipps Lisle.
		WESTERN, or BOSWORTH DIVISION, James Ellis.
		SOUTHERN, or HARBOROUGH DIVISION, John William Logan.
		LEICESTER BOROUGH.
		James Allanson Picton.
		Alexander M'Arthur.

LINCOLN.

WEST LINDSEY, or GAINSBORO'
DIVISION,

Col. Henry Eyre.

NORTH LINDSEY, or BRIGG DIVISION,
Samuel Danks Waddy.

EAST LINDSEY, or LOUTH DIVISION,
Arthur Raymond Heath.

SOUTH LINDSEY, or HORNCastle
DIVISION,

Right Hon. Edward Stanhope.

NORTH KESTEVEN, or SLEAFORD
DIVISION,

Right Hon. Henry Chaplin.

SOUTH KESTEVEN, or STAMFORD DIVI- SION,

Henry John Cokayne Cust.

HOLLAND, or SPALDING DIVISION,
Halley Stewart.

BOSTON BOROUGH.

Henry John Farmer-Atkinson.

GRANTHAM BOROUGH.

Malcolm Low.

GREAT GRIMSBY BOROUGH.
Right Hon. Edward Heneage.

LINCOLN BOROUGH.

Frederick Harold Kerans.

MIDDLESEX.

ENFIELD DIVISION,
Captain Henry Ferryman Bowles.

TOTTENHAM DIVISION.

Joseph Howard.

HORNSEY DIVISION,

Henry Charles Stephens.

HARROW DIVISION,

William Ambrose.

EALING DIVISION,

Rt. Hon. Lord George Hamilton.

BRENTFORD DIVISION,

James Bigwood.

UXBRIDGE DIVISION,

Frederick Dixon Dixon-Hartland.

MIDDLESEX—cont.*BETHNAL GREEN BOROUGH.

North-East Division,

George Howell.

South-West Division,

Edward Hare Pickersgill.

CHELSEA BOROUGH.

Charles Algernon Whitmore.

FINSBURY BOROUGH.

Holborn Division,

Gainsford Bruce.

Central Division,

Captain Frederick Thomas Penton.

East Division,

James Rowlands.

FULHAM BOROUGH.

William Hayes Fisher.

HACKNEY BOROUGH.

North Division

Major-Gen. Sir Lewis Pelly, K.C.B., K.C.S.I.

Central Division,

Surgeon-General Sir William Guyer
Hunter, K.C.M.G.

South Division,

Sir Charles Russell, kt.

HAMMERSMITH BOROUGH.

Major-Gen. Walter Tuckfield Goldsworthy.

HAMPSTEAD BOROUGH.

Edward Brodie Hoare.

ISLINGTON BOROUGH.

North Division,

George Christopher Trout Bartley.

West Division,

Richard Chamberlain.

East Division,

Cowley Lambert.

South Division,

Sir Albert Kaye Rollit, kt.

KENSINGTON BOROUGH.

North Division,

Sir Roper Lethbridge, kt., K.C.I.E

List of

{COMMONS, 1892}

Members.

MIDDLESEX—Kensington Boro'—cont.

South Division,

Sir Algernon Borthwick, bt.

LONDON UNIVERSITY.

Rt. Hon. Sir John Lubbock, bt.

MARYLEBONE BOROUGH.

East Division,

Edmund Boulnois.

West Division,

Frederick Seager Hunt.

PADDINGTON BOROUGH.

North Division,

John Aird.

South Division,

Rt. Hon. Lord Randolph Henry Spencer Churchill.

ST. GEORGE'S, HANOVER SQUARE.

Rt. Hon. George Joachim Goschen.

ST. PANCRAS BOROUGH.

North Division,

Thomas Henry Bolton.

East Division,

Robert Grant Webster.

West Division,

Harry Lawson Webster Lawson.

South Division,

Sir Julian Goldsmid, bt.

SHOREDITCH BOROUGH.

Hoxton Division,

James Stuart.

Haggerston Division,

William Randal Cremer.

STRAND BOROUGH.

Hon. William Frederick Danvers Smith.

TOWER HAMLETS BOROUGH.

Whitechapel Division,

Samuel Montagu.

St. George's Division,

Right Hon. Charles Thomson Ritchie.

Limehouse Division,

Edward Samuel Norris.

Mile End Division,

Spener Charrington.

MIDDLESEX—Tower Hamlets Boro'—cont.

Stepney Division,

Frederick Wootton Isaacson.

Bow and Bromley Division,

Sir John Charles Ready Colon K.C.M.G.

Poplar Division,

Sydney Charles Buxton.

WESTMINSTER BOROUGH.

William Lehmann Ashmead-Bartl Burdett-Coutts.

LONDON CITY.

Henry Hucks Gibbs,

Sir Reginald Hanson, bt.

MONMOUTH.

NORTHERN DIVISION,

Thomas Phillips Price.

WESTERN DIVISION,

Cornelius Marshall Warmington.

SOUTHERN DIVISION,

Col. Hon. Frederick Courtenay Morgan

MONMOUTH BOROUGH.

Sir George Elliot, bt.

NORFOLK.

NORTH-WESTERN DIVISION,

Lord Henry C. Bentinck.

SOUTH-WESTERN DIVISION,

William Amhurst Tyssen Amherst.

NORTHERN DIVISION,

Herbert Hardy Cozens-Hardy.

EASTERN DIVISION,

Sir Edward Birkbeck, bt.

MID DIVISION,

Robert Thornhagh Gurdon.

SOUTHERN DIVISION,

Francis Taylor.

GREAT YARMOUTH BOROUGH.

Sir Henry Whatley Tyler, kt.

KING'S LYNN BOROUGH.

Alexander Weston Jarvis.

NORWICH BOROUGH.

Jeremiah James Colman.

Samuel Hoare.

List of	{COMMONS, 1892}	Members.
NORTHAMPTON.		OXFORD.
NORTHERN DIVISION, Lord Burghley.		NORTHERN, or BANBURY DIVISION, Sir Bernhard Samuelson, bt.
EASTERN DIVISION, Francis Allston Channing.		MID, or WOODSTOCK DIVISION, George Herbert Morrell.
MID DIVISION, Hon. Charles Robert Spencer.		SOUTHERN, or HENLEY DIVISION, Hon. Francis Parker.
SOUTHERN DIVISION, Sir Rainald Knightley, bt.		OXFORD UNIVERSITY.
NORTHAMPTON BOROUGH. Henry Labouchere, Moses Philip Manfield.	Rt. Hon. Sir John Robert Mowbray, bt., D.C.L.
PETERBOROUGH BOROUGH. Alpheus Cleophas Morton.	John Gilbert Talbot, D.C.L.	OXFORD BOROUGH.
	Alexander William Hall.
NORTHUMBERLAND.		RUTLAND.
WANSBECK DIVISION, Charles Fenwick.	George Henry Finch.
TYNESIDE DIVISION, Wentworth Blackett Beaumont.		SALOP.
HEXHAM DIVISION, Miles MacInnes.		WESTERN, or OSWESTRY DIVISION, Stanley Leighton.
BERWICK-UPON-TWEED DIVISION, Sir Edward Grey, bt.		NORTHERN, or NEWPORT DIVISION, Col. William Slaney Kenyon-Slaney.
MORPETH BOROUGH. Thomas Burt.		MID, or WELLINGTON DIVISION.
NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE BOROUGH. Right Hon. John Morley.		Alexander Hargreaves Brown.
James Craig.		SOUTHERN, or LUDLOW DIVISION, Robert Jasper More.
TYNEMOUTH BOROUGH. Richard Sim Donkin.		SHREWSBURY BOROUGH.
	James Watson.
NOTTINGHAM.		SOMERSET.
BASSETLAW DIVISION, Sir Frederick George Milner, bt.		NORTHERN DIVISION, Evan Henry Llewellyn.
NEWARK DIVISION, Viscount Newark.		WELLS DIVISION,
RUSHCLIFFE DIVISION, John Edward Ellis.		Colonel Sir Richard Horner Paget, bt.
MANSFIELD DIVISION, Cecil George Savile Foljambe.		FROME DIVISION.
NOTTINGHAM BOROUGH. West Division, Henry Broadhurst.		Viscount Weymouth.
East Division, Arnold Morley.		EASTERN DIVISION,
South Division, Henry Smith Wright.		Henry Hobhouse.
		SOUTHERN DIVISION,
		Earl of Cavan.
		BRIDGWATER DIVISION,
		Edward James Stanley.
		WESTERN, or WELLINGTON DIVISION,
		Charles Isaac Elton.

List of	{COMMONS, 1892}	Members.
SOMERSET—cont.
BATH BOROUGH.		SUFFOLK.
Edmond Robert Wodehouse.	NORTHERN, or Lowestoft Division
Col. Robert Peter Laurie, C.B.	Sir Savile Brinton Crossley, bt.
TAUNTON BOROUGH.	NORTH-EASTERN, or Eye Division
Hon. Alfred Percy Allsopp.	Francis Seymour Stevenson.
STAFFORD.	NORTH-WESTERN, or Stowmarket Division,
LEEK DIVISION,	Sydney James Stern.
Harry Tichborne Hinckes.	SOUTH, or Sudbury Division,
BURTON DIVISION,	William Cuthbert Quilter.
Sydney Evershed.	SOUTH-EASTERN, or Woodbridge Division,
WESTERN DIVISION,	Col. Robert Hamilton Lloyd Anstrut
Hamar Alfred Bass.	BURY ST. EDMUNDS BOROUGH
NORTH-WESTERN DIVISION,	Lord Francis Hervey.
Captain Justinian Heathcote Edwards-Heathcote.	IPSWICH BOROUGH.
LICHFIELD DIVISION,	Sir Charles Dalrymple, bt.,
Sir John Swinburne, bt.	Lord Elcho.
KINGSWINFORD DIVISION,	SURREY.
Alexander Staveley Hill.	NORTH-WESTERN, or Chertsey Division,
HANDSWORTH DIVISION,	Frederick Alers Hankey.
Henry Wiggin.	SOUTH-WESTERN, or Guildford Division,
HANLEY BOROUGH.	Hon. William St. John Fremantle Brodrick.
William Woodall.	SOUTH-EASTERN, or Reigate Division
NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LYME BOROUGH.	Sir James John Trevor Lawrence, bt.
Douglas Henry Coghill.	MID, or EPSOM DIVISION,
STAFFORD BOROUGH.	Rt. Hon. George Cubitt.
Thomas Salt.	KINGSTON DIVISION,
STOKE-UPON-TRENT BOROUGH.	Sir John Whittaker Ellis, bt.
George Granville Leveson-Gower.	NORTH-EASTERN, or WIMBLEDON DIVISION,
WALSALL BOROUGH.	Henry Cosmo Orme Bonsor.
Edward Thomas Holden.	BATTERSEA AND CLAPHAM BOROUGH
WEDNESBURY BOROUGH.	Battersea Division,
Hon. Philip James Stanhope.	Octavius Vaughan Morgan.
WEST BROMWICH BOROUGH.	Clapham Division,
James Ernest Spencer.	John Saunders Gilliat.
WOLVERHAMPTON BOROUGH.
West Division,
Sir William Chichele Plowden, K.C.S.I.
East Division,
Rt. Hon. Henry Hartley Fowler.
South Division,
Rt. Hon. Charles Pelham Villiers.

List of

{COMMONS, 1892}

*Members.SURREY—cont.CAMBERWELL BOROUGH.North Division,

John Richards Kelly.

Peckham Division,

Arthur Antony Baumann.

Dulwich Division,

John Blundell Maple.

CROYDON BOROUGH.

Hon. Sidney Herbert.

LAMBETH BOROUGH.North Division,*Lieut.-Gen. Charles Craufurd Fraser, V.C., C.B.Kennington Division,

Mark Hanbury Beaufoy.

Brixton Division,

Marquess of Carmarthen.

Norwood Division,

Thomas Lynn Bristowe.

NEWINGTON BOROUGH.West Division,*

Charles Wallwyn Radcliffe Cooke.

Waltham Division,

Lewis Henry Isaacs.

SOUTHWARK BOROUGH.West Division,*

Richard Knight Causton.

Rotherhithe Division,

Colonel Charles Edward Hamilton.

Bermondsey Division,

Alfred Lafone.

WANDSWORTH BOROUGH.

Henry Kimber.

SUSSEX.*NORTH-WESTERN, or HORSHAM DIVISION,
Colonel Sir Walter Barttelot Barttelot, bt., C.B.SOUTH-WESTERN, or CHICHESTER
DIVISION,

Rt. Hon. Lord Walter C. Gordon Lennox.

NORTHERN, or EAST GRINSTEAD DIVISION,
Hon. Alfred Erskine Gathorne-Hardy.SUSSEX—cont.*MID, or LEWES DIVISION,

Sir Henry Fletcher, bt.

SOUTHERN, or EASTBOURNE DIVISION,
Admiral Edward Field.EASTERN, or RYE DIVISION, Arthur Montagu Brookfield.BRIGHTON BOROUGH.Rt. Hon. Sir William Thackeray Marriott, kt.,

Gerald Walter Erskine Loder.

HASTINGS BOROUGH.

Wilson Noble.

WARWICK.*NORTHERN, or TAMWORTH DIVISION,
Philip Albert Muntz.NORTH-EASTERN, or NUNEATON DIVISION,
John Stratford Dugdale.SOUTH-WESTERN, or STRATFORD-ON-AVON DIVISION,

Frederick Townsend.

SOUTH-EASTERN, or RUGBY DIVISION,
Henry Peyton Cobb.ASTON MANOR BOROUGH.Captain George William Grice-Hutchinson.BIRMINGHAM BOROUGH.Edgbaston Division,* George Dixon.West Division,
Rt. Hon. Joseph Chamberlain.Central Division,
John Albert Bright.North Division,
William Kenrick.East Division,
Right Hon. Henry Matthews.Bordesley Division
Jesse Collings.South Division,
Joseph Powell-Williams.

List of

{COMMONS, 1892}

*Members.*WARWICK—cont.

COVENTRY BOROUGH.

William Henry Walter Ballantine.

WARWICK &amp; LEAMINGTON BOROUGH.

Rt. Hon. Arthur Wellesley Peel.

WESTMORELAND.

NORTHERN, or APPLEBY DIVISION,
Hon. William Lowther.SOUTHERN, or KENDAL DIVISION,
Earl of Bective.

WILTS.

NORTHERN, or CRICKLADE DIVISION,
Mervyn Herbert Nevil Story-Maskelyne.NORTH-WESTERN, or CHIPPENHAM
DIVISION,

Lord Henry Bruce.

WESTERN, or WESTBURY DIVISION,
George Pargiter Fuller.EASTERN, or DEVIZES DIVISION,
Walter Hume Long.SOUTHERN, or WILTON DIVISION,
Sir Thomas Fraser Grove, bt.SALISBURY BOROUGH.
Edward Henry Hulse.

WORCESTER.

WESTERN, or BEWDLEY DIVISION,
Sir Edmund Anthony Harley Lechmere, bt.SOUTHERN, or EVESHAM DIVISION, Sir Richard Temple, bt., G.C.S.I.MID; or DROITWICH DIVISION, John Corbett.NORTHERN DIVISION,
Benjamin Hingley.EASTERN DIVISION,
George Woodyatt Hastings.DUDLEY BOROUGH.
Brooke Robinson.KIDDERMINSTER BOROUGH.
Augustus Frederick Godson.WORCESTER BOROUGH.
Hon. George Higginson Allsopp.

YORK.

North Riding,

THIRSK AND MALTON DIVISION,
Colonel Hon. Lewis Payn Dawnay.

RICHMOND DIVISION,

George William Elliot.

CLEVELAND DIVISION,

Henry Fell Pease.

WHITBY DIVISION,

Ernest William Beckett.

East Riding,

HOLDERNESS DIVISION,
Commander George Richard Bethell, R.

BUCKROSE DIVISION,

Christopher Sykes.

HOWDENSHIRE DIVISION,

Arthur Duncombe.

West Riding, Northern Part,

SKIPTON DIVISION,

Walter Morrison.

KEIGHLEY DIVISION,

Isaac Holden.

SHIPLEY DIVISION,

Joseph Craven.

SOWERBY DIVISION,

Edward Crossley.

ELLAND DIVISION,

Thomas Wayman.

West Riding, Southern Part,

MORLEY DIVISION,

Charles George Milnes-Gaskell.

NORMANTON DIVISION,
Benjamin Pickard.COLNE VALLEY DIVISION,
Henry Frederick Beaumont.HOLMFIRTH DIVISION,
Henry Joseph Wilson.BARNESLEY DIVISION,
Earl Compton.HALLAMSHIRE DIVISION,
Sir Frederick Thorpe Mappin, bt.

List of

{COMMONS, 1892}

*Members.*YORK—cont.

ROOTHERHAM DIVISION,

■ Arthur Herbert Dyke Acland.

DONCASTER DIVISION,

Hon. W. Henry W. Fitzwilliam.

West Riding, Eastern Part,

RIPON DIVISION,

John Lloyd Wharton.

OTLEY DIVISION,

John Barran.

BARKSTON ASH DIVISION,

Colonel Robert Gunter.

OSGOLDCROSS DIVISION,

John Austin.

PUDSEY DIVISION,

Briggs Priestley.

SPEN VALLEY DIVISION,

Joseph Woodhead.

BRADFORD BOROUGH,

West Division,

Alfred Illingworth.

Central Division,

Right Hon. John George Shaw Lefevre.

East Division,

Henry Byron Reed.

DEWSBURY BOROUGH,

Mark Oldroyd.

HALIFAX BOROUGH.

Thomas Shaw,

Rt. Hon. James Stansfeld.

HUDDERSFIELD BOROUGH,

William Summers.

KINGSTON-UPON-HULL BOROUGH,

East Division,

Frederick Brent Grotian.

Central Division,

Henry Seymour King.

West Division,

Charles Henry Wilson.

LEEDS BOROUGH.

North Division,

Right Hon. William Lawies Jackson.

YORK—cont.

Central Division,

Gerald William Balfour.

East Division,

John Lawrence Gane.

West Division,

Herbert John Gladstone.

South Division,

Rt. Hon. Sir Lyon Playfair, K.C.B.

MIDDLESBROUGH BOROUGH.

Isaac Wilson.

PONTEFRACT BOROUGH.

Hon. Rowland Winn.

SCARBOROUGH BOROUGH.

Joshua Rowntree.

SHEFFIELD BOROUGH.

Attercliffe Division,

Hon. Bernard John Seymour Coleridge.

Brightside Division,

Rt. Hon. Anthony John Mundella.

Central Division,

Colonel Charles Edward Howard Vincent, C.B.

Hallam Division,

Charles Beilby Stuart-Wortley.

Ecclesall Division,

Ellis Ashmead-Bartlett.

WAKEFIELD BOROUGH.

Sir Edward Green, bt.

YORK BOROUGH.

Alfred Edward Pease.

Frank Lockwood.

W A L E S .

ANGLESEA.

Thomas P. Lewis.

BRECKNOCK.

William Fuller Maitland.

CARDIGAN.

William Bowen Rowlands.

List of	COMMONS, 1892}	Members.
CARMARTHEN.
EASTERN DIVISION,
Abel Thomas.		SWANSEA BOROUGH.
WESTERN DIVISION,		Swansea, Town,
John Lloyd Morgan.		Lewis Llewelyn Dillwyn.
CARMARTHEN BOROUGH.
Sir Emile Algernon Arthur Keppel		Swansea, District,
Stepney-Cowell, bt.		Sir Henry Hussey Vivian, bt.
CARNARVON.
SOUTHERN OR EIFION DIVISION,		MERIONETH.
John Bryn Roberts.		Thomas Edward Ellis.
NORTHERN OR ARFON DIVISION,
William Rathbone.		MONTGOMERY.
CARNARVON BOROUGH.		Stuart Rendel.
David Lloyd-George.		MONTGOMERY BOROUGH.
DENBIGH.		Hon. Frederick Stephen Archibald Han-
EASTERN DIVISION,		bury-Tracy.
Rt. Hon. George Osborne Morgan.
WESTERN DIVISION,		PEMBROKE.
Colonel William Cornwallis West.		William Davies.
DENBIGH BOROUGH.		PEMBROKE AND HAVERFORDWES'
Hon. George Thomas Kenyon.		BOROUGH.
FLINT.		Adm. Richard Charles Mayne, C.B.
Samuel Smith.
FLINT BOROUGH.		RADNOR.
John Roberts.		Hon. Arthur Henry John Walsh.
GLAMORGAN.
EASTERN DIVISION,		SCOTLAND.
Alfred Thomas.
RHONDDA DIVISION,		ABERDEEN.
William Abraham.		EASTERN DIVISION,
WESTERN or GOWER DIVISION,		Peter Esslemont.
David Randell.
MID DIVISION,		WESTERN DIVISION,
Samuel Thomas Evans.		Robert Farquharson, M.D.
SOUTHERN DIVISION,
Arthur John Williams.		ABERDEEN BURGH.
CARDIFF BOROUGH.		North Division,
Sir Edward James Reed, K.C.B.		William Alexander Hunter.
MERTHYR TYDVIL BOROUGH.		South Division,
David Alfred Thomas.		James Bryce.
W. Pritchard Morgan.
		ARGYLL.
		Colonel John Wingfield Malcolm.
		AYR.
		NORTHERN DIVISION,
		Hon. Hugh Frederick Hislop Elliot.
		SOUTHERN DIVISION,
		Hon. Greville Richard Vernon.
		AYR DISTRICT OF BURGHS.
		James Somervell.
		KILMARNOCK DISTRICT OF BURGHS
		Stephen Williamson.

List of	{COMMONS, 1892}	Members.
BANFF.		FIFE.
Robert William Duff.		EASTERN DIVISION,
BERWICK.		Herbert Henry Asquith.
Right Hon. Edward Marjoribanks.		WESTERN DIVISION,
BUTE.		Augustine Birrell.
Andrew Graham Murray.		KIRKCALDY DISTRICT OF BURGHS.
CAITHNESS.		Sir George Campbell, kt., K.G.S.I.
Gavin Brown Clark.		ST. ANDREW'S DISTRICT OF BURGHS.
WICK DISTRICT OF BURGHS.		Henry Torrens Anstruther.
John Macdonald Cameron.		FORFAR.
CLACKMANNAN AND KINROSS.		James William Barclay.
Rt. Hon. John Blair Balfour.		DUNDEE BURGH.
DUMBARTON.		Edmund Robertson.
Sir Archibald Orr Ewing, bt.		John Leng.
DUMFRIES.		MONTROSE DISTRICT OF BURGHS.
Sir Robert Jardine, bt.		John Shiress Will.
DUMFRIES DISTRICT OF BURGHS.		HADDINGTON.
Robert Threshie Reid.		Richard Burdon Haldane.
EDINBURGH (MID LoTHIAN).		INVERNESS.
Rt. Hon. William Ewart Gladstone.		Charles Fraser-Mackintosh.
EDINBURGH BURGH.		INVERNESS DISTRICT OF BURGHS.
East Division,		Robert Bannatyne Finlay.
Robert Wallace.		KINCARDINE.
West Division,		General Sir George Balfour, K.C.B.
Thomas Ryburn Buchanan.		KIRKCUDBRIGHT.
Central Division,		Mark John Stewart.
William McEwan.		LANARK.
South Division,		GOVAN DIVISION,
Rt. Hon. Hugh Culling Eardley Childers.		John Wilson.
EDINBURGH AND ST. ANDREW'S UNIVERSITIES.		PARTICK DIVISION,
Sir Charles John Pearson, kt.		James Parker Smith.
LEITH DISTRICT OF BURGHS.		NORTH-WESTERN DIVISION,
Ronal Crawford Munro Ferguson.		Robert Bontine Cunningham Graham.
ELGIN AND NAIRN.		NORTH-EASTERN DIVISION,
John Seymour Keay.		Donald Crawford.
ELGIN DISTRICT OF BURGHS.		MID-DIVISION,
Alexander Asher.		John Wynford Philipps.
		SOUTHERN DIVISION,
		James Henry Cecil Hozier.

. List of

{COMMONS, 1892}

Members.

LANARK—cont.

GLASGOW BURGH.

Bridgeton Division,

Rt. Hon. Sir George Otto Trevelyan, bt.
Camlachie Division,

Hugh Watt.

St. Rollox Division.

James Caldwell.

Central Division,

John George Alexander Baird.

College Division.

Charles Cameron, M.D., LL.D.

Tradeston Division,

Archibald Cameron Corbett.

Blackfriars and Hutchesontown Division,
Andrew Dryburgh Provand.

GLASGOW AND ABERDEEN UNIVERSITIES.

James Alexander Campbell, LL.D.

LINLITHGOW.

Peter McLagan.

ORKNEY AND SHETLAND.
Leonard Lyell.

PEEBLES AND SELKIRK.
Walter Thorburn.

PERTH.

EASTERN DIVISION,
Sir John George Smyth Kinloch, bt.

WESTERN DIVISION,
Sir Donald Currie, K.C.M.G.

PERTH BURGH.
Charles Stuart Parker.

RENFREW.

EASTERN DIVISION,
Michael Hugh Shaw-Stewart.

WESTERN DIVISION,
Sir Archibald Campbell Campbell, bt.

GREENOCK BURGH.
Sir Thomas Sutherland.

PAISLEY BURGH.
William Dunn.

ROSS AND CROMARTY.

Dr. Roderick M'Donald.

ROXBURGH.

Hon. Arthur Ralph Douglas Elliot.

HAWICK DISTRICT OF BURGHS.

Alexander Laing Brown.

STIRLING.

Joseph Cheney Bolton.

FALKIRK DISTRICT OF BURGHS.

William Pirrie Sinclair.

STIRLING DISTRICT OF BURGHS.

Right Hon. Henry Campbell-Bannerman.

SUTHERLAND.

Angus Sutherland.

WIGTON.

Sir Herbert Eustace Maxwell, bt.

---

I R E L A N D .

---

ANTRIM.

NORTH ANTRIM DIVISION,
Sir Charles Edward Lewis, bt.

MID ANTRIM DIVISION,
Hon. Robert Torrens O'Neill.

EAST ANTRIM DIVISION,
Captain James Martin M'Calmont.

SOUTH ANTRIM DIVISION,
William Grey Ellison Macartney.

BELFAST BOROUGH.

North Belfast Division,
Sir Edward James Harland, bt.

East Belfast Division
Edward Samuel Wesley De Cobain.

South Belfast Division,
William Johnston.

West Belfast Division
Thomas Sexton.

List of

{COMMONS, 1892}

Members.

ARMAGH.

NORTH ARMAGH DIVISION,
1 Edward James Saunderson.

MID ARMAGH DIVISION,
ar Plunket Barton.

SOUTH ARMAGH DIVISION,
nder Blane.

CARLOW.

Hammond.

CAVAN.

WEST CAVAN DIVISION,
nd Francis Vesey Knox.

EAST CAVAN DIVISION. is O'Hanlon.

CLARE.

EAST CLARE DIVISION,
1 Richard Cox.

WEST CLARE DIVISION,
iah Jordan.

CORK.

NORTH CORK DIVISION,
Christopher Flynn.

NORTH-EAST CORK DIVISION,
m O'Brien.

MID CORK DIVISION,
arles Kearns Deane Tanner.

EAST CORK DIVISION,
m John Lane.

WEST CORK DIVISION,
Gilhooley.

SOUTH CORK DIVISION,
1 Edward Kenny.

SOUTH-EAST CORK DIVISION, Morrogh.

CORK CITY.
1 Flavin.
ce Healy.

DONEGAL.

NORTH DONEGAL DIVISION,
James Rochfort Maguire.

WEST DONEGAL DIVISION,
James Joseph Dalton.

EAST DONEGAL DIVISION,
Arthur O'Connor.

SOUTH DONEGAL DIVISION,
John Gordon Swift Mac Neill.

DOWN.

NORTH DOWN DIVISION,
Colonel Thomas Waring.

EAST DOWN DIVISION,
James Alexander Rentoul, LL.D.
Patrick M'Dermott.

WEST DOWN DIVISION,
Right Hon. Lord Arthur Hill.

SOUTH DOWN DIVISION,
Michael McCartan.

NEWRY BOROUGH.
Justin Huntly McCarthy.

DUBLIN.

NORTH DUBLIN DIVISION,
John Joseph Clancy, M.A.

SOUTH DUBLIN DIVISION,
Sir Thomas Henry Grattan Esmonde, bt.

DUBLIN CITY.

College Green Division,
Timothy Daniel Sullivan.

Dublin Harbour Division,
Timothy Charles Harrington.

St. Stephen's Green Division,
Thomas Alexander Dickson.

St. Patrick's Division,
William Martin Murphy.

DUBLIN UNIVERSITY.
Rt. Hon. David Robert Plunket, LL.D.
Rt. Hon. Dodgson Hamilton Madden.

FERMANAGH.

NORTH FERMANAGH DIVISION,
William Hoey Kearney Redmond.

SOUTH FERMANAGH DIVISION,
Henry Campbell.

List of

{COMMONS, 1892}

*Members.GALWAY.

CONNEMARA DIVISION,

Patrick James Foley.

NORTH GALWAY DIVISION,
Colonel John Philip Nolan.EAST GALWAY DIVISION, John Roche.SOUTH GALWAY DIVISION,
David Sheehy.GALWAY TOWN.
John Pinkerton.KERRY.NORTH KERRY DIVISION,
John Stack.WEST KERRY DIVISION,
Edward Harrington.SOUTH KERRY DIVISION,
Denis Kilbride.EAST KERRY DIVISION
Jeremiah Daniel Sheehan.KILDARE.NORTH KILDARE DIVISION
James Laurence Carew.SOUTH KILDARE DIVISION,
James Leahy.KILKENNY.NORTH KILKENNY DIVISION,
Patrick M'Dermott.SOUTH KILKENNY DIVISION,
Patrick Alexander Chance.KILKENNY CITY.
Thomas Quinn.KING'S COUNTY.BIRR DIVISION,
Bernard Charles Molloy.TULLAMORE DIVISION,
Dr. Joseph Francis Fox.LEITRIM.NORTH LEITRIM DIVISION, Michael Conway.SOUTH LEITRIM DIVISION,
Luke Patrick Hayden.LIMERICK.WEST LIMERICK DIVISION, William Abraham.EAST LIMERICK DIVISION,
John Finucane.LIMERICK CITY.
Francis A. O'Keeffe.LONDONDERRY.NORTH DERRY DIVISION, Henry Lyle Mulholland.SOUTH DERRY DIVISION,
Thomas Lea.LONDONDERRY CITY.
Justin M'Carthy.LONGFORD.NORTH LONGFORD DIVISION,
Timothy Michael Healy.SOUTH LONGFORD DIVISION,
James G. Fitzgerald.LOUTH.NORTH LOUTH DIVISION,
Joseph Nolan.SOUTH LOUTH DIVISION,
Thomas Patrick Gill.MAYO.NORTH MAYO DIVISION, Daniel Crilly.WEST MAYO DIVISION,
John Deasy.EAST MAYO DIVISION,
John Dillon.SOUTH MAYO DIVISION,
James Frederick Xavier O'Brien.MEATH.NORTH MEATH DIVISION, Pierce Mahony.SOUTH MEATH DIVISION,
Edward Sheil.

List of

{COMMONS, 1892}

Members.

MONAGHAN.

NORTH MONAGHAN DIVISION,
Patrick O'Brien.SOUTH MONAGHAN DIVISION,
Sir Joseph Neal M'Kenna, kt.

QUEEN'S COUNTY.

OSSORY DIVISION,
William Archibald Macdonald.LEIX DIVISION,
Richard Lalor.

ROSCOMMON.

NORTH ROSCOMMON DIVISION,
James J. O'Kelly.SOUTH ROSCOMMON DIVISION,
Andrew Commins, LL.D.

SLIGO.

NORTH SLIGO DIVISION,
Bernard Collery.SOUTH SLIGO DIVISION,
Edmund Leamy.

TIPPERARY.

NORTH TIPPERARY DIVISION,
Patrick Joseph O'Brien.MID TIPPERARY DIVISION,
Henry Harrison.SOUTH TIPPERARY DIVISION,
John O'Connor.EAST TIPPERARY DIVISION,
Thomas Joseph Condon.

TYRONE.

NORTH TYRONE DIVISION,
Lord Ernest W. Hamilton.TYRONE—*cont.*MID TYRONE DIVISION, Matthew Joseph Kenny.EAST TYRONE DIVISION,
William James Reynolds.SOUTH TYRONE DIVISION,
Thomas Wallace Russell.

WATERFORD.

WEST WATERFORD DIVISION,
Alfred Webb.EAST WATERFORD DIVISION,
Patrick Joseph Power.WATERFORD CITY.
John Edward Redmond.

WESTMEATH.

NORTH WESTMEATH DIVISION,
James Tuite.SOUTH WESTMEATH DIVISION,
Donald Sullivan.

WEXFORD.

NORTH WEXFORD DIVISION, (Vacant.)SOUTH WEXFORD DIVISION,
John Barry.

WICKLOW.

WEST WICKLOW DIVISION,
Garrett Michael Byrne.EAST WICKLOW DIVISION,
William Joseph Corbet.

REUTER'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

IN THE

SEVENTH SESSION OF THE TWENTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND APPOINTED TO MEET 5 AUGUST, 1886, IN THE FIFTIETH YEAR OF THE REIGN OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

---

FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1892.

---

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 9th February, 1892.

THE PARLIAMENT, which had been prorogued successively from Wednesday the 5th day of August, 1891, to Tuesday the 20th day of October, 1891, thence to Thursday, the 10th day of December, 1891, and thence to Tuesday the 9th day of February, 1892, met this day for the despatch of business.

The Session was opened by Commission.

The HOUSE of PEERS being met,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House,

"That Her Majesty, not thinking it fit to be present here this day, has been pleased to cause a Commission to be issued under the Great Seal, in order to the opening and holding of this Parliament."

Then Five of the LORDS COMMIS-SIONERS—namely, the LORD CHANCEL-OR.
VOL. I. [NEW SERIES.]

LOR, the Duke of PORTLAND, the Earl of COVENTRY, the Earl of MOUNT-EDGCUMBE, and the Viscount CROSS—being in their robes and seated on a form placed between the Throne and the Woolsack—commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to let the COMMONS know,

"The Lords Commissioners desire their immediate attendance in this House to hear the Commission read."

Who being at the Bar, with their Speaker:—The Commission was read by the Clerk:—Then

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR delivered HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH to both Houses of Parliament as follows:—

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

"I am persuaded that you have deeply participated in the terrible sorrow which has afflicted me and my family in the loss, at the moment when the prospects of his life appeared the happiest, of my dearly beloved Grandson, Prince Albert Victor, Duke of Clarence and Avondale. It has been a solace to us in our grief to have received from all classes and conditions of my subjects, from all parts of my Empire, as well as from all foreign countries, the most touching assurances of their deep sympathy under this grievous affliction, and the expression of their affectionate regard and appreciation for the dear young Prince whom they have lost by this great calamity.

My relations with other Powers continue to be friendly. I have lost in the Viceroy of Egypt a loyal ally, whose wise government had, in the space of a few years, largely contributed to restore prosperity and peace to his country.

I have an entire confidence that the same sagacious policy will be followed by his son, who has been named as his successor, in accordance with previous Firmans, by His Imperial Majesty the Sultan.

An Agreement has been concluded with the United States, defining the mode in which the disputes as to seal fisheries in Behring's Sea shall be referred to arbitration.

Zanzibar has been established as a free port by his Highness the Sultan, with my concurrence. I trust that this measure will conduce both to the development of the Sultan's dominions and to the promotion of British commerce on the East African Coast.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

The Estimates for the Public Service of the ensuing year will be laid before you. They have been prepared with a due regard to financial economy.

My Lords, and Gentlemen,

Proposals will be laid before you for applying to Ireland the general principles affecting Local Government, which have already been adopted in Great Britain; and I trust that it may be possible to consider the provisions as to English Local Government which, for want of time, it was necessary to omit from the former Bill.

A measure for increasing the number of small holdings of land in agricultural districts in Great Britain will be submitted for your approval.

You will be asked to consider a Bill for extending the advantages of Assisted Education to Ireland, and for other purposes connected with Elementary Education in that country.

A scheme for modifying the existing system of procedure on Private Bills, so far as it affects Scotland and Ireland, will be brought before you.

A measure will be introduced for the improvement of the Legislative Councils in India.

A Bill will be laid before you for relieving Public Elementary Schools in England from the present pressure of local rates.

Proposals for improving the discipline of the Established Church in regard to moral offences; for enabling accused persons to be examined on their trial; for revising the existing Agreements between the Government and the Bank of England; and for amending the Law with respect to the liability of employers for injuries incurred in their employment, will also be commended to your attention.

I pray that Almighty God may guide you in the performance of your weighty functions.

Then the Commons withdrew.

House adjourned during pleasure..

House resumed.

PRAYERS.

ROLL OF THE LORDS.

Garter King of Arms attending, delivered at the Table (in the usual manner) a List of the Lords Temporal in the Seventh Session of the Twenty-fourth Parliament of the United Kingdom: The same was ordered to lie on the Table.

REPRESENTATIVE PEER FOR IRELAND.

Writs and Returns electing the Lord Dunalley a Representative Peer for Ireland in the room of the late Earl of Wicklow, deceased, with the Certificate of the Clerk of the Crown in Ireland annexed thereto: delivered (on oath), and Certificate read.

REPRESENTATIVE PEERS FOR SCOTLAND.

The Clerk of the Parliaments delivered a certificate of the Clerk of the Crown that the Earl of Leven and Melville had been elected a Representative Peer for Scotland in the room of the Earl of Northesk: Certificate read.

The Lord Chancellor acquainted the House that the Clerk of the Parliaments had received (by post) from the Lord Clerk Register of Scotland,

Minutes of the election of the Earl of Leven and Melville as one of the sixteen Peers of Scotland, 10th December last, in room of George John Earl of Northesk, deceased; and

Separate Return by the Lord Clerk Register of certain Titles of Peerage called at the said election, in right of which respectively no vote had been received and counted at any election for fifty years then last past (pursuant to Act 14th and 15th Vict., chap. 87.):

Ordered that the said Minutes of Election, &c. be printed. (No. 1.)

SAT FIRST IN PARLIAMENT.

The Earl of Dartmouth—After the death of his father.

The Duke of Devonshire, after the death of his father.

The Lord Cheylesmore, after the death of his father.

Several Lords took the oath.

William Dalrymple, Lord Archbishop of York, was (in the usual manner) introduced.

Francis John, Lord Bishop of Chester was (in the usual manner) introduced.

Alfred George, Lord Bishop of St. Asaph, was (in the usual manner) introduced.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.
ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

The Queen's Speech reported by the LORD CHANCELLOR.

THE EARL OF DUDLEY (who wore the uniform of the Worcestershire Yeomanry) in moving an Address of Thanks in reply to Her Majesty's Gracious Speech, said: My Lords, in rising to move the Address in answer to Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech from the Throne, I would plead with your Lordships for a full measure of that indulgence which is usually accorded to those who address this House for the first time. I will not detain you for a longer time than I can help, but will endeavour to carry out as quickly and as concisely as possible the duty that I now have the honour to perform. My Lords, before dealing directly with the political subjects touched upon in Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech, I feel that I must give expression to the sentiment that I am sure is uppermost in the mind of every member of this august Assembly; a sentiment which appeals to me the more strongly from the fact that it was my father who had the honour of moving the Address in this House the year that their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales were married. For we meet today, my Lords, under circumstances of very exceptional sorrow and solemnity. An event, which for tragic pathos stands unrivalled in the recorded annals of this country, has taken place during the last month; no adjunct is wanting to complete the mournfulness of the picture. One whom we looked on as the future Ruler of this Empire has been cut off in the opening of a life full of the brightest promise: on the very eve of his marriage—a marriage which seemed destined to crown his happiness, and to complete his opportunities for public influence and usefulness. It is not too much to say that the struggle between life and death has been watched with the most intense interest by every subject of Her Majesty—indeed, by the whole civilized world. Nor is it any exaggeration to add that the sad history of that struggle has cast a gloom over public and private life in this country ; that it has brought home to us in a most strongly marked form the grave possibilities by which every human undertaking has to be qualified ; and that, under the shadow of this national calamity, the energy of political movement, and the acrimony of Party difference has been mitigated for the time ; while all alike have joined in no mere formal expression of sympathy and commiseration with those who have to mourn not only a public catastrophe, but a domestic bereavement of a most heartrending character. And though, my Lords, such sympathy can, unfortunately, but to a small extent alleviate the grief which has fallen so heavily upon our Royal House, yet it has furnished, in a way which perhaps less tragic circumstances could not have done, an additional and unmistakeable token of the loyalty and devotion that unites our Rulers to the hearts and affections of their people. This spontaneous outburst of condolence and commiseration is but an illustration of the general recognition that our monarchical institutions are interwoven in the very texture of our national life : that the interests of Sovereign and subject are identical : and that what seriously affects the one cannot but be of vital importance to the other. Turning now, my Lords, to the political subjects dealt with in Her Majesty's Speech, we are pleased to note that the relations of this country with Foreign Powers continue to be of a friendly character. The foreign policy of this country is one that can never lack interest or significance. We have dependencies in most parts of the world, and our connection with them, as well as our wide-spread trade, bring us into relation with a far more extensive range of rights and responsibilities than is the case with any other nation ; and it is a matter of sincere congratulation that the many difficulties and complications which must necessarily arise in the maintenance of those rights, and in the discharge of those responsibilities, continue to be arranged by peaceful and diplomatic methods. The firm and consistent policy of the present Government with regard to Egypt, notwithstanding the many difficulties it has had to overcome, and notwithstanding the many criticisms that it has aroused in some quarters, continues to bear nothing but good results. The internal disturbances of that country have gradually subsided ; tranquillity is still maintained ; a settled order of things has been established ; and any feeling of hostility towards our troops quartered there has now entirely disappeared. Our continued occupation of the country has been made the more necessary through the death of the Khedive and the succession of his son to the Throne. The late Khedive was undoubtedly a man of great power and ability, and his hearty and intelligent co-operation in all our efforts for the establishment of peace and order have had no doubt much to do with the success of those efforts. But, my Lords, not only in Egypt but elsewhere the extension of our trade and colonisation must necessarily cause many small frictions in places where our interests seem to come into collision with those of other States ; and I hope that it will not be considered presumptuous on my part if I say that it is owing, to a great extent, to the abilities of one, who, as Foreign Minister, has been rarely equalled and never surpassed, that those frictions have been removed and a good understanding re-established. The peaceful condition of our external affairs has given the time and opportunity necessary for carrying out many useful measures of home legislation—an opportunity which Her Majesty's Government has made full use of during the last year ; and it is satisfactory for us now to hear that their efforts in this respect will be continued during the coming Session. The affairs of Ireland have occupied a considerable proportion of the attention of our legislators during the last few years, and Her Majesty now informs us that it is proposed to complete the edifice of social and political amelioration by two very important additions. The first of these is a measure for the advancement of education. The fact that the standard of education in Ireland is much below what it is in this country proves that such a measure is not unnecessary—proves the justice both of the demand that the people of Ireland should be given equal opportunities of gaining useful knowledge, and of preparing themselves for their vocations in life; and it is also a matter of importance that they should not, in educating their children, be called upon to make any larger sacrifices in such respects than the inhabitants of England or Scotland. Her Majesty's Irish subjects are by no means wanting in intelligence; they are certainly on an intellectual equality with the people of any other part of the British Isles; but the fact that so large a proportion of the electorate now vote as illiterate, points most strongly to the conclusion that it is their present deficiency in knowledge and information which renders them, hot-headed and excitable as they are by nature, easily liable to be imposed upon and incited to crime by the numerous mischievous agitators who have of late exercised so evil an influence. The second matter with which Her Majesty's Government proposes to deal is that of local government. The desirability of extending the principles of the Local Government Act of 1888 to Ireland is a subject which has caused much discussion, and one on which opinion is by no means even yet unanimous; it must be borne in mind, however, that, until some such extension has been effected, the programme which the present Government laid before the country at the last general election will be incomplete, and a promise very definitely made at the time will be unredeemed. Up to a very short time ago, however, law and order in Ireland were not in a state such as to justify a prudent Government in making any extension of power to the people of that country for the management of their home affairs; and it is now a matter of great satisfaction to us to learn that, in the opinion of those who are responsible for the granting or withholding of such a measure, the time has now arrived when they deem it fit to give the Irish people local powers similar to, if not identical with, those at present possessed by the English counties. That the subject is one which is surrounded by considerable difficulty will be generally admitted, and no measure of this kind is likely to be approved which does not safeguard the rights of the minority, or which does not provide adequate guarantees against the abuse of such powers for the purpose of political agitation. How such objects can best be attained will probably form one of the chief elements of the discussion on the measure; but that they can be attained admits of no reasonable doubt. And, at all events, it would be quite possible to retain the right of dissolving any particular Council that went beyond the discharge of its legitimate functions. And, my Lords, the very fact that such a measure would more completely assimilate the institutions of two closely connected parts of the same nation, gives ground for hope that it would do much to remove any sense of grievance that might now be felt by our Irish fellow-countrymen. Her Majesty also informs us that a Bill for facilitating the process of private Bill legislation for Scotland and Ireland will occupy the attention of Parliament. As the noble Lord who seconds this Address hails from the former country, he will be far more capable of laying the points connected with the Bill before your Lordships than I am; and I would merely say that the aim of such a measure must be to fulfil this primary object, of making it more easy to legislate upon matters of local importance by relieving to some extent the stress of business in Parliament—not depriving that body of any of the rights which it at present possesses. Another subject of very great importance that Her Majesty informs us will be dealt with during the coming Session is that of small holdings. Much is being said, my Lords, about the present state of the rural districts, and statements are being made from time to time with regard to them which would seem to imply that those districts are surely and steadily becoming depopulated: that their inhabitants are gradually betaking themselves from them and migrating to the towns. Such statements, however, contain large elements of exaggeration. As a matter of fact, our rural districts are not becoming depopulated. The population there indeed is not increasing, but neither is it diminishing; it is rather in a stationary state; and it is only the natural surplus that is seeking for employment elsewhere. The preliminary Report of the Census in April last conclusively proves this; for it shows that, so far from the population of the rural districts decreasing, it has increased by over 3 per cent. during the last decade; and, although this is much below the rate of increase in the town districts during the same period, it is satisfactory to note that it is considerably higher than what it was in the ten years between 1871 and 1881. Still, though such statements are exaggerated, they are relative to a real evil, and one which cannot but cause great anxiety. There is no doubt that farmers find it increasingly difficult to get labour, and that this difficulty is mainly due to the fact that among those who migrate from the country to the towns a large proportion is composed of the stronger and more energetic young men, who naturally would expect to find employment in the districts in which they have been brought up. Such a state of things in the present depressed state of agriculture is very serious; for, owing to foreign competition and other causes, agricultural products are already so heavily handicapped that, if additional obstacles are thrown in their way, there is a danger of the less fertile parts of the country going out of cultivation altogether. Nor is this a subject which concerns agriculture alone; but it is one of great national importance as well; for the concentration of large masses of our population in the principal towns cannot but have an injurious effect upon its general physique, owing to the less healthy conditions of life there. It is then as a contribution to the solution of this very difficult problem that the proposed measure is especially to be welcomed; for, although many causes contribute to the restlessness which leads so many of our agricultural labourers to seek for employment elsewhere—for instance, the greater facilities for travelling afforded by the extension of our railway communication, and the craving for increased interests and excitements engendered by the advance of education—one cause undoubtedly is the fact that the conditions of their life in the country do not provide sufficient objects or prospects of ambition. However industrious or capable an agricultural labourer may be, he is not likely, under ordinary circumstances, to rise above the social grade in which he was born; and, as his wages are hardly more than sufficient for bare subsistence, he has nothing to look forward to in his old age but dependence on his friends, or on parochial relief. Such a state of things is naturally galling; and if by a measure of this kind a prospect is opened up to the better class of agricultural labourer of securing an independent and improved livelihood, an important step will have been taken towards keeping him attached to the soil. It may be objected, indeed, that if our large farmers, with all the advantages of capital and labour-saving machinery, find it difficult, even in the present state of things, to make ends meet, it will be doubly difficult for those who are without such advantages. But the fact must be taken into consideration that a man will bestow double the energy and patience on work that is done for his own immediate benefit that he will on that which he is paid to do for another; and it is possible that the wish to obtain that comfort and independence will supply a stimulus to extra exertion, such as will overcome the difficulties which he has to encounter. At any rate, there seems to be a wide-spread feeling amongst the agricultural classes themselves that such success is possible; and the good results that would ensue, if this prove to be the case, are sufficient justification for making an attempt in this direction—an attempt made the more easy because the large amount of land, easily available for purposes of such a kind, does away with the difficult subject of forced sale within the scope of its operation. In connection with this subject of labour, my Lords, there is a suggestion which, with all diffidence, I should like to make. Would it not be possible to utilize Irish labour for agricultural purposes more largely than is at present the case? In some parts of England, easily accessible from Ireland, a great proportion of farm work, during a part of the year, is done, and excellently well done, by Irish labourers, who cross the Channel for that purpose, and then return home again. Would it not be possible to extend this system more widely, and, by means of agents in Holyhead or Dublin, to engage labour for those parts of the country where the need of it is most keenly felt? There is, I believe, a considerable amount of Irish labour available for such a purpose, much more than is at present made use of; and it might be worth while considering whether there are any insuperable obstacles in the way of supplying, in such a manner, at any rate some small portion of our present deficiency. My Lords, nothing remains for me now but to express to you my most sincere gratitude for the kind and patient way in which you have listened to me this afternoon. If I have not entered at greater length into some of the subjects dealt with in Her Majesty's Speech, my excuse must be that I have endeavoured to avoid wearying this House by a reiteration of matter already well known to your Lordships—indeed, some of the subjects need no comment to emphasize their importance. I now, my Lords, beg to move the Motion which stands in my name.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as followeth :—

Most Gracious Sovereign,—

We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the gracious speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

We take this first opportunity of offering to Your Majesty our sincere condolence in the affliction dispensation of Providence with which Your Majesty and this Nation has been visited in the death of His Royal Highness Prince Albert Victor Duke of Clarence and Avondale.

We assure your Majesty of our most heartfelt participation in the universal feeling of sympathy with Your Majesty and Your Majesty's family under this grievous affliction, and in the deep sense entertained by all classes of Your Majesty's subjects of the calamity which this Country has sustained by the loss of a Prince who had won for himself the general affection and regard of Your Majesty's subjects."—(The Earl of Dudley.)

*LORD LAMINGTON (who wore the uniform of the Lanarkshire Yeomanry) said: My Lords, on rising to second the Address to the Throne, proposed by the noble Earl, I have to ask you to extend to me your utmost forbearance. I would first of all pray to be allowed to join the noble Lord in the tribute of homage which he has paid to the memory of a Prince who, by the blamelessness of his life and the pathos of his death, has established for himself a personality in the pages of English history, and a throne in every English heart. Born, as he was, in a position which gave him all the world for his critic, all posterity for his audience, it was a subject of deep thankfulness to the Nation that he should have so aptly learnt the lessons of life taught him by his illustrious parents, and, above all, that he should have responded so fully to those hopes and affections which Her Majesty has lately told us she had centred in him. Many may have thought that at such a moment any outward expression of their sympathy was almost an impertinence; but Her Majesty, in that gracious letter so full of womanly tenderness, has allayed all such fears by telling her faithful people how deeply she felt the throb of grief which stirred to its depths the heart of her Empire. My Lords, there is one figure supremely present in our national sorrow: that of the young Princess whom this month the Duke of Clarence would have made his wife. Upon sorrow such as hers we dare not intrude, except to assure her that the joy with which we regarded her betrothal is only equalled by the sympathy which we would offer her. My Lords, Her Majesty has given us in the Speech the satisfactory assurance that her relations with foreign Powers continue on the same friendly footing on which they have been established by Her Majesty's Government. As the noble Earl has well said, it is indeed a matter for congratulation that our policy abroad is directed by so masterly a hand, that not only have many difficulties been overcome, but no fresh complications have been permitted to arise. The death of Tewfik Pasha, Khedive of Egypt, a loyal ally of England and a faithful ruler of his people, is an event that we all deplore. Since his accession to power he had rendered to his country the inestimable benefits of the reduction of taxation, the protection of the fellahs, and the development of its splendid natural resources. For these objects he had worked in the most perfect harmony with England, and there was, therefore, reasonable ground for anxiety lest his death should check the remarkable increase of prosperity which no observer has failed to recognize and appreciate. Happily, however, his son and successor Abbas has inaugurated his reign by declaring at the first meeting of the Legislative Council that his highest wish is to further the good work begun by his father. Not very long ago our neighbours across the Channel were encouraged to believe that our friendly interest in Egypt was about to cease; but the proposers of this course of action speedily ascertained that their suggestions were not acceptable, even to their own partisans, and now it is eminently satisfactory to note that at this moment the general consensus of opinion is practically unanimous in approving the views of Her Majesty's Government. When the French refused to co-operate in crushing the rebellion of Arabi they lost all claim to object to our remaining to assist in the regeneration of the country, as has been frankly owned to by French statesmen, and by M. Jules Ferry in particular. The interests of the Sultan of Turkey are alone materially concerned, and we have every reason to believe that His Imperial Highness not merely acquiesces in, but welcomes the continuance of our influence in Egypt, as both productive of unexampled benefit to the country and also as a safeguard to his own suzerainty. We have received with pleasure the intelligence that Zanzibar has taken its place amongst the free ports of the world. In all probability it will now attract to itself the bulk of the East African trade, and may rival in time to come even Singapore or Hong Kong as one of the great distributors of the world's commerce. My Lords, last Session I ventured to draw your attention to a more remote part of the world, the kingdom of Siam. My apprehensions then stated, if they have not been fully borne out by subsequent events (for I have not certain information on the point), have at least been recently justified by the declaration of M. Ribot, in the French Chamber, that the French claimed all territory east of the Mekong River. It would take too long for me to discuss now these pretensions, so far as they affect the Siamese possessions on the lower portion of the Mekong; but I am anxious to point out, in all brevity, their importance with regard to the upper waters of that river. And please believe, my Lords, that I venture to do this, not in the slightest because I have personally visited this region, but because I know that the future of Indo-China is a matter of paramount interest to all Europeans there settled, and to many in our commercial circles at home. At present the eastern frontier of Burma rests on the Mekong; but there is a small State adjacent, the greater part of which lies on the eastern or left bank of that river. That State, by our conquest in the last Burmese War, became by rights tributary to us, and the chief and his people are most desirous of coming under British suzerainty. But the Indian Government, with commendable caution, hesitated to extend their responsibility over a country distant by a journey of several weeks from their nearest post, and which, till just about this day last year, had never been visited by an European. But if we were to give this State the benefit of our protection (which in no way could be construed into an act of aggression) two material advantages would result. First of all, in place of having a river boundary, which is always liable to be a fruitful source of dissension, a chain of mountains, passable only at perhaps two points, would form the line of demarcation, excluding for the future any likely risk of trouble or friction. Secondly, our presence on the east bank of the Mekong would afford a moral support to the northern States of Siam. My Lords, I have put the case with extreme brevity, and, I fear, not very graphically; nor have I argued it in all its bearings; but I trust that by inviting your Lordships' attention to the matter, the Government may consider favourably the suggestion I have had the honour to submit. I would now remind your Lordships of the Indian Councils Bill, to which you will again be asked to give your approval.

As your Lordships will remember, this Bill proposes to give power to the Viceroy of India to increase the numbers of the Legislative and Provincial Councils, and also to regulate the conditions for the nomination of members to the Council; it proposes to give to the Legislative Council the right to discuss questions of finance which, at present, they only possess under special circumstances; and it further gives to the Council the privilege of interpellation to the Government of India, subject to the restraining authority of the Viceroy. It is to be earnestly hoped that this Session those who have the conduct of business in another place will take care that this measure becomes law, as it has been long and carefully considered by the Indian Government, who are most desirous that Her Majesty's Indian subjects should possess this gradual and judicious extension of responsibility. My Lords, may I say a few words with regard to our Colonial Empire? There has been a movement on foot to devise a representative system to connect the Colonies more closely with the Mother Country, and it is expected that a scheme for the common defence of the Empire may be evolved. Be that as it may, this movement in itself has proved that citizens at home, and citizens beyond the seas, are united by the strongest ties of sympathy, and, as Anglo-Saxons, are proud of belonging to the nation that has carried civilization to the uttermost ends of the earth. Without such a patriotic feeling any mere artificial enactment would be worthless, and for this reason we hail with peculiar pleasure the emphatic testimony recently borne by our Australian kinsmen to the policy of Her Majesty's present Ministry, as having been most conciliatory and eminently calculated to develop our common hopes and interests. Turning our attention home-wards, I would act on the friendly suggestion of the noble Earl, and invite your attention to a measure dealing with Scotch Private Bill procedure. It is generally agreed now-a-days that it is desirable to decentralize, so far as is consistent with efficiency; and this not only for the convenience of those immediately concerned, but because the devolution of business tends to strengthen local ties and national associations, and thus checks the gravitation of all interests to the Metropolis. We may assume that special difficulties connected with this measure have been overcome. One difficulty lay in the composition of the body who were to be selected to adjudicate; and, secondly, although in the promotion of minor Bills, such as those connected with water and gas, there would have been a great reduction of cost, yet it was thought that the promotion of Railway Bills would have led to a heavier expenditure than is even now the case. As the Scottish people are eagerly awaiting the passing of this measure, it is to be hoped that there will be no further delay in its becoming the law of the land. This Bill will apply equally to Ireland, and with the two proposed measures for Local Government and Education, on which the noble Earl has dwelt so ably and exhaustively, is an earnest that Her Majesty's Government hope to give to Ireland the promised legislative privileges identical, so far as circumstances will permit, with those which England and Scotland already enjoy. But it is to be remarked that it is the peaceable state of Ireland that entitles her to this extension of control in the management of her own local affairs. We cannot credit the present tranquil aspect of the country (so vast a change from the chaos of a few years ago) to the unrealised hopes of the divided Irish Party, who were wont to attribute any improvement in the condition of Ireland to the near prospect of the separation of her Parliament from that of Great Britain. Surely, my Lords, the real cause of the bright aspect which Ireland now bears is that whilst every effort has been made to ameliorate and raise the condition of her peasantry, the dignity and impartiality of the law has been unhesitatingly upheld by the statesman to whose tenure of office Ireland will ever look back with gratitude and pride. I am certain that there are no people more capable of developing a spirit of loyalty when their ignorance is not traded on by unscrupulous agitation, and when they are freed from the terrorism which one of our greatest living politicians has said can only exist by the sanction of murder. My Lords, we are told that the phantom of Home Rule will again assume a corporeal existence, and will one day knock at the doors of this House. Woe unutterable is predicted should your Lordships then bar its progress to the steps of the Throne. I am confident that your Lordships will never refuse to listen to the wish of the people when calmly determined and clearly delivered. But, unless you were convinced that this wish were universal and genuine, you would only be fulfilling the trust reposed in you by refusing to make law a measure that you deemed destructive. Should it then please those in another place to pass Resolutions threatening the existence of this House, no objection I imagine would be raised here to them thus harmlessly disposing of their time. My Lords, the proposals mentioned in Her Majesty's Speech having particular reference to England,—such as the completion of the Local Government Act, the relieving of the Elementary Public Schools from the pressure of local rates, and the proposal to give powers for strengthening authority in the Church of England—are all of them proposals likely to meet with your Lordships' approval. But in this, the last decade of the century, many questions are raised which involve, or would involve, great changes in the social economy of Great Britain. We are expressly bidden by Her Majesty to consider a measure for increasing the number of small holdings. The main principle of the Bill will be to empower the Local Authorities to advance money to the would-be purchasers of these holdings. It is thought that thus the labourer who has put by some money would be enabled to indulge in the very natural desire of acquiring some of the land—and the foundations of a peasant proprietary would be established. This marks another instance of the sympathy of Her Majesty's Government with the agricultural population. It must not be assumed that the proposed measure will solve the problem of the crowding of people from the rural districts into towns; nor would it be wise to interfere sharply with the working of the natural laws of supply and demand. At the present time the high scale of wages in our towns, mining districts, and colonies attracts the country population; but if this movement were to be entirely arrested, it would necessarily follow that the increased facilities of commanding agricultural labour would mean the reduction of agricultural wages, which we are told are already too low; whilst the proportionate rise in the scale of wages in the towns would increase the difficulties of competing with the foreign manufacturers. Even in my own recollection, near to where I live, I have known whole villages abandoned, with the result, of course, of largely increased wages to those who remain. But it has often seemed to me that a complex yet natural process is at work, by which a proportion of the rural population drifts into the towns, where they profit by the blessing of our great principle of Free Trade, and thus, in due course of time, reappear in the country in the character of feu or villa holders. This Bill, therefore, without revolutionizing the existing order of things, will multiply the number of those who have a personal and permanent stake in the country. It is satisfactory that compulsory purchase is not contemplated, for, as the noble Earl has said, there is plenty of land in the market of every quality and quantity; and it is to be hoped also that purchasers under this Bill will be restricted to those who are bona fide workers of the soil. My Lords, the Government are right to approach this and kindred subjects, such as the general question of labour, in a tentative and inquiring spirit. The best manner for arriving at sound conclusions is for an Administration, by keeping its finger on the pulse of the people, to ascertain their aims and impulses, and then to try and formulate the ideas that have been broached. The most fruitful seed will be that which the Government plants in a soil that has been turned and re-turned by its people. My Lords, Her Majesty's Ministers have now for nearly six years laboured to fulfil the responsibilities of their offices, and they have their full reward in the humble belief that Her Majesty appreciates their efforts to maintain the dignity of her Empire, and to foster the welfare of all er subjects. Therefore, in seconding the Motion for the Address, I am confident that your Lordships will respond willingly and loyally to the Royal Message, which Her Majesty has to-day conneyed to her faithful Parliament.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, before touching upon some of the points raised by Her Majesty's Gracious Speech, I have a very agreeable duty to perform, namely, to express, what I am sure is the general sense of the House, the pleasure and satisfaction at the way in which the Mover and Seconder of the Address have discharged their duties, and especially I must say that, in common I know with many on his side of the House, we heard with the greatest pleasure the speech of the noble Earl the proposer—a speech characterised, I may venture to say, with unusual ability, when speeches are made on an occasion of this kind. And personally, the noble Earl will allow me to say that, having been an old friend of his father, I welcome his taking part in the debates of this House, and trust that he will become a very useful and constant attendant on our business. With regard to the noble Lord who seconded the Address, we have all had the pleasure before of hearing him speak in this House, and we know that he is perfectly able to hold his own, and promises to be a very useful Member of it. My Lords, I have now to turn to a very different topic; one which was admirably dealt with by the proposer of the Address—I mean the melancholy and calamitous event which is the subject of the first paragraph of Her Majesty's Speech. My Lords, the feeling towards the Queen, one of unabated loyalty, and perhaps I may be allowed to say of affectionate regard on the part of all her people, is such that it would always secure that, in any calamitous event occurring to the Royal Family, the deepest sympathy would be felt with Her Majesty and with Her Majesty's family. But as the noble Earl in moving the Address observed, no circumstance was wanting in this sad event to give it the most tragic colour. My Lords, the young Prince, whose loss we deplore, was the eldest son of the heir Apparent to the Throne, with the brightest prospects before him in life, and upon the very eve of contracting what doubtless would have proved a most happy marriage. Such an event, even in private life, must have evoked the widest sympathy; but happening, as it does, to one placed in so conspicuous a situation, and connected with the family towards whom we feel so strongly in affection and respect, it has evoked the universal sympathy of the whole British Empire. My Lords, those who have had the honour of an acquaintance, however slight, with the late Duke of Clarence and Avondale, must have observed what a gentle and kindly disposition he possessed; and those who have heard him, upon the few occasions when he appeared before the public, must have seen that he showed distinct promise of qualities which would certainly have enabled him to discharge afterwards the duties of his high position with efficiency, with satisfaction to himself, and with benefit to the country over which, perhaps, he would have eventually been the Sovereign. My Lords, in such circumstances as these no consolation which we can offer can, I fear, have much effect; but I am certain that, as throughout the Empire, so in this House, there is the deepest feeling of sympathy towards Her Majesty the Queen, sympathy with the afflicted parents of the Duke of Clarence and Avondale, and with the Princess whose hopes were so cruelly blighted by this terrible calamity. My Lords, I turn now to the matters of business dealt with in this Speech. I entirely concur with the noble Lords in the satisfaction which we all must feel in hearing that our relations are of friendly nature with all Foreign Powers. My Lords, there is an allusion which is most fitly made in the Speech to the loss which has been sustained, and which we especially have sustained by the death of the Khedive of Egypt. The Khedive was a ruler who, by his simple and blameless life, by his great regard for the interests of the people over whom he ruled, and by his singular freedom from intrigue, and his straightforwardness in his dealings with all Powers with whom he had to do, commanded general respect; and his loss is one which will be very widely lamented. With regard to the future, the noble Lord who seconded the Address entered somewhat largely into the Egyptian question. I do not think this would be a wise opportunity to raise a controversy on this subject. Just at this moment, when there is a change in the ruler of that country, the moment clearly would not be well chosen for expressing the opinions, whatever they may be, which we hold upon this subject. At the same time, I must not be held to acquiesce in all, or indeed in much, that the noble Lord the Seconder of the Address said on this subject. My feeling is this : I agree with the paragraph of the Speech in the hope that the new Khedive will follow in the steps of his predecessor, and I trust that he will, by a sagacious conduct of the administration of Egypt, secure—what I believe is wished, not only by ourselves, but by all the Powers interested in Egypt—that that country should be placed in such a position that its Government should have a firm basis, and that it should be able to sustain itself alone, without foreign assistance. And, for my part, I do not believe that there are any in this country who do not look forward to the time when we shall be able, in accordance with our obligations, which have been acknowledged by all parties, to terminate the occupation of Egypt, which has been productive of much benefit I am sure, and of great blessings to that country, but the long continuance of which, I believe, is fraught with great disadvantages to our own country. My Lords, I notice an omission in the Speech, which I regret, namely, that there is no mention of Newfoundland. I had hoped that possibly the exertions of Her Majesty's Government might have been crowned with success, and that we might have heard that large progress had been made in settling that continued difficulty ; but I am afraid that the fates are against us as usual in this matter, and that Her Majesty's Government will bequeath what I may term a sort of Chancery suit of diplomacy to their successors, whoever they may be. As to the Behring Straits matter, all of us must have seen with great satisfaction that an agreement had been come to with the United States, and that the matter is to be dealt with by arbitration. Now, my Lords, I turn to matters of domestic interest, and I am not surprised to find that in the forefront is placed the promise of a measure of Local Government for Ireland. I am not surprised, because, no doubt, Her Majesty's Government have always announced that they would extend to Ireland the same, or some similar measure of local government as that which has been given in England. But whether that satisfaction with which we view the introduction of such a measure will be equally shared by those who support the noble Marquess, I cannot help feeling some doubt. If the measure is one which is a real measure of local government, and which is not fenced with those guarantees and securities, to which one of the noble Lords alluded, in so elaborate a manner as to render it practically a sham ; if, I say, it is a real measure of local government, it will be welcomed with pleasure on this side of the House, not only on account of the advantages which we believe there would be in the improvement of the local government of Ireland, which all know to be exceedingly defective, but also we take a view (which I do not think is so generally shared, or if it is felt on the other side cannot be felt with very great pleasure) that nothing is more likely to further that Home Rule which is a portion of our policy than the constitution of this local government in Ireland. Therefore, in any event, we view it with satisfaction. We hope the measure will pass. We believe that one of two things will happen : either that it will be a satisfactory measure and will, so far as it goes, strengthen our policy in Ireland, or, if it should turn out to be a measure which has very little real substance in it, it will be likely to increase dissatisfaction in Ireland, and, in that way also, to further the policy which we have at heart. Now, there is another matter which the noble Lords justly alluded to as one of great importance, and one which does not bear quite so much a Party character as the one which I have been referring to : I mean the measure dealing with Irish education. Irish education, all who know that country know, is not now in a satisfactory position. There was a time when the system of education in Ireland was somewhat in advance of the system in England; but since that time we have made great progress. No one can doubt that some reform is required in the educational system in Ireland. Her Majesty's Government have, no doubt, been compelled to address themselves to the subject because there is a sum of money which has to be distributed in Ireland, which I believe at present remains in the hands of the Treasury, if I am rightly informed. But I observe there is this difference between Ireland and England in this matter: we were always of opinion, I believe on both sides of the House, that one of the chief reasons why it was desirable to give what is called free or assisted education (I do not quarrel about the word) in England and Scotland was that we had compulsory education in England and Scotland, and that, therefore, it was reasonable that those who were compelled to send their children to school should not have to pay a fee for sending them there—but hitherto education has never been compulsory in Ireland, and I shall be extremely anxious to see whether Her Majesty's Government intend to introduce the compulsory system into that country. But I cannot congratulate the Government, in one sense, for having that measure in hand; for I think they will find it is about one of the most thorny subjects they can have to deal with in that country; and I shall be exceedingly curious to see whether the loyalty of some of the hot Orangemen in Ireland will stand the test of accepting a measure which would compel them to send their children to schools very largely attended by children of their Roman Catholic countrymen. But, while I say this, I wish well to the measure because of its educational advantages, and because I think anything that brings together the different sections of the population of Ireland must be a benefit to the whole Empire. So much with regard to Irish measures, which I should think are likely to occupy a very considerable part of this Session. But we are also promised a very important English measure, I mean that for small holdings. I will not trouble your Lordships with a discussion on the depopulation of the rural districts. The only remark I would make is this: that this movement of the rural population to the towns is in no way peculiar to this country. It is in the most remarkable manner a movement going on all over the world. It is found in France; it is found in Canada, where the towns have increased much faster than the rural districts; it is found in the United States, where the increase in the towns is infinitely greater than it is in the rural districts; it is found in Australia, where the circumstances are wholly different; therefore, I think we must dismiss from our minds the idea that any particular system of land tenure, or any particular system of society, such as we have here, is the main and principal cause of this movement. I say that, because I think otherwise we may be led astray in considering these questions. But when I make this general observation, I by no means wish to depreciate any attempts which may be made to diminish the strength of this movement. On the contrary, I think the universality of the movement and the strength of it render it the more necessary that we should take any measure that may be in our power to counteract it. It is the interest of the country, it is the interest of the whole population, that the rural population should not be unduly diminished; and although one of the noble Lords said that the Census showed that there was not a diminution in our rural districts, I cannot help feeling some doubt as to whether that conclusion is well founded. It may be that, taking all so-called rural districts together, there may not be generally a diminution; but if you look at the strictly rural agricultural districts, I think you will find that there is a diminution going on, although not in so great a proportion as in the previous decade. However that may be, this is a measure that must be judged, not merely with reference to the question of depopulation, but with reference to many other aspects which it bears. What I am rather curious to know is, what is the precise object which Her Majesty's Government will have in view with regard to this measure? My reason for saying so is this: the noble Marquess will forgive me for referring to a very interesting speech which he recently made, and in which he discussed very largely this question of small holdings. I was rather puzzled to know what were the precise objects which the Government had in view in proposing such a measure. The question of the improvement of the condition of the labourers by any such measure was set aside by the noble Marquess. He laid great stress upon what I am by no means disposed to underrate—the political effects of increasing the number of proprietors in this country; but the chief, the main, object, apparently, which he had in view in the creation of these small holdings was one that I confess surprised me, namely, the diminution of the pressure of the poor rates on real property; and if that is the chief object of the measure I doubt very much whether it will be received with quite as much satisfaction in the rural districts as the noble Marquess may desire. But there is one observation I wish to make upon this Small Holdings Bill: that I think it is a very striking refutation of the attacks which have been made upon those who sit upon this side of the Table, or in the other House of Parliament, for our supposed, as it is called, bidding for the agricultural vote. We are constantly told that we are exceedingly factious people—that our only object is to catch a vote here and there, and that we have been bidding for the agricultural vote. Well, I apprehend that all parties are very desirous to obtain the agricultural vote if they can, and I think that this Bill that has been brought forward by the Government is a very strong example that bidding for the agricultural vote is not confined to this side of the House. And I must also make this remark—that we have lately seen what is exceedingly gratifying to us, because it is a very old saying that nothing is so flattering as imitation. Now we had a conference in London of agricultural labourers, and, I believe, in some quarters among those who are opposed to us there was a disposition rather to underrate and sneer at the conference.

The Earl of Kimberley

But, what took place soon after? The Minister for Agriculture paid us the great compliment of instantly imitating what we had done, and setting up another and rival conference of agricultural labourers in a district not very far from me. I am sufficiently vain to think that the copy was not as good as the original; but, at all events, it shows that we have no monopoly of this attempt to catch the agricultural vote; and all that we can hope for is that we may have a majority of their votes. And I am not quite certain that this small holdings measure may not really be ascribed a good deal to the pressure which has been brought forward on the part of the Opposition for something to be done for the agricultural labourer, and that we may not get possibly a certain amount of the credit that may be derived from this measure. But, be that as it may, I think the matter must really be judged, not from a Party point of view of who is going to get votes at the next election. The measure is one of very considerable importance and, when it comes (as I trust it will) before the House, it will meet on both sides of it with a fair disposition to favourable consideration, if it is a reasonable measure. Now there is a measure which interests me personally and many noble Lords in this House, which I am very glad to see mentioned in the Speech—I mean the measure which is described as for the improvement of the Legislative Councils of India. I echo most sincerely a hope which was expressed by one of the noble Lords who moved and seconded the Address, that this measure will not merely pass through this House, but will be pressed by Her Majesty's Government through the other House and will pass into law. It is really a misfortune that a measure of this kind should be hung up Session after Session. However important to us may be our domestic legislation, let us not forget that we have an immense responsibility in the government of that great Empire in India, and that it is not well for us to palter long with questions of this kind. And I am the more desirous that this measure should be dealt with, because I have observed, as I have no doubt the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India has observed, with great pleasure that in India the tone has much moderated in dealing with this subject, and that very sensible views have been expressed at meetings held in India; and there is now a reasonable promise that there will be an agreement as to a tentative and commencing measure upon this subject. We must not look for it all at once; but if we can make a beginning, I believe we shall lay the foundation for what may be a real benefit and a real security to our Indian Empire. My Lords, there are a number of other small matters that are dealt with in the Speech, and upon which, if I were disposed to occupy your time, I might make some observations. But you know that every Session we have what may be called the ghosts of the previous Session resuscitated and brought before us; and here they are as usual. My own feeling is that, whilst they are very interesting figures, at this time of day, when this Parliament is necessarily not far from its termination, it will not be found that there will be any very extraordinary anxiety to deal with those subjects which are not of great and pressing interest, and that, in all probability, some at least, perhaps all of them, will survive to appear in another Parliament, and receive then I hope more attention than they would probably get in the present Parliament. My Lords, I will not detain your Lordships any longer. The Speech has the great merit of brevity; the subjects if it are plainly and sufficiently stated; and I daresay your Lordships will be very glad if I say that I have exhausted all the observations that I wish to make on this occasion.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): In the course of his, I am bound to say very temperate, remarks, or rather at the beginning of them, the noble Lord commenced with that tribute to the talent of those who have moved and seconded the Address, which was never more fitly delivered than on the present occasion. At all events, to-night we can say that, in reiterating that eulogy, we are using no hollow and unreal phraseology. The speeches of the two noble Lords, and especially of the noble Earl who moved the Address, will take a very high rank among similar addresses which we have listened to in this House. They indicate great powers of mind and of speech; and if the two noble Lords will give us the benefit in future debates of the powers that they have displayed, there will be a very considerable addition, both of solid thought and of graceful language, to illustrate the discussions of this House. My Lords, we meet on a very sad and tragic occasion, which must necessarily colour our remarks, and I think probably diminish the keenness of our application to other subjects. I do not feel that, after the very pathetic and eloquent observations which have fallen from all who have noticed this sad subject, I ought to detain your Lordships long by dwelling upon it; it is one which must waken our deepest feelings of sympathy as individuals, and loyalty as good subjects. We, most of us, had some acquaintance—my own was very slight, but I had some acquaintance—with the lamented Prince whose loss we are deplored. It always struck me that I had seldom seen in any rank, and hardly ever in so exalted a rank, such a perfect absence of selfishness or pride of any kind, such a complete amiability of character, such a desire to make himself loved by all with whom he might come in contact; and I think that, outside the circle of those who knew him, the recognition of his fine qualities was widely spread, and it was believed that in a future, though all hoped a distant, day we had the hope of a ruler who would carry on at their highest level the traditions of the English Monarchy. And then the depth of the calamity is measured by the contrast of the feelings against which it is thrown. Before this event took place a marriage had been announced which had been singularly grateful to the feelings of the people of this country. It was a marriage with a Princess well known and universally beloved, and universally honoured wherever she was known, and men looked forward with an enthusiasm to that event which they could not feel in the case of a Princess coming from another land with whom they had not yet been able to make themselves.

acquainted. The tragic character of the reality is thrown out by its contrast with the hopefulness of those dreams in which men indulged. The considerations of consolation, on which the noble Earl behind me has dwelt, have no doubt weighed strongly with your Lordships, as they have weighed with the August Sovereign whose words this Speech embodies. It is no small thing to feel that the position, the action, the common reputation of the Royal Family, and especially of the Sovereign who is at the head of it, are such as to have called forth, even from those who knew little or nothing of the Prince we have lost, that universal unbidden outburst of sympathy and sorrow which echoed from every corner of the world. It shows to us that, above all theories, our institutions are knit together by human and personal feelings, and that their popularity is largely a tribute to, and a proof of, the excellence of those who bear the honours they confer. My Lords, as I have said, the observations of the noble Lord opposite were very temperate, and I do not know, if equity did not demand it, that I should think it necessary to answer him in the matters to which he referred. He told us that he disagreed about Egypt; but, by way of showing that he disagreed, he proceeded to utter what, so far as I could catch it, was a very sound and orthodox statement of the view which has always been held on both sides of the House.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I only said that I disagreed with some things that the Seconder had said.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : We have always held language which, as I say, speaking merely from what I gathered, is very similar to that which has been held this evening by the noble Lord.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : That I can quite understand.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : We have great confidence that the experiment—the somewhat strange and anomalous experiment—in which this country has taken so large a part, will not be allowed to fail. Our object is, undoubtedly, that Egypt should stand by her own strength—too strong either for internal intrigue or rebellion or for external encroachment to overthrow.

The Marquess of Salisbury

That is the object we have in view. We may think that our critics imagine that that object can be reached more rapidly, and by more royal roads, than we believe to be the case. That is a matter which, I agree with the noble Lord, we had better defer to some other opportunity of debate. But the difference between us is a difference in means, and not in ends; and I earnestly hope that no foreign country will believe that this people, after all they have sacrificed, and all they have done, will ever abandon Egypt, either to the supremacy of any other Power, or to the destruction of disorder and anarchy within. The noble Lord asked us about Newfoundland. He very fitly compared it to a Chancery suit—even under the reformed orders of the Court of Chancery; but he proceeded to say that he hoped the efforts of Her Majesty's Government had procured a settlement of it. Well, if Her Majesty's Government had been left alone, we should have procured a settlement of it. The efforts of Her Majesty's Government bore the very fairest promise of success. Unfortunately, a Bill was necessary, and that Bill had to pass through both Houses of Parliament. In this House it met with a certain amount of criticism; but the noble Lords opposite did their roaring very gently, and I do not think any very great harm was done. But when it got into the other House of Parliament the matter took a very different turn, and I am revealing no diplomatic secret, for whenever the Papers come to be published it must appear that the observations which were made by gentlemen, who believed themselves to be, and announced themselves to be, on the point of coming into Office at an early period, were of such a character as entirely to destroy in the French Government any hope that they would obtain the execution of the decrees of the arbitrator, whenever the arbitrator might be appointed; and the result is that since those speeches have been delivered we have not moved a single inch, and the French Government have not, up to this time, ventured to submit, or thought it right to submit, to their Chamber the ratification of the engagement on the strength of which we proposed that

Bill to Parliament. I am justified, therefore, in saying that if the Newfoundland business has not got further than it has at present, it is not because we have made no efforts, but because our efforts have been interfered with by the somewhat rash criticisms that others have devoted to them. But it is fair to say that the French Government are, I believe, awaiting the result of legislation which has been promised in the Newfoundland Assembly. I do not venture to prophesy what its fate will be; but, until that fate is decided, I am wholly unable to tell the noble Lord how soon the Chancery suit will come to a conclusion. The noble Lord derived great consolation from the consideration of Irish affairs. He thought he saw the material for failure and consequent discontent in all the measures of Her Majesty's Government, and he exulted in the notion that we should produce so much dissatisfaction in Ireland that the success of his Party would consequently be the result. Well, that is, perhaps, not a novel way of looking at the legislative proposals of your opponent. What is novel is the extreme candour with which, on this occasion, it has been announced. I can only say that I hope the noble Lord will be disappointed. I quite admit with him that education is a very thorny subject, and I have no doubt we shall find that we have stirred up a considerable hornet's nest in some direction or other by any proposals that we may make; but if we are to be deterred from doing anything for education in Ireland by that reflection, when we consider how deeply education goes to the root of all the differences by which that country is distracted, I imagine our legislative career would be of a very anodyne and unimportant character. The noble Lord expressed his curiosity as to what several Bills would contain. I think, on the whole, I had better leave him to the sufferings which that unsatisfied passion may cause him a few days longer. If I were to attempt to give him an account from memory of the various clauses he has referred to, I might possibly make some mistake for which he would be very angry with me afterwards. I can only hope that his rest will not be seriously compromised by the length of time he will have to wait. The matter which, I think, excited the noble Lord to the greatest extent was our proposal for a Small Holdings Bill. He was indignant that we had tried to catch the agricultural vote.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: No; I made no objection. I objected that we were accused of doing it when you were doing the same thing.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I imagine we used to be called the Agricultural Party, and it sounds rather as if I were trying to catch my own vote—an effort I should find no difficulty in performing. But I do not think there is much reality in an accusation, under our Constitutional Government, of what is called trying to catch votes, unless you do it in a dishonourable manner, and in a manner inconsistent with your own convictions; because I understand these two Houses sit rather for the purpose of listening to the grievances and views of the inhabitants of this country, and that, if they do not try to catch votes—that is to say, if they do not try to meet the wishes of the people by whom this country is inhabited—they very largely fail in the duties which they have to perform. But the noble Lord seemed to suggest that we had borrowed our policy from him. That is a claim of copyright which I hear constantly coming from the benches opposite. It appears to me that at some time or other some versatile Member or other of their Party has made every possible suggestion on political matters which human ingenuity can contrive; and, therefore, it consequently follows that if anybody takes up any idea in earnest he must find that some Member of the Liberal Party at some time or other had expressed a similar idea. I venture to say for myself that I am not guilty of borrowing from the noble Lord in this matter of small holdings. The noble Lord must remember perfectly well—it is some time ago now—that when he was pushing the first Irish Bill through Parliament I ventured to support him, very much to the indignation of my then leader, the noble Duke behind me (the Duke of Richmond), in the policy of those small holdings. I was a believer in the policy that the Bright Clauses suggested. They were not very successful ; they failed to please the Treasury—a failure which has happened to other clauses besides those—and consequently they did not succeed. But they represented a principle which I ventured to support then, and which I support now, as most essentially Conservative in its nature. There is no guarantee for the maintenance of the institutions of a country like a large number of possessors of land in that country. I do not say that these small holdings will be able to effect that object ; the economical causes may be too strong for us ; it may not be possible to cultivate land in these small parcels with success, or to own it with success ; the temptation to invest the capital in something more remunerative may tend to cause the constant sale of the holdings as fast as they are created. I am putting the matter in its worst light. I do not in the least pledge my own belief that this must necessarily succeed over a very large portion of the country. I believe in some portions of the country, where the soil is fertile, it may succeed. I am quite certain that wherever it does succeed it will be a very large additional guarantee to the institutions of this country. And I must correct a misunderstanding of the noble Lord's with respect to the object that I have in view. That guarantee to the institutions of the country is what induced me 20 years ago, and what induces me now, and I believe always will induce me, to support a policy for multiplying the owners of land. When I said that it would end in diminishing the burden of the poor rates, what I thought I explained at Exeter (but I am afraid I did not carry it to the mind of the noble Lord), was that it seemed to me that rates generally, education rates certainly, were levied upon the land, and not levied upon other sources of income, and that, by that undue preference given to personal property, a very considerable injustice was being committed. My belief was that if we had a large number of small holders through the country we should be electorally too strong to allow that injustice to continue ; but it is only in that sense that I thought the multiplication of small holders would diminish the burden of the poor rates. My Lords, I do not care to dwell upon this subject, for I think we had much better do so when the measure is before us. I feel a difficulty in dealing with this measure, and, indeed, with many other measures which we recommend, either in the Queen's Speech or at other times, in that I am no believer in nostrums or panaceas. I think great evil is done by exaggerating the benefit that any one measure can confer upon the people of this country. The action of every measure must be very limited and partial, and the good that it can produce can only be produced gradually ; and I am afraid we shall generate a disbelief in the efficiency of Parliament, and a disbelief in the sincerity of politicians, if we prophecy too large a result from any measure of this kind. But, subject always to that consideration, I do not think there is any object to which we can direct our efforts which would produce more certain hope of benefit than that of multiplying the owners of the land. I do not say this as believing that it will have a very great effect, or a very extensive effect, in retaining in the country those who are not owners of the land. The noble Lord very justly says that the gravitation towards the towns is a thing confined to no country. It is a mark of our time. I believe it is largely the result of education ; it is largely the result of that widening of ideas which makes men more anxious for the converse of each other ; and men therefore shrink from the isolation and dulness of the country, and love the excitement of the towns. And against that strong human instinct you will struggle in vain. I believe we must confine ourselves to efforts in which we can hope to succeed. If we are able to give the widest scope to the abilities of the dwellers in the country as well as the dwellers in the town ; if we are able to elevate their morality and to instruct their minds, so as to stimulate their exertions to the highest extent ; if we can hold out to them an object of ambition, which leads to the strongest efforts on the part of the cleverest men, we may be sure that, whether we catch the agricultural vote or not, whatever the immediate and temporary effect of our legislation should be, we are contributing powerfully to the maintenance of our institu-

and the permanent welfare of our

E DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE : Lords, I do not think it is any that I should venture to ss upon your Lordships' atten- y any remarks upon any of the ts referred to in Her Majesty's us Speech from the Throne, save But I do desire, at the request noble Friend who sits beside me (Earl of Derby), who has hitherto ably represented the opinions, seen the exponent of the opinions, urge number of Members of your hips' House, to say one or two to express how entirely we con-

1 all that has fallen from the Lords who have moved and led the Address to the Throne, the Prime Minister, and the noble who sits near me, upon the great ity which has recently befallen the Family. It is impossible for me to nuch or anything to what has al- been said. When a life of great se, a life which appeared to offer irest prospect that could be open noblest ambition, is suddenly and turely cut short, it must, under reumstances, become the subject versal interest and universal sym-

. But the young Prince whose e deplore did not stand alone, t is rather with his illustrious ts and relatives than with himself ur thoughts are chiefly concerned . It is well-known that the nu- is heavy cares of duty which y the attention of Her Majesty in no degree distracted her atten- rom her domestic duties or chilled omestic affections. We know still r that the comparative isolation e Throne has perhaps rendered feelings of affection more acute ore intense than is the case with ry individuals. The Prince and ss of Wales have so identified selves with the life of the people, midst of whom they occupy the exalted position: they have so l our joys and our sorrows, entered into our labours and scupations: that we everyone of sel an interest in everything i concerns and touches them; nothing which can affect their less and their interest can be indifferent to us. My Lords, if consola- tion could be found for such a crush- ing and heavy blow as has befallen the Prince and Princess of Wales, it would, as has already been said, be found in the spontaneous and sincere effusion of respectful sympathy which has pro- ceeded from every part of the Empire. We cannot hope that as yet even here much consolation can be found. As has been well expressed by a dis- tinguished Member of your Lordships' House : "That a world-wide Empire mourns with them were slender solace ;" but it is all that we can offer, and we do offer it, as the tribute of sincere and loyal hearts.

Address agreed to, nemine dissentiente, and ordered to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

The EARL of MORLEY appointed, nemine dissentiente, to take the Chair in all Committees of this House for this Session.

COMMITTEE FOR PRIVILEGES — Ap- pointed.

SUB-COMMITTEE FOR THE JOURNALS —Appointed.

STOPPAGES IN THE STREETS—Orders to prevent, renewed.

APPEAL COMMITTEE—Appointed.

SELECT VESTRIES.

Bill, pro forma, read 1<sup>o</sup>.

INDIAN COUNCILS ACT (1861) AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Indian Councils Act, 1861, was presented by the Viscount Cross; read 1<sup>o</sup>; to be printed; and to be read 2<sup>o</sup> on Monday next. (No. 3.)

EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Law of Evidence—Was presented by the Lord Chancellor; read 1<sup>o</sup>; and to be printed. (No. 4.)

ARCHDEACONY OF CORNWALL BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Law as to the endow- ment of the Archdeaconry of Cornwall—Was presented by the Lord Steward (E. Mount- Edgecombe); read 1<sup>o</sup>; and to be printed. (No. 5.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, to Thursday next at a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 9th February, 1892.

The House met at half after one of the clock.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners ;—

The House met ;—and being returned ;—

NEW WRITS DURING THE RECESS.

MR. SPEAKER acquainted the House that he had issued during the Recess Warrants for New Wrts :—For Lewisham, v. the Right Hon. Viscount Lewisham, called to the House of Peers as Earl of Dartmouth ; for Cambridge University, v. the Right Hon. Henry Cecil Raikes, deceased ; for Manchester (N.E. Division), v. the Right Hon. Sir James Fergusson, Bart., Postmaster General ; for Bute, v. the Right Hon. J. P. B. Robertson, now Lord Justice General of Scotland ; for the Borough of Strand, v. the Right Hon. W. H. Smith, deceased ; for the County of Kilkenny (Northern Division), v. Sir John Pope Hennessy, deceased ; for the County of Devon (South Molton Division), v. Viscount Lymington, called to the House of Peers as Earl of Portsmouth ; for Cork City, v. Mr. C. S. Parnell, deceased ; for Leeds (Northern Division), v. the Right Hon. W. L. Jackson, Chief Secretary for Ireland ; for Dorset (Eastern Division), v. Mr. G. H. Bond, deceased ; for Sussex (South-Western or Chichester Division), v. Lord Walter Gordon Lennox, Treasurer of Her Majesty's Household ; for the County of Armagh (Mid Division), v. Sir James Porter Corry, Bart., deceased ; for the City of Waterford, v. Mr. Richard Power, deceased ; for the County of Lancaster (Rossendale Division), v. the Right Hon. the Marquess of Hartington, called to the House of Peers as the Duke of Devonshire.

ELECTIONS.

Ordered, That all Members who are returned for two or more places in any part of the United Kingdom do make their election for which of the places they will serve, within one week after it shall appear that there is a question upon the return for that place ; and if anything shall come in question touching the return or election of any Member, he is to withdraw during the time the matter is in debate ; and that all Members returned upon double returns do withdraw until their returns are determined.

Resolved, That no Peer of the Realm, except such Peers of Ireland as shall for the time being be actually elected, and shall not have declined to serve, for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, hath any right to give his vote in the election of any Member to serve in Parliament.

Resolved, That it is a high infringement of the liberties and privileges of the Commons of the United Kingdom for any Lord of Parliament or other Peer or Prelate, not being a Peer of Ireland at the time elected, and not having declined to serve for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, to concern himself in the election of Members to serve for the Commons in Parliament, except only any Peer of Ireland, at such elections in Great Britain respectively where such Peer shall appear as a Candidate, or by himself, or any other, be proposed to be elected ; or for any Lord Lieutenant or Governor of any county to avail himself of any authority derived from his Commission, to influence the election of any Member to serve for the Commons in Parliament.

Resolved, That if it shall appear that any person hath been elected or returned a Member of this House, or endeavoured so to be, by bribery or any other corrupt practices, this House will proceed with the utmost severity against all such persons as shall have been wilfully concerned in such bribery or other corrupt practices.

WITNESSES.

Resolved, That if it shall appear that any person hath been tampering with any Witness in respect of his evidence to be given to this House, or any Committee thereof, or directly or indirectly hath endeavoured to defer or hinder any person from appearing or giving evidence, the same is declared to be a high crime and misdemeanour ; and this House will proceed with the utmost severity against such offender.

Resolved, That if it shall appear that any person hath given false evidence in any case before this House, or any Committee, thereof, this House will proceed with the utmost severity against such offender.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

Ordered, That the Commissioners of the Police of the Metropolis do take care that, during the Session of Parliament, the passage through the streets leading to this House be kept free and open, and that no obstruction be permitted to hinder the passage of Members to and from this House, and that no disorder be allowed in Westminster Hall, or in the passages leading to this House, during the sitting of Parliament, and that there be no annoyance therein or thereabouts ; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms attending this House do communicate this Order to the Commissioners aforesaid.

VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS.

Ordered, That the Votes and Proceedings of this House be printed, being first perused by Mr. Speaker; and that he do appoint the printing thereof; and that no person but such as he shall appoint do presume to print the same.

PRIVILEGES.

Ordered, That a Committee of Privileges be appointed.

OUTLAWRIES BILL.

Bill "for the more effectual preventing clandestine outlawries," read the first time; to be read a second time.

JOURNAL.

Ordered, That the Journal of this House from the end of the last Session to the end of the present Session, with an Index to the 147th Volume, be printed.

Ordered, That 750 copies of the said Journal be printed by the appointment and under the direction of Reginald Francis Douce Palgrave Esq., C.B., the Clerk of this House.

Ordered, That the said Journal and Index be printed by such Person as shall be licensed by Mr. Speaker, and that no other person do presume to print the same.

MAIL CONTRACT, PORTSMOUTH AND RYDE.

Copy ordered—

Of the contracts with the London and South-Western Railway Company and the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, dated 10th November, 1891, for the conveyance of mails between Portsmouth and Ryde, together with the Treasury Minute relating thereto.—(Sir John Gorst.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. (No. 1.)

CIVIL CONTINGENCIES FUND, 1890-91.

Copy ordered—

Of accounts showing—

1. The Receipts and Payments in connection with the Fund in the year ended 31st March, 1891.

2. The distribution of the capital of the Fund at the commencement and close of the year.

Together with the correspondence with the Controller and Auditor-General thereon.—(Sir John Gorst.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. (No. 2.)

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (IRELAND).

Copy ordered—

Of Account of the Receipts and Payments of the Accountant-General of the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland, in respect of the Funds of Suitors in the said Court, in the year to the 30th day of September, 1891; together with a statement of liabilities and assets, and particulars of securities in Court on 30th day of September, 1891.—(Sir John Gorst.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. (No. 3.)

NEW MEMBERS SWORN.

Right Hon. W. L. Jackson, for Leeds, N.; Right Hon. Sir James Ferguson, bart., for Manchester, N.E.; Mr. Graham Murray, for Bute; Right Hon. Lord W. G. Lennox, for Sussex, Chichester Division; Mr. John Penn, for Lewisham; the Hon. Humphrey N. Sturt, for Dorset, East; Mr. John E. Redmond, for Waterford; Mr. E. T. Holden, for Walsall; Mr. R. C. Jebb, for Cambridge University; Mr. Martin Flavin, for Cork; Mr. P. Macdermott, for Kilkenny, N.; the Hon. W. F. D. Smith, for Strand, Westminster; Mr. Dunbar P. Barton, for Armagh, Mid.; Mr. G. Lambert, for Devon, S. Molton Division; Mr. J. H. Maden, for Lancaster, Rossendale Division.

MINISTERIAL NOTICES OF MOTION.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I beg to give notice that on Thursday I shall ask leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law relating to Local Government in Ireland and for other purposes connected therewith; and also to bring in a Bill to amend the procedure with respect to Private Bills in Ireland and Scotland.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. H. Chaplin, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I beg to give notice that on Thursday I shall ask leave to bring in a Bill to facilitate the acquisition of small agricultural holdings.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. L. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I beg to give notice that on Thursday next I shall ask leave to bring in a Bill to improve National Education in Ireland.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to give notice that on Thursday I shall move that Mr. De Cobain be required to attend in his place on this day fortnight.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I see the First Lord of the Treasury in his place, and would ask him to be kind enough to state at what time he proposes to adjourn the debate to-morrow in order that the new Bills may be brought in.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think it would be particularly convenient, in accordance with the usual practice, to adjourn the debate soon after 3 o'clock to-morrow, and that will give ample time to hon. Gentlemen to bring in their Bills.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, before making the Motion of which he has given notice with reference to Mr. De Cobain, he proposes to lay any Papers on the Table?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall consult with my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, who knows rather more about the case than I do; but I should think there are no Papers which it would be necessary to lay on the Table. Of course, if there are, they will be laid on the Table.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

MR. SPEAKER reported Her Majesty's Speech, made that day by Her CHANCELLOR, and read it to the House.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

(5.50.) MR. HERMON HODGE (Lancashire, N.E.) (who wore the uniform of the Oxford Volunteer Hussars) said: Mr. Speaker, in accordance with a custom long established, I rise to ask this House to adopt an Address of Thanks to Her Gracious Majesty for the Speech which has just been delivered from the Chair.

It has ever been a custom for those who preceded me in this honourable and difficult duty to ask for, and to invariably receive, the kind and considerate indulgence of hon. Members of this House, and I can assure the House that never was that appeal made with less affectation or greater sincerity than I make it to the House to-night. I think it will be felt that my task is an exceptionally difficult and even painful one on this occasion, for my first duty is to refer to the distressing announcement which stands in the forefront of Her Majesty's Speech with reference to the death of His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and Avondale. It is very difficult and hard for me, just at a time when the nation is beginning to recover somewhat, we hope, at all events, from the shock which it sustained by that painful event—it is difficult and hard for me infandum renovare dolorem. The feeling of intense grief which fills the heart of every Member of this House upon this subject must find an utterance here, and I will venture to make myself the humble means of offering to our beloved Queen our deep-sympathy in her great sorrow, for as she is the highest in the land, so is she ever the foremost to offer to the humblest of her subjects her kindly sympathy whenever trouble or afflictions overtake them. Upon the grief of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales I will not venture to intrude, and I know not how to find words in which to give utterance to the feeling which must arise in the hearts of all of us with regard to the young Princess, who yesterday was about to wed with one she loved so well, and whose approaching nuptials made the heart of England so glad that you could almost hear her marriage bells. I must now, Sir, leave this painful subject with a reflection suggested by the Speech itself: that in all this gloom there is this bright thing, in all this bitterness there is this sweet, in all this sorrow there is this comfort, and it is the wonderful demonstration of love and loyalty which has reached Her Gracious Majesty from every portion of her vast dominions. This is the golden light shining behind the cloud. An Empire such as ours is bound together by many a tie, but no bond is of more importance in the maintenance of that Empire than the sentiment of loyalty. Patriotism may turn the thoughts of the subjects of the Queen to their homes in any part of her vast dependencies; but loyalty turns the thoughts, the eyes, the hearts of every citizen of this Empire to England and to England's Queen, and fosters the wish that the Queen may be long preserved in her station as Ruler of this Empire. We are met to-day under a new leader for the first time, and I am sure that the thoughts of hon. Members still revert with kindness to the amiable gentleman who so lately occupied that high position. When Mr. Smith was taken from us the people of England lost a good friend, and the Queen a faithful servant. Of the qualities and abilities of the right hon. Gentleman who has succeeded him good taste forbids me to speak. They are well known to this House, and they deserve, and I am sure they will command, the support and confidence and respect of the House of Commons. The most important communication, perhaps, contained in the Royal Speech is that peace still prevails, and it becomes almost a wonder passing our understanding that it has been maintained at all. Great, indeed, is the debt which this country owes to Lord Salisbury, and it has been gratefully and graciously expressed by many of his strongest and most distinguished political opponents. Great is the debt this nation owes to Lord Salisbury, who has for so long a time, and with such success, borne upon his shoulders the immense responsibility of the management of our foreign affairs. If that policy, friendly but firm, be continued, if it be supported, as it is now, and as it ought to be, by an adequate development of our system of national defence, including the Reserve forces—such as that force of Volunteer Cavalry whose uniform I have the honour to wear—supported by an Army increasing and improving as our Army is in equipment, efficiency and organisation, and above all by a Navy adequate to protect our coasts, our commerce, and the food supply of our people; then, indeed, we may look forward with confidence to a long continuance of our present peace, and of the prosperity which follows in its train. These subjects are mentioned for our special attention. The country learned with the deepest regret the intelligence of the death of the Viceroy of Egypt, in whom Her Majesty has lost a loyal ally, and the people of Egypt a true friend. Our co-operation with, our support of, the Government of the late Viceroy, has been creditable to this country, most creditable to those who have represented this country in Egypt, and most advantageous to the people of Egypt themselves. Its results are the improvement in the administration of justice, lessened taxation, increased trade, greater liberty to the people themselves, and a financial position which surprises even those who have most at heart the interest of that country. It has not escaped popular attention in this country that the young Prince Abbas, the Khedive who has succeeded in his father's place (having been named by a Firman of his Imperial Majesty the Sultan), on his accession received every demonstration of loyalty and satisfaction on the part of both pashas and people. This is a case in which, if there had been dissatisfaction or discontent, it would have been impossible to imagine that it would not have made itself apparent. Surely it would be unwise of us, unworthy of us, most unfair to the new Khedive, to withdraw that support which we gave to his predecessor, were we to leave Egypt until the work we have begun is placed on a solid and enduring basis. Then, and not till then, can we leave Egypt with the goodwill of every friend of Egypt, from His Imperial Majesty the Sultan, to the humblest tiller of the soil. The question of seal fishing in Behring Sea is in a fair way to be settled by arbitration. Any development of the principle of settlement of disputes by arbitration, whether it be the humblest trade dispute in this country, or a dispute endangering the friendly relations between two great nations like Canada and the United States, would be most welcome to this House. Zanzibar, by arrangement with the Sultan, has been declared a free port. This will be welcome news, indeed, both to the merchants and manufacturers of this country, and especially welcome to those whom I have the honour to represent in this House, the working people of Lancashire. New markets are hard to find. The Trade Returns to hand, I believe, for Zanzibar, show the marvellous rapidity with which our manufacturers avail themselves of any opportunity of that sort. It is not expecting too much when I say I have little doubt that the dominions of the Sultan will be largely benefitted by the action he has thought well to take in this matter. I do not know if I should be going too far outside of the special business before us if I were to make an appeal to the House for the most favourable consideration to those pioneers of ours in Africa who are now raising our flag there. I do not make the appeal for generous consideration for them simply because they are enterprising and energetic, but because of the working classes, who will in the future benefit by the action they are now taking. I should like to allude very briefly to two of the legislative proposals mentioned in the Speech. The chief place amongst them has, of course, been given to the proposal for applying to Ireland the general principles affecting local government, which have been already applied to Great Britain. And why not? Great success has attended the establishment of it in England and Scotland; the marvellously improved condition of Ireland, the prosperity of that country, is admitted on all hands. The very fact that it has not been necessary for Her Majesty to make any allusion in Her Speech to the condition of that country makes it evident that those who are responsible to her feel no anxiety on the subject. It is incontestible, and under these circumstances it seems to me that the Government are not only justified, but are bound to submit to this House, and to pass through the House, a Bill having for its object the placing of the Irish people on a footing, speaking broadly and generally, of equality with Englishmen and Scotchmen in this matter. Whether there be real grievances in Ireland against this country or not is a matter on which I hold strong opinions; but I will not express them now, as I do not want to throw down the apple of discord. But under these circumstances it would, in my opinion, establish, and justly establish, a genuine grievance in the minds of the Irish people against this country if we failed to do them this act of justice. I have confidence in the Measures, and I have confidence in the Ministers, that they will be able to give to the House a Bill which will satisfy every legitimate requirement of every reasonable Irishman for local self-government, and will absolutely safeguard the interests of every class in Ireland. I will pass to a Bill which I will call something in the nature of an interesting experiment: it is for establishing what are commonly called small holdings. I will point out, not only for the information of the House, but to remove an apprehension which exists largely outside, that it is not intended to, in any way whatever, do away with the system of large farms, but to supplement that system by the creation of smaller holdings. It is another proof of the Government's anxiety to increase the number of cultivating owners. They have already given proof of this by their Allotments Act, and their action in Ireland. The Bill, I presume, will embody the Report of the Committee which sat on this subject not long ago. It will give a popularly elected local authority power to purchase land for the purpose of re-selling it in small holdings. I hope it will not stop there, but that it will give power to the local authority to lease land for the purposes of sub-letting in still smaller portions. I attach much importance to this, because while there are many men who would hesitate to put themselves at once into the responsible position of small owners, there are large numbers who would gladly avail themselves of the opportunity of becoming tenants of the local authority; and who, by that means, and by the exercise of a little thrift, might convert their occupancy eventually into ownership. I do not think there will be any necessity for compulsion in this matter. There is plenty of land to be got. Anybody who goes through an agricultural district will see on almost every barn end notices of sale, showing a sale of stock and effects has just taken place, or is about to take place. The whole question of agricultural depression is raised by this Bill. Its causes have been long predicted, and they are the result of the free importation of large quantities of food, which has conferred great benefit, especially on places like London and Lancashire, where great masses of population are gathered together, but at a heavy cost to the home producer. The attitude of landlords and tenants throughout all this long-continued depression has been well worthy of our admiration, and the right hon. Member for Midlothian—whom I regret not to see in his place, which I hope is not due to ill-health—speaking on a Motion similar to this in 1890, used the language of compliment towards landlords and tenants, and their attitude throughout this depression. But he said, I think—"I wish them well through with it; indeed, I believe they are well through with it," or words to that effect. I thank him for the wish, but regret that his idea should not have been verified by the facts. We have no hope, we have no help, we see no likelihood of getting through. How can it be through? If you go on to the land and look into the wallets of the agricultural labourers what will you find? American bacon, American cheese, and bread made from foreign flour, or from flour made from wheat grown in this country at a loss to the producer. In such a matter as this I would not like to use the language of exaggeration, and I will not rely on any language of my own; facts and figures are more eloquent. Last year the average price of wheat was a little over 30s. Last week in Reading Market that was the average price at which it was quoted, and I believe last week at Swindon and Bristol the papers quote as low as 26s. and 24s. These are figures eloquent to anyone interested in the matter. The results of this depression are manifest and manifold, and affect the whole community. This Bill does not profess to touch the causes of agricultural depression, but to prevent one of the most remarkable results of the depression. It does hope to check, in some degree at all events, the migration of labourers from the country districts to the large towns which has lately attracted attention, and will attract more before we have done with it. This is not a migration of agricultural labourers from purely country districts to small towns, but the migration from agricultural districts and small towns of numbers of young lads and able-bodied young men into the large industrial towns, to shoulder each other in the already overcrowded labour market. You have seen in London something of this agricultural depression. A great stream of these men came into the city and met another stream of those indigent foreigners who come to this port until the floods surged up into the streets of London under the name of the "Unemployed"—you see it, and know how grave the question is, and I apologise for detaining the House so long on this matter; but I am sure it will join in giving a welcome to this measure, which is destined to check somewhat this migration, not by placing artificial barriers in the way of those who want to go to our towns, but by offering greater inducements to them to stay on the land, where, by their knowledge and education, they can use their abilities with the best advantage to themselves and to their country. I believe the House would welcome any experiment, if it were only to raise the fringe of the pall which is lying over industry in far too many parts of our country. I can only thank the House for the kind and considerate manner in which it has listened to me. There is a lengthy list of measures to come before the House, and if I do not deal with them it will be out of consideration for the time of the House, and out of consideration for my hon. and learned Friend who will follow me, to whose legal mind it will be seen at once many of the subjects especially lend themselves. I may only hope that there are those to follow whose rising in this House is anticipated with eagerness, and whose words are listened to with the respect they deserve. I hope I have avoided referring to anything which may raise unnecessary controversy, and also that nothing I have said will tend, in the slightest degree, to prevent the House passing, at an early moment, the Address which I now have the honour of moving.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as followeth:—

Most Gracious Sovereign,

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the gracious speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament:

We take this first opportunity of offering to Your Majesty our sincere condolence in the afflicting dispensation of Providence with which Your Majesty and this Nation have been visited, in the death of His Royal Highness Prince Albert Victor, Duke of Clarence and Avondale:

We assure Your Majesty of our heartfelt participation in the universal feeling of sympathy with Your Majesty and Your Majesty's family under this grievous affliction, and in the deep sense entertained by all classes of Your Majesty's subjects of the calamity which the country has sustained by the loss of a Prince who had won for himself the general affection and regard of Your Majesty's subjects."

*(6.23.) MR. MILVAIN (Durham), who wore Court dress: I cordially endorse the eloquent terms in which my hon. and gallant Friend has spoken in reference to the painful announcement of the death of His Royal Highness the Duke of Clarence and Avondale. We, indeed, deeply participate in the terrible sorrow which Her Majesty the Queen and her family have sustained in the loss of the young Prince, whose life at a moment so singularly unfortunate has been taken away. That a Prince, the future heir to the Throne of this country, full of life, hope, and vigour, conscious of, and anxious to perform the responsible duties which would fall upon him, on the eve of the consummation of what he regarded as his earthly happiness, should be snatched away by the hand of death is a tragedy more painful and more cruel than has ever been recorded in the pages of fiction. It is not only in that respect we would as loyal and faithful subjects extend our sympathy to Her Majesty and to her family, but as those possessing human instincts sorrowing with loving and devoted parents who, after patient and anxious watching, mourn over the death of their firstborn. The hand of death, Mr. Speaker, has played much havoc in the rank and file of public men in this country during the last few months; and I cannot pass away from this mournful subject without some reference to the loss this House and the country has sustained by the death of our late leader, Mr. Smith. His kind and courteous manner, his ever faithful obedience to the calls of his country, will make his place a difficult one to fill. But when we turn away from those whose deaths the country deplores — has not the country reason to congratulate itself that there are men of courage and ability capable of taking their places, whether it be as Royal Prince to perform the duties of the future heir to the Throne of England, or statesman to undertake those still more arduous and responsible ones of leading one of the great Parties of the State. May I now pass to other subjects mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. That the relations of this country continue to be friendly with other Powers is always a satisfactory announcement to Her Majesty's subjects, and particularly to the trading population of this Empire. That the dispute between Canada and the United States of America in reference to the seal fishing in Behring Sea is to be referred, I believe, to the arbitration of five lawyers of neutral Powers, is information which cannot fail to be acceptable to the country. It is a policy, Sir, which ought always to be followed by Great Britain, Canada, and the United States, connected as they are by the ties of relationship, to settle such disputes as are calculated to create friction, in a manner at once impartial and friendly. The country is to be congratulated on the acquisition of a free port at Zanzibar. Before quitting this part of Her Majesty's Speech, may I express my satisfaction at the policy which has enabled Her Majesty to give such assurances, so acceptable to her subjects, for, in my opinion, it is one of the functions of Government, if not the chief, to maintain an honourable peace; to seek for and provide additional free markets for our industry, and to encourage her subjects to embark in commercial enterprise under the assurance that the flag under which they trade shall be honoured, and that they may enjoy in security the fruit of their labours. As is usual, the Estimates for the Public Services are to be prepared on sound and economical financial lines, so far, I should hope, as is consistent with efficiency. But Her Majesty's faithful Commons are not generally economisers of the public time in their laudable ambition to be defenders of the public purse. I turn to that part of the Speech which deals with the legislative proposals for the Session; and I am pleased to see it is the intention of the Government to apply to Ireland the principle of local government on the same lines as have been followed in England and Scotland, where they have operated so satisfactorily. Many of us, and I among them, have advocated on the platform and elsewhere the equality of the treatment of Ireland whenever she may be prepared to receive it, and I am glad, Sir, that it is apparent from Her Majesty's Speech that that time has now arrived; and I feel sure that the details of this measure will be awaited with the greatest interest, not only by those whose avowed policy it is to capture every representative institution as a stepping stone to ulterior political objects, but by those also who for these reasons think there ought to be certain safeguards against extravagance, maladministration and oppression. We are asked to consider a Bill in reference to Irish education. If my memory serves me aright, some £200,000 was voted last year, and allocated to this purpose. Here, again, is another instance of that equality of treatment to which I have referred. Largely assisted education has been extended to Scotland and England, and has worked exceptionally well. I know it will be a satisfaction to those who feared for the existence of the voluntary system of education to know that the system is in no danger, but can be shown to stand on a firmer foundation than ever it did before. Compulsory education, I think, at the present time, does not extend to Ireland; but for the same reason, equality of treatment with England and Scotland, I hope there may be some modified system of compulsory education introduced into Ireland, to apply to those districts which are ready for it. To Scotland and to Ireland it is proposed to introduce a modification of the existing system of procedure on Private Bills. A Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament was appointed some years ago, and reported in favour of a devolution of the duties of Committees of both Houses to a local Commission. Scotchmen and Irishmen complain of the expense and delay of bringing the parties up to Westminster, and they complain of the waste of time on the part of their public and business men from the same cause, and they maintain that a Commission on the spot would be better informed regarding the desirability of proposed public works. The grievance is a genuine one, and I hope it may prove an additional reason for facilitating this legislation, in that thereby Members of this House will be relieved from some of the burdens that fall upon them as servants of the public. To India it is proposed to extend some of the principles of representative institutions, which may be productive of freer discussion and expression of opinion, and thus bring their Councils into closer touch with the Home Government. Proposals are to be made for improving the discipline of the clergy of the Church of England. It being the especial duty of the clergy to look after the moral and religious welfare of their people, a measure calculated to promptly remove a clergyman found guilty of an offence against the criminal law of the State or against public morality while discharging his sacred functions must undoubtedly commend itself not only to members of the Church of England, but also to all persons professing Christianity, and to those who profess to interest themselves in improving the moral tone of the people. I hope that circumstances may permit us to amend the law relating to evidence by enabling accused persons to be examined on their trial. To my mind such an amendment of the law is imperative. Recent circumstances have impressed this strongly on my mind. A man was recently tried for one of those offences on which it is admissible for the accused to give evidence. He gave that evidence, and the jury acquitted him of the charge brought against him. But immediately afterwards he was charged with perjury committed in giving that evidence. He was tried for perjury, and upon that trial it was not admissible for him to give his own statement on oath in relation to the charge. It is imperative, I say, that the law as to evidence should be made general, otherwise the law which is meant to protect the freedom of the individual may be, as it was in this instance, made an instrument of persecution. I hope, too, that time may permit us to put the law relating to the liability of employers for personal injuries suffered by the employed on a permanent and more satisfactory basis. To extend the liberties of our people both at home and abroad, to remedy legitimate grievances, to increase the material well-being of our people, and to raise their moral and religious tone, is a programme of legislation on the principles of which we ought to be, and I believe we are, all agreed. Will it be too much to hope then that, for the time being, Party acrimony may be laid aside in this—possibly the last—Session of the present Parliament, and that we may unite in passing into law measures so well calculated to benefit the whole of the community. I have great pleasure in seconding the Address in reply to the Gracious Speech which has been moved by my hon. and gallant Friend.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That," &c. [See page 51.]

(6.40.) SIR WILLIAM HAROURT (Derby): The first duty that devolves upon me to-night, in the regretted absence of my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Gladstone), is to express the deep sympathy of gentlemen sitting on this side of the House in the mournful subject which occupies the first portion of the Speech from the Throne, as I am sure it occupies the first place in the heart of the nation. That painful subject has been referred to with much eloquence and propriety by the Mover and Seconder of the Address, and I am sure I am speaking the sentiments of gentlemen who sit on both sides of the House when I say that the duty delegated to them has never been performed with more grace and greater propriety than on the present occasion. Of the Mover of the Address I will say that the ability and eloquence he has displayed makes us regret that we have not more often heard him in our debates before. The hon. Gentleman who seconded will allow me to congratulate him upon the ability which he has exhibited in his speech to-night, an ability with which we are more acquainted. As regards the first paragraph in the Speech, I cannot but feel that in its wording we hear something more than the ordinary and formal expression of grief. I think we seem to recognise in it the personal accents of the sorrow of the Queen. Her Majesty may be assured that in the language of the Speech the House of Commons deeply participates in her distress. It would ill represent the nation of which it claims to be the principal representative if the House of Commons did not express to-night to the Sovereign the deep sympathy of her people. The people have not forgotten, they constantly and gratefully remember, how under the burden of many years and many sorrows Her Majesty has faithfully discharged her duty to the nation over which she rules. Few people are aware of the wearisome daily toil, the various and constant anxiety which occupies the life of the head of such an Empire as this, and few but those who have to endure it can know how great a weight is added to these labours by the pressure of domestic grief. In all the changes and chances which have befallen this great realm during Her Majesty's long reign, the Queen has ever been the first to sympathise in the perils and sorrows of her subjects. Ever since that great calamity which descended on her 30 years ago, a sorrow which, while it made her a widow, still left her Queen, she has had to discharge those great duties alone. The strong arm and wise counsel upon which she rested so fondly have been long withdrawn. She has had to bear alone the great burden of Empire; and how faithfully, how unselfishly, how devotedly she has constantly discharged those duties is in the mind of this House, and dwells in the hearts of the people. In a touching and melancholy message she lately addressed to her people, the Queen has spoken pathetically of other sorrows that have befallen her family. She has told us there is none equal to this. The hand of death has fallen on the direct line of her succession, under circumstances most sudden and most heartrending, in the midst of bright hopes now quenched, amid happy expectations for the future, happy anticipations, now buried in the grave. The Duke of Clarence had but a short time in which to make himself known to the people at large, but of him it may be truly said that those who knew him best loved him most. There was a gentle straightforward simplicity in his character, and a sympathetic kindness of disposition which made him the friend and favourite of all his companions, and which one day would have endeared him to the nation over which he was destined to rule. Of the sorrow of his parents, the Prince and Princess of Wales, it is difficult to speak; it is far easier to feel than to utter the sentiments which belong to that bitter anguish of those who have lost their first-born—probably the greatest sorrow that can enter the palace or the hut. In this, at least, we may truly say that the nation grieves with their grief. The Prince and Princess of Wales have made themselves beloved by the English people, the one by his dignified courtesy and kindness to all, the other by her tender heart and her matchless grace, and they deeply enlist the sympathy of the people with a sentiment of almost personal attachment. There is one other figure which the Mover of this Address referred to in very appropriate terms: I mean the young Princess who was a mourner before she became a bride, whose affections and hopes were welcomed and shared by the sympathy of the nation, which read in them bright auguries of future happiness and love. All these have been blighted in the bud, and to her out of the warmth of its sympathy and commiseration I am sure this House will send a message of condolence. All I have more to say is that in every part of the House I am sure the paragraph of condolence to the Queen will receive hearty and cordial acquiescence. There is one other topic of sad reflection which I cannot pass over in silence. We miss from the front bench opposite the late Leader of the House, whom we remember with personal regard and with high esteem, and whom we have lost with great regret. His invariable courtesy, his native good humour, his singular tact, and his habitual good sense made him loved and followed by his friends, liked, and respected by his political opponents. There have been, no doubt, men of greater oratorical powers and higher intellectual gifts in that position; there have been none, I think, who more faithfully and honourably discharged the duties of that high and difficult position he was called upon to fill, and which he well fulfilled. I may, perhaps, be allowed to say in one sentence that we recognize the claims of his successor to the place which he holds. The Leadership of the House of Commons is, in my opinion, the highest position which a subject can hold, and is one which requires high qualifications. No doubt in the course of our debates in the honourable contest of Parliamentary warfare we shall often cross swords with the right hon. Gentleman; but we shall always be ready to render to him, as we shall expect from him, every assistance in maintaining the dignity and privileges of this House, and in conducting the affairs of the House of Commons to its own honour and to the advantage of the country. Now, turning to other parts of the Speech, I do not think that upon foreign affairs it is necessary that I should make any special remark. We look upon it as highly satisfactory that the complexion of peace should preside over the report from the Sovereign of our relations with foreign countries. I shall not be tempted, even by some remarks which fell from the Mover of the Address, to enter upon the disputed question of Egypt to-night; but before I go to what may be considered probably the principal topics suggested in the Speech let me refer to one topic upon which, carefully as the hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion went through the list, neither he or the hon. Gentleman the Mover said a single word.

This topic lies apparently in a dark corner at the end of the Speech, but it is a matter of enormous consequence, if it mean anything at all. That neither the Mover or Seconder had anything to say upon the Bill for revising the existing arrangements between the Government and the Bank of England is certainly most remarkable. Revising the existing arrangements between the Government and the Bank of England! Why, this means—if it mean anything at all—the repeal of the Bank Charter of Sir Robert Peel of 1844, and the substitution of a new system of currency for this country. Now, that may be a good or a bad thing to do, but it is no small thing to be put into an obscure corner of a Speech from the Throne, no notice being taken of it. I have heard members of the Government to-night give notice of the Bills they propose to introduce; but I did not hear the Chancellor of the Exchequer express any intention of bringing forward this question of currency. The remarkable point is that this is the one novelty in the Speech. The other subjects make but a catalogue of remanets. They are old familiar friends, who have appeared on the scene from time to time, they are ancient promises which have never been fulfilled, and are perhaps predestined for the fate which has in previous years overtaken them. I do not know what the Government regard as the principal measures of the Session. I hope we shall hear what are the Bills it is intended first to proceed with, how the right hon. Gentleman means to proceed with them, and in what way their progress is intended to be conducted. I observe a remarkable contrast between the view of the Government this Session and that which was put forward last year. When there were two important Bills laid before us—the Land Bill and the Tithes Bill—we were told it was necessary to read these a second time before Christmas; we should now like to know what are the more important among the Bills indicated which we shall be asked to read a second time before Easter. But going back again to this agreement with the Bank of England I have this to say, that I think it is no light matter to be hung up, to be dangled in the air. These projects for revolutionising the currency of the country deeply affect all commercial undertakings, and they keep the monied classes in a state of feverish anxiety. What I am disposed to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer is whether he means business or not? Now, the position in which he has placed himself is a singular and I think an unfortunate one. For three years—I think I am right—in succession, bearing in mind the restoration of the gold coinage to a proper condition, he has postponed that measure, because it was necessary to connect it with a reform of the system of currency in this country. On that ground it has year after year been postponed. Last year I reluctantly consented to a temporary measure of reform of the gold coinage, which has not, I believe, up to this time been carried out. Then came the great Baring panic and scare, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not go to the House of Commons, but makes an after-dinner speech at Leeds, in which he propounds a scheme for the reform of the currency of the country. Well, that infant had but a short unhealthy life. It never came before the House of Commons after being exhibited to the merchants in Leeds; it was made away with by its own parent. Then the right hon. Gentleman has come forward with another scheme, which again, I hope, he is going to tell us will be brought before the House of Commons. It has, at all events, been produced as an essay before some commercial circles in the City of London; but I am not sure that it was well understood or warmly accepted. Now, what is the foundation of all these dealings, or, rather, nibblings, at the currency of the country? The right hon. Gentleman stated—and a graver statement by a Finance Minister of this country could not be made—that he considered the banking system of this country unsatisfactory and unsafe. He said the bank reserves were insufficient, and that great peril might naturally result from this condition of things. Well, if that be so, then the Finance Minister of this country is bound to take the earliest opportunity to bring forward a measure to deal with this danger. That is a proposition not to be disputed. No such measure has been laid before the House. It is true he has said in his speeches that he has induced the bankers to keep larger reserves ; he has said that the reserves are insufficient. I should like to know when he is prepared to say that he would consider the reserves of the banks to be sufficient ? I must take this opportunity of protesting against the Chancellor of the Exchequer throwing out a succession of speculative schemes for dealing with what he calls "the great financial dangers of this country"—schemes which are calculated to disturb the mind of everybody ; and the remarkable part of the matter is, that in not one of them does he propose to deal with the danger. He has admitted that the powers must be of a very interdictory character ; and they go only to increasing the gold in the Issue Department of the Bank of England. The Leeds scheme has gone ; the scheme of the Second Reserve is admitted to be imperfect ; what has become of the last scheme ? The last scheme was propounded by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the City ; there was a formal meeting there of merchants and bankers, and I should say that to take the opinion of merchants and bankers upon a matter in which they have different interests to those of the community is not the manner in which a question of this kind should be dealt with. But what happened when this discussion took place ? An hon. Member opposite could tell the House something about it ; but the upshot of it was, that when this measure was mentioned a gentleman, as far as I can understand, moved the Previous Question upon the scheme of the Exchequer, and it was ordered to be read a second time that day six months. My object in making these observations is to induce the Chancellor of the Exchequer to tell the House of Commons and the country what he is going to do about the currency of England. If he will allow me to say so without offence, he has gone on fumbling with the currency question. That is not the way in which the great questions of the finance of this country have been dealt with by financiers of former times. When the great measure for regulating the specie bullion of this country took place there was a Bullion Committee appointed, and the Bullion Committee and the Government acted upon their own responsibility in 1826, when the one - pound notes were abolished. That was upon the responsibility of the Government of the day. When the Bank Charter came, which has preserved the commercial system of this country for half a century, Sir Robert Peel took upon himself the responsibility of the measure ; he did not go hawking this measure about at City meetings or in after-dinner speeches, seeking if he could get anybody to take it ; there was a Motion made, and he gave to the House of Commons a measure which, on the responsibility of the Government, they were ready to present for the acceptance of Parliament and of the nation. And I do think that we should have done with this tentative system of dealing with this question, and that the right hon. Gentleman should tell us, as Financial Ministers have told us in former days, what he is going to do ? The present system is intolerable. Here is the Chancellor of the Exchequer telling the country that their financial system is unsound ; that their banking system is insufficient ; and yet we have no responsible measure brought forward by the Government for dealing with a matter which is of the most serious kind. Therefore, especially because nothing has been said by the Mover and Seconder upon this question, I venture to say that we should be told by the Government what they are really going to do in the matter. There is another very important matter dealt with in this Speech, and that is English Local Government. I have seen a good many Queen's Speeches in my time, I am sorry to say ; but I do not think I ever saw a subject introduced in a less encouraging manner than this has been on the present occasion, showing that the Government had no real intentions of giving effect to it, or indeed any desire that it should pass into law ; because the Speech says that "it may be possible to consider the provisions of an English Local Government Bill." If this is all the Government can say on the first night of the Session I think the augury is unfavourable. I am not very much surprised at that. The Mover spoke with much warmth and enthusiasm in favour of some measure of that kind. He has the advantage of being younger than the First Minister of the Crown; but I cannot say that the language employed by the Prime Minister the other day at Exeter showed any great desire for the promotion of such a measure. He spoke in a manner which may be described as modest. He holds himself responsible for qualified assistance in the creation of County Councils, and probably if he had the opportunity he would be responsible for creating District Councils; but he is quite sure in both cases he would be responsible for considerable addition to the rates. When language of this kind is used, I should be greatly disappointed if the measure were passed into law. He says District Councils will add to the rates, without any more effective remedy than that which for centuries has worked perfectly well, so that the Local Government is to be an expensive substitute for what has for centuries worked fairly well. Further, he says, "I do not see that independent Councils will do any particular harm beyond raising the rates," so that I cannot see how he could have more effectually thrown cold water upon the measure than he has done by this language. I do not know whether he regards those District Councils as places of amusement; but I have always regarded them, and I have always heard them spoken of, as a means of safeguarding and fostering in the rural districts an interest in the management of local affairs among a class that have little to vary the monotony of their daily toil; we hoped that Councils of that description would be a source of independence and self-reliance; that they would acquire a habit of dealing with matters concerning their own interests; and I confess I think it a little unfortunate that these things should be sneered at in this lordly way. I will remind the Prime Minister of the lines of a poem with which we are all acquainted.

"Nor grandeur hear with a disdainful smile
The short and simple annals of the poor."

Sir William Harcourt

And I think if he had recollected those lines he would have abstained from indulging in the sneer with which he has referred to this question. I am delighted to see on the opposite bench an eminent comrade of my right hon. Friend, the Minister of Agriculture. We all remember the eloquent and able part he took in the memorable debate on the Address in 1886. Well, I hope that this Bill is conceived, and I feel sure it is conceived, in a very different spirit from that in which the Prime Minister treated it; because he said of these small holdings, "They will not operate to any great degree in relieving the particular sufferings of the poorer classes." That is just what we wish they should do; but Lord Salisbury apparently has other objects; he thinks if he could only get a sufficient number of small holdings they might combine together and put permanent rates upon taxpayers of this country, rates which have always been charged upon the land, like the tithe, subject to which it has been bought and sold for centuries. They propose to put it upon the taxpayers, and then there is talk by these gentlemen of "spoliation of the rights of property." I hope when the right hon. Gentleman opposite comes to introduce his Bill we shall find that this Bill has been conceived in a very different spirit from that. Lastly, I wish to touch upon the subject of Irish Local Government. We should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman the course he intends to take in regard to that Bill. Does he mean to read it a second time before Easter, or does he not? What is to be the conduct of business in respect to this matter? It is hardly necessary to say in regard to the general policy of Local Government for Ireland that it is one which we favour and have always wished to see carried out; and if a genuine and honest measure for extending Local Government to Ireland is brought forward, certainly we shall have no indisposition to give our support to this measure. But, at the same time, we should desire to say that we, of course, upon this side do not regard the question of Local Government as settling the question of self-government for Ireland. We have always regarded this as a separate thing; both necessary, and not as one excluding the other. In fact, ever since the question of Home Rule has been raised it has been perfectly well recognised, and Local Government will not meet the demands, at all events of those who advocate the principles of Home Rule. I can quote no higher authority upon that subject than my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). On the 14th March, 1887, speaking at Birmingham, he said—and he was speaking in condemnation of Home Rule—"We believe"—and I would ask the attention of the House to these words—

"We believe, and no one stated it more clearly than Lord Hartington, that the situation depends upon the actions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, and that in the future it would be useless to talk of measures which would have been sufficient before, and that we are bound to consider now from a higher and wider standpoint the requirements for making more extensive concessions, and accordingly our position was that while we were willing to agree in the future to the creation of some legislative authority in Dublin, in accordance with Mr. Gladstone's proposals, we would not consent to a scheme so long as the safeguards provided by Mr. Gladstone were in our opinion totally illusory."

That was what the right hon. Gentleman said. Since the introduction of the Home Rule Bill in 1886 there was no use of talking of limited measures. My right hon. Friend is now in a position to aid largely in the elucidation of this question, and I should like to see his Bill for a legislative authority in Dublin upon Mr. Gladstone's principle, with the safeguards which he would think it necessary to introduce in it. But whether it is a question of Local Government or of Home Rule, what I think we have to consider is the spirit in which this House and the Government are about to approach the question of dealing with the people of Ireland. After all, that is quite as important as any detail, or as any clause of the Bill; and as upon the Address, not only the measures indicated in the Speech but also the conduct of the Executive Government is subject for criticism and comment, I cannot conclude what I have to say without asking the attention of the House and the country to the spirit and the language in which the Prime Minister recently referred to this question. It was in a speech made a few days ago, in which the principal question treated of was the equal treatment of England and Ireland in the matter of Local Government. Now, the Mover of the Address in his language left nothing to be desired; but what a contrast is there to the spirit and tone in which the Prime Minister of this country went so far as to heap insult upon the majority of the people of Ireland. In dealing with the question of how the people of Ireland are to be treated, Lord Salisbury said of the majority of the people of Ireland that they contain "all that is backward and all that is retrogressive; all that is contrary to civilisation and enlightenment." [Cheers.] I hear the cheers of Members for Ulster upon that speech; and I hear the Solicitor General cheer. The Solicitor General will have to retract that cheer, as he has had to retract many things both of law and fact. [Laughter and counter cheers.] I am glad, at least, that the Prime Minister has one faithful supporter and cheerer in his Solicitor General. Having thus degraded the majority of the people of Ireland—the people to whom we are going to give Local Government and equal rights to the people of England—I should like to see the Prime Minister address the same language to the English people. Then he proceeds with a violent invective against the Catholics and their Bishops; the Archbishops he stigmatises by name—somewhat unusual language, I believe, to be used by a person in the position of the Prime Minister. The Catholic people of Ireland he says have fought against us when we quarrelled with Spain, when we quarrelled with France, and when we quarrelled with America. Will the Solicitor General consider that language displays political wisdom on the part of a statesman? I will say something of that presently; but this I will say now, that those statements are absolutely unfounded in history, as they are unstatesmanlike in character. I have here somewhere a passage in which I could convince the House absolutely of that. You have only to go to a writer whom we all respect—

Mr. Lecky—and you will find that he states that in the troubles of 1715, the troubles of 1745, and in the great war against France, which ended in the peace of 1763, the Catholics of Ireland took no part against England. You will find it stated by Mr. Lecky that throughout the whole of the eighteenth century, far from its being true that the Catholics of Ireland were the cause of the disturbance, that it was the Presbyterians and Protestants who were at the bottom of the revolution. If you mention the names of the great revolutionists of Ireland—such as Wolfe Tone, and others—you will find they are not the names of Catholics, but of Protestants. In the great struggle of the American War everybody knows it was the Presbyterians, who largely colonised America, that got sympathy for America in Ireland, and that with the Protestants of the North and not with the Catholics of the South; while we all know what took place between Mr. Pitt and the Catholic Bishops of Ireland. Therefore this statement, that the Catholics as distinguished from the Protestants of Ireland were the enemies of this country is historically false, is one which ought never to have been advanced; and, in my opinion, a more unjustifiable, or a more detestable attempt for Party purposes to create ill-feeling and rancour between different parts and portions of people of the United Kingdom has never been recorded. I should like to ask the House what it should have thought if the Governor General of Canada had made such a speech reflecting upon the Canadian people? There you have two races and two religions; you have them enjoying that Home Rule for which Ireland is declared to be unfitted. If the Governor General of Canada had made a speech in which he said the Catholic population contained all that was backward, and all that was contrary to civilisation and enlightenment—supposing he had tried to revive memories of the Canadian rebellion; and supposing he had denounced the Canadian people, their religion and their priesthood, what would have been done? You would not only have been asked to dismiss him. He would have been packed off, and you would not have been asked to send another in his place. If this had been an Indian question would the Viceroy have held this language? And for what purpose is this language employed? It is to show that though the majority may rule, and does rule, in England, though the majority does rule in Canada and in Australia, it should not rule in Ireland—first, on account of the inferiority of the race; and, secondly, because of the influence and character of the priests. Therefore, it is not the majority that is to rule in Ireland, but the minority. The minority is to rule in virtue of the superiority of their race and the preferable character of their religion; and the influence of the Catholic priesthood is to be destroyed by a Protestant nation and by a Government which sent the Duke of Norfolk on a Mission to the Vatican. It is the pure unmitigated doctrine of a race domination and a Protestant ascendancy. The language of Lord Salisbury shows that the Government of this country is the Government of an Orange Lodge. The oath of supremacy and allegiance that ought to be tendered at this Table is the "glorious, pious and immortal memory," and the Chief Secretary ought to appear in this House sitting astride the great gun of Athlone. That is really the natural consequence of such language. It is because the Union is regarded by the Unionists from this point of view that it is detested, and justly detested, by the people of Ireland. There is no country and no people in this world that would not resent and resist to the utmost of their power treatment such as is represented by this language. If the Irish people are not your enemies it is certainly not because men like Lord Salisbury have not done their best to make them so. There is another view of this question. What do you suppose is likely to be the effect of this brutal and tyrannical language on the population of our Empire abroad? I have pointed out what would be the effect if language of this kind were applied to Hindostan. Why, even the Hottentots of the Cape receive more considerate treatment than the Hottentots of Ireland. But what will the Irish people and the Irish Catholics in Canada think of this language? What will the Irish Catholics in Australia think of it? And, to my mind, there is a matter more important than all. There is a country whose friendship and goodwill are of more momentous importance to this country than all the European alliances—the friendship and goodwill of the United States of America. It is of the highest importance to us that we should cultivate the friendly feeling and goodwill of every part of the population of that great nation. The Irish Catholics are a very important element in the feeling and power of the United States of America. The sentiments expressed by the Chief of the Government of England and Ireland for the present moment will very sensibly tend to affect those populations. What do you suppose is likely to be the effect on American sentiment and feeling of language such as this? If you desired deliberately to breed ill will in America towards Great Britain you could not take a measure that could be more effectual for that purpose. Suppose the Ruler of Germany were to address any of his populations in this fashion; suppose he said to the Catholic people of Bavaria—which enjoys Home Rule to a far larger extent than will even be demanded for Ireland—suppose he were to tell them that they were very inferior to the Protestants of North Germany, and were not entitled to be treated on the same footing as other parts of the population. For us, at least, one duty is plain. The Party which sits on this side of the House is the Party that for generation after generation, and at the cost of political power for year after year, has maintained the doctrine not only of civil freedom, but of religious equality. We denounce the spirit by which language of this sort is dictated. The Liberal Party first demanded and obtained religious equality for the Non-conformists, afterwards for the Catholics, then for the Jews, and lastly in the struggle in which you engaged against the late Mr. Bradlaugh, when you had to efface your own vote from your Journals. I speak of the principles to which we have always adhered, and which we have perpetually maintained. I should like to ask, where are the Whigs on this subject? If there ever was a subject to which the Whigs by tradition and principle were bound, it is this question of religious equality. Where are the men who profess—shall I say who pretend—to be the representatives of the principles of Burke? What was it that Burke taught with reference to the Catholics of Ireland? The principles of Fox, Grey, Grenville, and Russell. Where are the Fitzwilliams, the Carlisles, and the Cavendishes? Are the Whigs prepared to sacrifice these principles, as they have thrown overboard all the rest? I hope not. But if they are, we need not wonder why they are perishing out of the land, why they have ceased to influence the people amongst whom they were once a power, and why, like the Greeks of the Lower Empire, they will carry a memorable name to an unhonoured grave. Before I sit down I should like to read one passage. It is not from a Whig authority, but you will respect it none the less. It has been often quoted, but I will quote it once more. It gives a different view and a different reading of the causes of the evils of Ireland. It does not trace those evils to inferiority of race, or to the evils of its religious belief. These are the words—

"What is the reason that a people with so bounteous a soil, and such enormous resources as the Irish, lag so far behind the English race? Some say it is to be found in the character of the Celtic race. But I look to France, and I see a Celtic race going forward there with the most rapid strides. Some people say it is to be found in the Roman Catholic religion. But I look to Belgium, and there I see a people second to none in Europe, except English, for industry, singularly prosperous, considering the small piece of country they occupy, having improved to the utmost the natural resources of the country, and distinguished among all the people of Europe for the earnestness and intensity of their Roman Catholic belief. Therefore, I cannot say that the cause of Irish distress is to be found in the Roman Catholic religion. An hon. Friend near me says it arises from listening to demagogues. I have as much dislike to demagogues as he has; but when I look to the Northern States of America I see there a people who listen to demagogues, and who show no want of material prosperity. Therefore we cannot attribute it to demagogues, to Romanism, or to the Celtic race. What, then, is it? I am afraid the one thing that has been peculiar to Ireland has been the Government of England."

These are the words of Lord Robert Cecil, and I commend them to the conscience of Lord Salisbury. Unless the proposed legislation which you tell us you are going to bring forward in the interests of Ireland—this Local Government for Ireland—this treatment of Ireland on an equal footing with England—unless your legislation is to be conceived in a spirit and with objects exactly opposite and the reverse of the spirit proclaimed by the Prime Minister of England, then I venture to say your legislation, whatever it may be, will be doomed to failure and disappointment.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Mr. Speaker, whatever the House may think of the last three-quarters of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down—and on that I shall have to say a few words presently—at all events they listened, I feel certain, with perfect agreement to the eloquent passage with which he began his observations. He dwelt, as my two hon. Friends who moved and seconded the Address dwelt before him, and in language not less touching and not less eloquent than they, upon that paragraph in the Speech from the Throne in which Her Majesty speaks of the sorrow which has lately fallen upon the Royal Family. Surely, through all the many generations in which the people of this country have desired to make the joys of the ruling family their joys, and the sorrows of the ruling family their sorrows, there never has been a case in which public and official mourning has gone more nearly to the hearts and sentiments of the people of this country. To a nation who, like us, regard the Royal Family with feelings of personal loyalty and affection, and who not only do so, but regard them also as in some sort the representatives and embodiment of the great history and traditions of a free country, the death of any Prince in the direct succession to the Throne must surely be an occasion of bitter grief, and yet this has been aggravated in the present case by almost every circumstance which could add tragic significance to the event. An untimely fate has cut off the future heir to the Throne in the flower of youth, and at a time when national preparations were being made for an event which we all looked forward to with most happy anticipations. Such circumstances must appeal to all. Some there may be to whom political struggles, the rise and fall of Empires, and the fate of dynasties may seem things remote from the ordinary joys and the ordinary sufferings of common life; but even to them, and perhaps more to them than to others, the fate which has overtaken the Duke of Clarence must have appealed with overwhelming pathos. Thus it is, Sir, that we, the Commons of England, have taken this first opportunity of expressing our sympathy with the Queen, not merely because we had looked forward with perfect assurance to the manner in which the Duke of Clarence would have fulfilled the great functions which seemed at one time in all probability likely to be entrusted to him, but also because we mourn with the Royal Family the death of the son, the grandson, the brother, and with one who was about to be united in even closer and tenderer relations to a member of the august family. We know that the loss has left the hearts and lives of many desolate in whose welfare we, the representatives of the people of Great Britain, take the deepest interest; and therefore it is, Sir, that we have with unanimity ventured to lay before the Throne our expression of heartfelt sympathy, knowing, though we do, that in these matters sympathy can do little, although it is the sympathy of the nation. One other subject I cannot forbear to touch upon, and I am emboldened to do so by the example which has been set both by my hon. Friends behind me and the right hon. Gentleman opposite. When last this House separated we had every ground for believing and hoping that the place of Leader of the House would on our re-assembling be filled by the well-known figure of Mr. Smith, by whom we had been so long and so ably led, and by whom our debates had been guided with such admirable tact, discretion and wisdom. It has happened otherwise, and the duties which he so well fulfilled have fallen upon one who, at all events, whatever his other shortcomings may be, desires nothing more earnestly than to walk in the footsteps of his predecessors. But though I do not desire, and think it would be inappropriate, to say one word on this occasion as to what Mr. Smith's loss has been to the Party, and especially to those who sit on this Bench; though I feel that it is not desirable to bring in the question of personal friendship and to dwell in public upon the loss we have personally sustained in the removal of one who was always ready with sympathy, advice and counsel, I still may be permitted to speak what I think will be the sentiments of hon. Gentlemen on all sides of the House as to his claims upon the admiration not of the Party merely to which he belonged, but upon the House at large. Those who think with me that to have any share in the conduct of the business of this Assembly is to have an opportunity, not merely of serving your Party, not merely of serving your country, but of doing something to raise the dignity or to maintain the position of Parliamentary institutions throughout the world, will agree with me in thinking that Mr. Smith, who died after all in the service of this House, has even more than the majority of the great line of his predecessors done his duty in maintaining the dignity and in promoting the usefulness of the greatest Representative Assembly in the world. I pass from these topics to the larger portion of the right hon. Gentleman's speech, which was concerned, I will not say with the Speech from the Throne, for he made few and scanty references to that, but in attacking the speeches made outside this House by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman was pleased to express surprise at some of the omissions which were made in the Queen's Speech. I feel some surprise at the omissions made in the speech in which he dealt with them. I had anticipated from what had fallen from distinguished colleagues of his own during the recess, though not from himself, that some comment would be made upon the paragraph about Egypt. I am glad to find that is not so, and I presume I may broadly take it that as the right hon. Gentleman has made no unfavourable comment on the paragraph, he feels himself in general agreement with the attitude taken up by Her Majesty's Government upon this difficult and important question. The right hon. Gentleman, however, did not even pay a passing reference to any question of foreign affairs. He skipped lightly over the various important items dealt with in the earlier part of the speech, and he fastened at once on the sentence which refers to a measure to be introduced by my right hon. Friend in relation to the rearrangement come to between the Government and the Bank of England. That sentence correctly describes the character of the measure which my right hon. Friend hopes to introduce. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman and his friends will be able to raise upon that all questions they think fit connected with currency questions; and my right hon. Friend himself will take the opportunity of giving to the House, and through the House to the country, a free exposition of his views upon the subject. But I fail to understand why the right hon. Gentleman has chosen to fall foul of my right hon. Friend on this occasion. The Bill is not before us in any shape.

Sir William Harcourt

SIR W. HARROD: It ought to be.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We cannot introduce a Bill before the Queen's Speech is disposed of. All that we have any cognisance of are the views which my right hon. Friend has put forward in one or two speeches upon the subject of the banking reserve and the currency. Why is my right hon. Friend to be attacked for making those speeches? It is perfectly true that Sir Robert Peel, as the right hon. Gentleman has told the House, did not make his scheme known to the public before he introduced it to the House of Commons, and what was the result. The result was that the banking world promptly attacked him for not having taken them into his confidence or consulted them and asked their opinions upon a subject which affected their interests, and on which they thought they were entitled to speak. On a subject permanently difficult, on which there are necessarily some divergence of interests, some divergence of views, my right hon.

Friend did well to explain his general attitude, and lay certain suggestions before the mercantile and banking community for their consideration, and there can be no more fitting preparation for discussions in this House of measures of that kind than the sort of preliminary debate that has gone on out of doors on the initiative of my right hon. Friend. Then the right hon. Gentleman went on to attack us for showing no zeal for a District Councils Bill to complete the policy of English Local Government so successfully initiated three years ago by the head of the Local Government Board. Well, the right hon. Gentleman is as good a judge of the capacity of this House to pass rapidly through its legislative work, and he can form as good a forecast as anyone else of the time it may take to pass the various measures mentioned in the Queen's Speech. The right hon. Gentleman is in specially favourable circumstances for prophecy, seeing that his own conduct will probably have a good deal to do with the way the prophecy turns out. Can it be maintained that the Government would have been justified in speaking in a tone of assured confidence of the passage of a District Councils Bill when they had before that Bill the Irish Local Government Bill, the Irish Education Bill, a Small Holdings Bill, an Indian Councils Bill, Private Bill Procedure, and other matters of equal importance. The Indian Councils Bill, I trust, will take no time, and I may omit that from the catalogue. Not one of the measures I have named ought to give way to a District Councils Bill, important though it undoubtedly is. If we are justified in putting before the District Councils Bill the long list of measures which I have enumerated, it would be the height of folly to pretend confidence that the Bill was sure to pass before the House separates in August. I suppose, by long prescription and tradition, Governments are justified in taking a very rosy view of the progress of legislation. Their anticipations, as far as my experience goes, have never erred on the pessimistic side. They have always taken an optimistic view; but even the optimism of the most optimistic Government never went the length that the right hon. Gentleman desires in supposing that they were sure to pass into law so long, so complicated, or so controversial a measure as that which my right hon. Friend will be prepared to introduce should any opportunity present itself. Having disposed as he thought of the out-of-door speeches the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to attack those made by the Prime Minister. I do not believe that there is a single sentence in the last twenty minutes which had even the thinnest reference to any measures mentioned in the Queen's Speech. It was an attack upon the Prime Minister and the Liberal Unionists, a familiar subject with the right hon. Gentleman, but an unusual one to introduce into the first speech from the Front Opposition Bench in discussing the Speech from the Throne. What were his accusations? He said the Prime Minister sneered at the poor because, forsooth, he did not anticipate that the result of the establishment of District Councils would be to prevent the emigration of the agricultural labourers from the rural districts to the urban. Off the platform, and uninspired by the rhetorical influence of a public meeting, would any man in his senses ever suppose that the establishment of a District Council or a Parish Council either—whatever merits it might have—would have the particular merit of inducing a man to stay in such a district when he could get better employment and improve his condition by leaving it? Surely such an idea never entered into the heart of man, though it has sometimes appeared in the perorations of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. If that be the opinion of the House, and if that be the opinion of the Prime Minister, is he not to be allowed to express that fact without being accused by the right hon. Gentleman of sneering at the poor? Let me tell the right hon. Gentleman that to sneer at the poor is one thing, and to sneer at the nostrums put forward under certain circumstances by certain quack politicians is quite another, and the distinction is one which should not be lost sight of. Then, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman went on to deal with Local Government. Here again, on the subject of Local Government in Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman in his speech devoted his attention to what the Prime Minister said—not on the subject of Local Government in Ireland—in the speech which he recently delivered at Exeter. I did not know that that speech of the Prime Minister was to be the subject of our debate to-night, and I did not furnish myself with a copy of it, and I can only judge of the accuracy of the right hon. Gentleman's attack by the version which he himself has given of it. It seems to me that, on the right hon. Gentleman's own showing, he did the Prime Minister the greatest injustice, and subjected him to the gravest misrepresentation. He read out, in the last part of his speech, perfectly fairly, an extract from the Prime Minister's speech, in which the Prime Minister is reported to have said that the majority in Ireland contains all that is most backward in the population. The right hon. Gentleman takes that phrase, and he twists it round until it comes, in his hands, to mean that the majority in Ireland is identical with all that is backward in Ireland. It is not a matter of attack upon any section of the Irish people; it is a question of fact. Is it or is it not true that in the majority—in the political majority of Ireland—are to be found the greater part of the population, of whom, by any test which ordinarily is applied to such matters would be described as the backward part of it? Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman himself read out an extract from an earlier speech of Lord Salisbury, in which he expressed agreement, in which he distinctly implied the same thing: because in that extract from his earlier speech Lord Salisbury pointed out that though a large portion of the people of Ireland are undoubtedly backward it is not to be attributed to this cause; so that the right hon. Gentleman himself does admit that a large portion of the majority of the population of Ireland are backward; and I think that he would hardly deny that amongst the population which is backward the greater number would be found to vote for the principles represented by the majority of the Irish Members in this House. Now, this is a plain matter of fact, and it is a matter of fact which cannot be got rid of, the importance of which cannot be over-rated, because if the result of Home Rule—God forbid that I should follow the right hon. Gentleman and discuss Home Rule on this occasion—if the result of Home Rule were to put the more prosperous and less backward part of the population under the control of the less prosperous and more backward part of the population, and if the political divisions of Ireland happened to coincide—as they do not coincide, so far as I know, in any other country in the world—with the divisions of which I have been speaking, the result would be, or might be—we think it would be—that the prosperous, advancing, and progressive minority might have their interests seriously imperilled by the action of those who, as a matter of fact, are less prosperous and more backward. Now, Sir, I do not mention this mere matter of statistical fact in order to excite or embitter feeling. I mention it simply to correct the right hon. Gentlemen's rhetoric, and show that in alluding to it the Prime Minister did not intend to embitter controversy, or to insult any section of the Irish people. He intended to bring to the notice of the electors of this country a fact which they are too often apt to forget, and it is that there is such a place in Ireland as Ulster, and that Ulster is not a place whose claims, whose rights, and whose future, ought to be lightly imperilled by the action of this House. With regard to what the right hon. Gentleman has said about embittering religious differences, I confess that my own opinion was that the only speech which has been delivered on this subject which was likely to embitter religious differences was the speech of the right hon. Gentleman himself. He evidently took into review every sentence of Lord Salisbury which could be twisted, perverted, or contorted into an attack upon those who profess the Roman Catholic religion, and in order that he might himself embitter for Party purposes the feelings of the Roman Catholic population of Ireland. For my own part I can, I think, safely say that never in all the controversies in which I have against my will been compelled to take part on the Irish question, never have I suggested anything which it has been alleged against me could be turned into an attack upon the Roman Catholic population of Ireland, as such. Nor do I believe that anything that ever has fallen from the Prime Minister is capable of a similar interpretation. But I recollect that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, some 15 or 20 years ago, did engage in a controversy upon the Roman Catholic question, in which he made statements of Roman Catholics as such, and the impossibility of their being good citizens, which might well cause offence, and deep offence, in the mind of every Roman Catholic. But I do not believe that a single word can be attributed to Lord Salisbury which would indicate that, in his opinion, because a man happened to be a Roman Catholic he either [was, or was likely to be, a less loyal subject or a less good subject of these realms. Sir, I have to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman took any precaution that a speech like the one he has just made would be delivered in the House of Lords, where it could be answered by the person whom it chiefly concerns. I presume that the leading members of the right hon. Gentleman's Party met, as it is customary upon these occasions, in order to discuss what line was to be taken in the Debate on the Address. I presume, then, that the right hon. Gentleman told his colleagues that he proposed devoting three - fourths of his oration to an attack on a speech made at a public meeting outside the walls of Parliament by a Peer; and I presume that the Leader of the right hon. Gentleman's Party in the House of Lords immediately said to him—“ You have a perfect right to do what you like in the House of Commons; but clearly the most appropriate place for this attack is the House of Lords. There the Prime Minister will be able to explain and defend his action. I will repeat to the best of my ability your point if you will allow me, and then we shall know exactly what it is the Prime Minister did mean, and what is the policy he presented.” I have no information from the other House as to when that step was taken. I can only regret that the duty, and I may add the pleasure, of replying to the right hon. Gentleman has fallen into my unworthy hands, and that he could not be immediately promoted to a sphere which I am sure he would adorn, in order that he might have at first hand a reply which I am sure would have a very convincing effect upon the right hon. Gentleman and his friends. As to the concluding observations which the right hon. Gentleman made about the causes of prosperity in Ireland and the mode by which we think the Imperial Parliament may best reach the goal which we all desire to attain, I have only to say that if I believed, as the right hon. Gentleman here believes, that in the policy which he has advocated lie the best hopes of public security and personal liberty, I would join the right hon. Gentleman's Party. It is because I believe just the contrary; it is because I believe that the Whigs, whose memory he has revived to-day, would have thought as we think, that the liberty and security of the individual is incomparably safer under the aegis of the Imperial Parliament than they could be under the guardianship—if guardianship is the word—of a Parliament in Dublin, be the safeguards by which you are going to secure them what you like. It is because I believe that all the best men of all parties in England would have held that view that I myself am determined now, and always, to do my best to resist that policy which the right hon. Gentleman has thought fit, without, so far as I see, any rhyme or reason, to discuss upon the present occasion. I will not travel further upon the road which he has pursued. It is enough that I feel myself justified in concluding, from the silence which the right hon. Gentleman maintained, both upon that part of the Speech which refers to foreign affairs and upon that part of it which refers to domestic legislation, that, so far, at all events, on these points, he sees little to criticise or blame in our action. I think that is a conclusion which I am warranted in drawing from the right hon. Gentleman's speech; and that being so, it is not necessary for me, I think, to follow him further into the very controversial matter which he could not restrain himself from making allusion to towards the latter part of his address. I hope I may take the right hon. Gentleman's observations upon the topics really raised in the Queen's Speech as some indication that the debate on the Address will not be of a very prolonged or acrimonious character, and that it is not on this occasion that we need anticipate any of those formal debates to which the Speech from the Throne has occasionally given rise. There is one question which the right hon. Gentleman put to me, and to which I will endeavour to give some reply. He asked me whether the Irish Local Government Bill would be read a second time before Easter. It is impossible for me to give any absolute pledge upon that subject. My hope is to introduce that Bill and the other leading Bills of the Government at the very earliest date, so as to give the very fullest opportunity to the House and the country of seeing their provisions. Then I hope we shall make rapid progress with the Bill of my right hon. Friend dealing with small holdings, and as soon as that Bill is in an advanced condition, not necessarily completed, I propose to read the Irish Local Government Bill a second time, and to proceed with that and other measures. The Bill will be introduced at once, immediately this debate is over. I hope that assurance, which the right hon. Gentleman will feel is as much as it is possible for me to give on the present occasion, will satisfy him and satisfy all the Members of the House.

*(852.) MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire) : I rise to call the attention of the House to a single paragraph in the Speech from the Throne, namely, that which deals with the re-introduction of the Bill for improving the Legislative Councils of India. I congratulate the Government in determining to deal with this important question, which is very well understood in India but very little understood in this House or in this country. This Indian Councils Bill, if adequately handled, will mark the most important stage in the government of India which has taken place since the beginning of the direct rule of the Crown. It is high time this Bill should be seriously dealt with. Great dissatisfaction exists in India at the delay which has taken place, and I hope the Government will place this Bill in the front rank of the measures which they mean to pass this Session, and will give us an opportunity of considering it before Easter. But if this Bill is to effect the purpose of conciliation, it should mark a very considerable advance on the previous Bills brought in by the Government. If it goes no further than these, I venture to think it will altogether fail to pacify the educated opinion of India, or to have that healthy influence which we all hope it will ultimately exert. The previous Bills were limited to the extension of the Indian Legislative Council by increasing the number of nominated members. A larger number of native members were to be nominated by the respective Governments. Sir, as one in close contact with the educated opinion of India, and fairly acquainted with the progress of events there, I am bound to say that unless the elective principle is in some way, some substantial way, introduced into this Bill, it will altogether fail to satisfy the people, or fulfil those purposes of better government which we all hope to bring about. What India needs is some authentic means of expressing its wishes to its rulers, and to get an authentic means it is absolutely necessary that we should concede in some form the principle of representation. What we want in India is independent criticism of the action of the Government in India. All Governments are better for being criticised, and most of all despotic and autocratic Governments, as our Government in India virtually is. It is impossible to get this criticism merely by means of nominated members, who cannot adequately represent the wishes and demands of the people. No measure would tend more to give stability to our rule in India, or give solidity to our Empire, than the establishment in India of a measure of representative government. There are in India nearly as many University graduates as there are in England. For several years great representative assemblies have been held in India, under the name of the Indian National Congress. Every one who has read the proceedings of that body will allow that for wisdom, moderation, and loyalty, they would do credit to this Parliament itself, or to any Legislative Assembly in the world. Now, Sir, this National Indian Congress is a very great political factor, a factor of the first magnitude; it cannot be ignored. It has raised in the most moderate and constitutional manner serious demands, and the principal of these—it may be said to lie at the basis of all the others—is one for elective representation on the great Councils of India. That is a loyal and constitutional demand which we must deal with sympathetically, if we wish to retain the goodwill of the large body of the people of India. Unless we do so we are preparing for ourselves a time of trouble in India, when seditious agitation may take the place of constitutional action. It would be immensely better to meet the natives of India half way. There is no use in disguising the fact that our Government of India is a species of despotism, as was plainly stated last Session by the former Under Secretary (Sir John Gorst). It is quite impossible that this system of government can continue in the nineteenth century, for it is absolutely out of harmony with those principles of which we are so proud in this country, and which we have applied to all our colonial dependencies, with the effect of making them thoroughly loyal. I admit that no one would think of placing the population of India on the same footing as the people of Canada or Australia; but there are in India a large number of educated persons who, by means of electoral machinery, might give great help in the government of the country. I am not proposing anything wild or revolutionary, but only what Lord Dufferin was in favour of before he left India. He declared that—"The time had come to give a still wider share in the administration of Indian public affairs to such Indian gentlemen as by their influence and acquirements, and the confidence they had inspired in their fellow-countrymen, were fitted to assist in the government of the country. Our scheme is a plan for the enlargement of Provincial Councils, and the multiplication of their functions by a partial introduction of the elective principle;"

and if the Bill which we hope to see introduced before long carries out this recommendation of one of the ablest Governor Generals we have ever had in India, it will go a long way towards satisfying the aspirations of the Indian people. The burden of the responsibility we have assumed in India is almost too heavy for any country to bear. We have constituted ourselves as a kind of national providence over 280,000,000 of people, and it is to our real interest to associate with ourselves a body of competent and able Indian gentlemen who will share with us this immense responsibility. I wish now to allude to the decisive condemnation of the opium trade passed by this House on the 10th of April last. That vote, I believe, truly expresses the feelings of the British people with regard to the whole subject; for none can doubt that there has been a growing feeling of uneasiness and discomfort in the conscience of the country in respect of the opium trade. The agitation is bound to go on until a totally different policy has been adopted. My hon. Friend (Mr. Curzon), who has assumed the responsibility of representing India in this House, and for whom I have nothing but the kindest and best wishes, will agree with me, I am sure, when I say that there is no chance that the people of this country will change the view which has been expressed in this House upon the character of the opium traffic. I rejoice to hear within the last few days that the Indian Government has promulgated, or is about to promulgate, a prohibition of all opium smoking dens, and we shall look upon that as a great victory in the cause of righteousness. It is a great gain, but it falls far short of all that is expected from the Government of India, and only touches the fringe of the subject. It will help some of the people of India; but what will it do to protect the multitudes of Chinese? There is only one way of dealing with the opium traffic that will satisfy the people of this country, and that is its abolition, so far as the power of the law will allow. I admit that this seems hardly possible to do at once, and I do not wish to press the Government for any hasty decision on the subject. I am aware that India is a miserably poor country, and is heavily taxed upon that necessary of life—salt—by a duty equal to 1,600 per cent. upon its prime cost ; and I am also aware that India is not able to bear the loss of the revenue it at present draws from the opium trade, nor would I advocate that we should throw upon India so huge a financial deficit. If we are to tackle this opium question in a broad and statesmanlike way, looking to its ultimate abolition, this country must be prepared to give temporary aid to India, and to make some sacrifice itself. I am opposed to saddling the cost of the abolition of this traffic upon the poor, half-starved millions of India, and I trust the Government will before long be able to make some comprehensive statement dealing with the whole question of the opium trade. Before sitting down I wish to say that I hope this expiring Session of a long Parliament may not be wasted in Party strife, but will be devoted to measures of lasting benefit to the people of this country.

Mr. Samuel Smith

(9.10.) COLONEL EYRE (Lincolnshire, Gainsborough Division) : We have been engaged this evening in expressing our sympathy with Her Majesty and the Royal Family in their recent bereavement, and I should like to extend that expression of sympathy to all those sorts and conditions of men who form the poorer classes in this country, and suffer as much as other classes, but have no means of participating in an expression of national sympathy, except through the House of Commons. I refer to those whose advent to, and exit from, this world is perhaps known only to the Registrar of the district ; but I feel that I am expressing the feeling of the whole House in making this allusion. In regard to the most Gracious Speech from the Throne, I find the stereotyped expression that we are at peace with all the world. It has become so common within the last few years that we look for it as a matter of annual certainty ; but perhaps we do not realize how difficult has been the position of the Foreign Office during the last few years. We see Europe one armed camp. From the north of Russia to the south of Italy every man either is, or has been, a soldier. All the laboratories in Europe are devoting their time to the elaboration of methods of destruction of human life ; yet, by some powerful hand, these nations have been prevented from flying at each other's throats. We may congratulate ourselves that the gates of the Temple of Janus are still closed, and that the dogs of war are not yet let loose upon the Continent. In olden times, Sovereigns used to consult their augurs as to the probabilities of the future. In these more prosaic days we consult the Money Market ; and, looking to that, I think we may anticipate a time of prolonged peace. But I attribute a great deal of this peace to the position our country has taken up during the last few years. Being a great commercial nation, representing three-fifths of the carrying power of the whole world, the Government have recognised the necessity for protecting its waterways through which the trade and commerce of this country comes ; and I believe that in increasing the strength of our Navy we have increased the security of our national trade, and tended enormously to secure the peace of the world. I am glad to find that the Government are going to introduce a Local Government Bill for Ireland, and I can only trust that it will be framed in the same generous spirit as the English Local Government Bill. But I feel that it is the exceptionally prosperous and peaceable condition of Ireland at the present time which enables the Government to bring forward this Bill, and I hope the result of its introduction will be to secure still more the prosperity of that country. From the gracious Speech of Her Majesty I find that the Government intend to bring in a Bill to increase the discipline of the Established Church in dealing with moral offences ; but I wish the discipline to be extended still further, for my experience teaches me that in the Church of England there is not that order that should be maintained. In the Army and Navy, discipline is very strict, and disobedience to orders is visited as it should be ; and I think some method should be adopted by means of which, in cases where the ministers in charge of parishes neglect to perform their duties in a proper and satisfactory manner, the Bishop should be able to interfere and bring them to a sense of duty without incurring the enormous expense which at present such proceedings involve. I trust that all the Bills mentioned in this gracious Speech from the Throne will receive the assent of the House, for I find they are all in the interest and for the benefit of the nation.

*MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, North Division): I should not have taken part in this debate had not the hon. Member below me referred to the subject of India; but I should like to say a few words on that subject. I was glad to notice in the Queen's Speech a reference to bringing in the Indian Councils Bill: that I am sure will be considered as a sign of interest in their affairs by the 280,000,000 of our fellow-subjects in India. Of course, it will depend upon what that Bill contains whether it meets the wishes of those on this side of the House, who have interested themselves in the welfare of the Indian people. The Bill of last Session was produced only to be withdrawn, and we trust the Government have not the same intention of strangling their bantling this year, and that it will contain, in some decided shape, the elective principle. The members of the Indian National Congress do not wish to dogmatise by proposing the exact method in which representation should be provided for, and leave that to the Viceroy and the Viceregal Council; but if the Bill is to be at all commensurate to the aspirations of the Indian people it must contain the representative principle. In the Queen's Speech no mention is made of the intended abolition of the paddy or rice tax in Ceylon, yet from the attitude taken by the Government last year it was clear they were convinced that the paddy tax ought to be abolished. It was then shown that the Governor of Ceylon favoured the abolition of this tax, which is imposed on the rice fields in which rice, the first necessity, as far as food is concerned, of the Cingalese people, is grown, and I believe Her Majesty's Government intended to remove it; but I shall be glad to hear what are their intentions, as whilst the fields which produce rice are taxed the lands on which tea, coffee, cocoa-nuts and other valuable crops are raised, are free from taxation. I am glad to see the principle of arbitration laid down for approval with reference to the Fisheries Question; yet although we all approve of the action of the Government in letting that knotty question be laid before arbitrators, we shall be glad to see the whole question of arbitration taken up by Her Majesty's Ministers. The Government of the United States has expressed its approval of that principle, and there is no doubt that any advances made by Her Majesty's Government to the United States Government would meet with cordial consideration, and that a noble example might be set which would be followed by other nations. The working men of England are becoming convinced that arbitration is one of the means by which our commerce may be stimulated.

(9.25.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): I can assure the hon. Member that there is every desire to push forward the Bill to which he has referred at an early date, and to carry it into law, and that intention is indicated by the position that it now for the first time assumes. It will be introduced by the Secretary of State for India in the House of Lords on the earliest possible opportunity, and there is no reason why it should not come down to this House at a comparatively early date. I share the hon. Member's desire that we may secure an early second reading of the Bill. I think I should be unwise—and I am not certain that I should be in order—if I were on this occasion to follow the hon. Member into a discussion on the provisions of the Bill, which it will fall to my lot to introduce; and I will merely say that if it does not satisfy the expectations of the hon. Member in all respects, it, at any rate, is, from our point of view, an attempt to deal seriously with the question, and I hope we may receive his assistance with regard to it. The other matter to which the hon. Member alluded was the opium question; but here, again, I must not follow him in his observations upon the general policy of the Government of India, for they were hardly germane to a discussion of the Queen's Speech. I will only say, therefore, that I have laid this afternoon upon the Table, and it will be shortly in the hands of hon. Members, a despatch from the Government of India dealing with this question, and relating to the representations of the Secretary of State on the subject. That despatch will in one particular, the importance of which I am glad to find admitted by the hon. Member, fulfil the expectations indulged in by him; and even if it does not meet with the entire approval of those who take more extreme views than the Government of India can espouse, it will still mark the development on the part of the Government of India of that policy of curtailment and restriction of the opium traffic, to which, from this bench, the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs gave expression last year. With regard to the question of the paddy tax, I would suggest that the hon. Member should put the question he desires to be answered upon the Paper.

*(9.30.) SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I would ask permission of the House for a brief period to make some answer to the speech delivered by the Leader of the House. He has complained of the admirable speech delivered by my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, that that right hon. Gentleman discussed an ex-Parliamentary speech of the Prime Minister. He seemed to suggest that that was not proper Parliamentary usage in a discussion on the Queen's Speech. I submit that the course he took is amply justified by precedent, and that nothing—in view of the legislative programme of the Government, one of whose principal measures is the question of Local Government for Ireland—can be more fair than the discussion of the pronouncements of the Government out of Parliament on topics germane to that programme. It is of consequence to know whether the Local Government is to proceed on broad and generous lines in reference to the Irish people, even if it fall short of the point of the creation of a legislative body, which the right hon. Member for West Birmingham approves; whether it is to be a distorted, confined, contracted measure as defined in the ex-Parliamentary speeches of such Members as the hon. Member for South Tyrone and other Members for Ulster sitting on that side of the House. The right hon.

Gentleman the Leader of the House says he has not in his mind very clearly, and he has not read very earnestly and closely, the speech of the Prime Minister. That was convenient, for it enabled him to give a gloss, to suggest a gloss, on that speech which makes it entirely different from what it really was. What does he suggest would be the effect of that speech? That Lord Salisbury at Exeter hardly did more than point out to the people of Exeter that there was a place in Ireland called Ulster. It speaks rather strongly of the view Lord Salisbury took of the intelligence of his Exeter audience, if it was necessary to point out that fact. What are the consequences that follow from this statement of the Leader of the House? When Lord Salisbury talked of the minority in Ireland as being that portion of the country which contained all that was progressive and enlightened, he meant that that was Ulster. Let us follow this to a conclusion. According to Lord Salisbury Ulster contains all the light, all that is progressive, all that is not priest-ridden in Ireland. ["No, no!"] I am glad the hon. Gentleman does not agree with that; but I am quoting the Leader of the House. Yet Ulster returns to this House—that which contains all the progression and enlightenment—a majority of Nationalist Members. This is in the speech of Lord Salisbury, as I read it:—He divides Ireland into two parts, and the division is not geographical; it is religious. They are divisions into Catholic Ireland and Protestant Ireland, and to the first of these divisions he attributes want of enlightenment, and the absence of all the elements of progress and civilisation; to the second he attributes all the civic virtues. The first of these divisions he denounces as the traditional enemies of England; for the second he claims the exclusive possession of that much desired and much misunderstood quality of loyalty. That was the division which Lord Salisbury emphatically made. I repeat, it is convenient that the Leader of the House has not had an opportunity of reading that speech at length, or of having any very clear recollection of what its contents were. We, on this side of the House, rejoice when the Prime Minister does speak in public. Lord Salisbury, with all his great ability and the charms of his eloquence, is never anything in public if not contemptuous. If he has to deal with a question affecting India there is a suggestion of the black man ; if with the question of Parish Councils there is the suggestion that a circus would be much more on their lines. If he refers to Irishmen, the "Hottentot" comparison rises to his lips. On this occasion he has denounced that division of the Irish people which he calls the unprogressive and unenlightened one, as the Catholic section. Does it occur to the supporters of the noble Lord, if it be true that the majority of the Irish people are not enlightened, are not civilized, have not the principles or elements of progress amongst them, does it occur to the supporters of the noble Lord what a sad, what a severe commentary it is on the Government of Ireland by the English people ? There have been very nearly a hundred years of English rule, and yet at the end of it the Prime Minister is able to say no more than this of its results ! One is almost inclined to believe, as has been suggested, that after all Lord Salisbury is an earnest Home Ruler in disguise, and that he takes this cynical way of pointing out the results of past English misgovernment in Ireland in order to bring home to the comprehension of the English people the vice and failure of their system. Yet it is to the majority of these people so denounced on whom he proposes to confer the boon of Local Government, on the same lines, according to the Mover and Seconder of the Address, on the same principles on which that Local Government is extended to England and Scotland. I ask, at the outset, Is it wise, is it statesmanlike, that such utterances should proceed from the mouth of the head of the Government, practically, of this great Empire ; an Empire in which in many parts the Catholic population forms a very important portion ? Is it wise, is it just to the Catholics of the Empire, to the Catholic Members of your Civil Service at home and abroad, to the Catholics who are amongst your diplomats, amongst your representatives as Consuls, who have served in large numbers as your sailors and soldiers—is it wise and just to them that such a division should be made ? Is it just to that large body of Catholic servants of the Crown and Empire, faithful servants who in the days of danger and battle have not proved cowards or unfaithful ? As a Catholic and as an Irishman I take as an insult the attack which the Prime Minister made, and that for the poor purpose of attracting the cheers of the groundlings, or for the wider purpose of influencing a Party vote. The Prime Minister further said that the majority were always the enemies of England, and he goes back to the story of the assistance that was given to Spain, to France, and to America. Was that statesmanlike, was it just ? What says an historian, whose authority will be received by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite ? Speaking of that very Spanish epoch, Mr. Froude says—

" It cannot be said that England deserved to keep a country (that is Ireland) which it mismanaged so disastrously. The Irish were not to be blamed if they looked to the Pope, to Spain, to France, or to any other power in Heaven or in earth to deliver them from the Government which discharged no single duty that rulers owe to subjects."

That was in reference to 1570, the epoch referred to by Lord Salisbury. He then refers to the assistance given to France, to the fact that Irish soldiers had fought in the French ranks. The fact is true, but so is the fact that these soldiers, gallant men, at the time they were fighting under the banner of France had been expelled from Ireland under the oppression of penal laws, which drove them from a country in which they were denied the rights of citizenship. Lastly, he refers to America, but surely this was the gravest mistake of all ? In the discussion, by Lord Salisbury, of Home Rule, to introduce the case of America, of the fight of the American Colonies for independence, and to blame the Irish for taking part in the assertion of American rights, could any blunder be greater in any discussion of Home Rule ? What was the story of the policy of the Home Government of that day, the stupid policy, which wrested from the English Crown and Empire those Colonies which might have long remained under her sway if there had been conceded to them by the Home Government, what they had a right to, self-government in their own land in matters relating to their own affairs. Yes, the Irish did lend assistance, and they are not ashamed of it. They are proud of it, and my only regret is that I cannot claim for the Catholic people of Ireland any important share in that effort. It was not the Catholic people of Ireland who rendered important assistance in the assertion of national right on the part of the American people to deal, in their own land, by the voice of their own people, in matters of their own concern. It was the tenants—the evicted tenants—of Ulster, the sturdy Presbyterians and Protestants of Ulster, who were the men who fought in the American ranks. Lord Salisbury is not content with this; he charges generally against the Catholic people of Ireland, because these are the two divisions he makes; not the division of Lord Robert Cecil, who, speaking in 1865, drew no religious distinctions, but drew a distinction between the class of those who were distressed and those not distressed; he charges the Catholic people generally with disloyalty; he is historically incorrect. I am not going away from facts, as Lord Salisbury did, to the sixteenth century, but to take the fight between James and William. The Irish fought for James, and he was de facto the lawful Sovereign. They fought for him, not because he was James, but because he was the representative as they believed of their own civil and religious rights. I see the First Lord of the Admiralty in his place, and have no doubt he is acquainted with his own genealogical tree; and I believe I am right when I say that one of the men who led the attacking forces at the siege of Derry was one of the ancestors of that important ducal house. Now, Sir, what is the fact? From the time of the violated Treaty of Limerick of 1691, when that solemn promise was made of the concession of civil and religious rights to the Irish people, till 1782 there was no political rising in Ireland at all. There were in England and in Scotland, and I do not think the Scotch people of 1715 or 1745, or any hon. Members who are descended from them, are ashamed of the part their ancestors took on these occasions; and when in 1782 there was something like a military rising in Ireland, who were the leaders of it? A Protestant—Lord Charlemont. In 1798—for I am passing over these rapidly—who were the leaders? Protestants—Lord Edward Fitzgerald, McCrackan, Joy, and the Shearses, names familiar to the hon. Member for Belfast, and still held in honour in Ulster. In 1803 another Protestant, Robert Emmet. And when, in 1848, the agitation for repeal left the strictly constitutional platform, who were the men to the front in the attempt to redress by arms the grievances of their country? They were the Protestant Smith O'Brien, and the Ulster Presbyterian John Mitchell. There is no doubt many Catholics joined them—amongst others the Sir Charles Gavan Duffy of to-day. Why do I mention these things? Is it to suggest that there is any shame or dishonour in these men for the part they took? Far from it! All credit to them! What I regret is that there were so few Catholics to the front. The truth was that the steel of persecution had entered their souls, for if ever rebellious movements were justified, they were justified by the state of things in those days. The speech of Lord Robert Cecil in 1865 has been referred to by my right hon. Friend. That speech, dispassionate in tone, pointed out no racial or religious division, but a division into two classes, one fairly prosperous, and the other, the larger, in great distress, and he points out that that condition of things is not to be attributed to race, or religion, or the teaching of demagogues, but was to be traced to the government by England. Since those days much has been done, and what has been done, speaking of its broad outlines, has been done in spite of the policy supported by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite. Mr. Speaker, I have spoken with some warmth, because I confess I felt some indignation. Protestants have most usually condemned Catholic teaching, not because it promoted rebellion, but because it enjoined in the interests of peace and order a submissive obedience, which was sometimes called a too servile loyalty. But Catholic loyalty in its true sense is not a mere political sentiment; it is a moral duty. When all is said and done, who is there that will deny that the best and surest foundation of all loyalty is a sense of confidence in the people that Government is to them not a source of worry but of protection, that they are living, as they believe and feel, under the protection of just laws justly administered. It is a truth, which the history of the world proclaims, that wherever disloyalty exists it exists because the Government against which the feeling exists is not a just, is not a protective one, and does not give to the people the sense of security. If the position of these two islands were changed, and instead of Ireland being mainly Catholic it were mainly Protestant, and instead of England being mainly Protestant it were mainly Catholic, and if from Catholic England you sent Catholics to administer the Government of Protestant Ireland, thus placing the majority of the country in a position of inferiority to the minority, and reversing the universal rule by treating the majority and their views as not worthy of acceptance in the government of their country, I wonder how long hon. Gentlemen opposite would have been content with these ineffectual efforts to obtain their rights. The spirits of such men as my amiable Friend opposite (Mr. Johnston) would have risen against such a state of things. And who is there in the class to which he belongs who would not have struggled constitutionally and unconstitutionally till they had secured the rational right of self-government in their own affairs? Mr. Speaker, the language which Lord Salisbury has uttered would have been a mistake in any man, a mistake in any politician, and it is not too strong to say it is a shame and disgrace in a Prime Minister.

*(10.0.) MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Thanet Division of Kent): The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down has opened up a phase of the discussion which is very tempting; but I feel bound to refrain from it on the present occasion, because I think it is generally understood that we shall have more than one opportunity of discussing Irish affairs before the debate is ended. My object in asking the indulgence of the House for a few minutes is with a view of bringing before it and before Her Majesty's Government another and very important subject. I desire to move as an Amendment the following addition to the Address:—

Sir Charles Russell

"But, while glad to learn that your Majesty's relations with Foreign Powers continue friendly, this House deplores the retention in certain Treaties with Foreign States of provisions which operate in restraint of the establishment of preferential trading relations amongst the several portions of Her Majesty's Empire, and humbly urges the early termination of such provisions in accordance with the prayer contained in the Address to your Majesty from the Senate and House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada, supported by the representatives in this country of other self-governing Colonies."

I think I should be unnecessarily detaining the House if I were to enter upon any lengthened explanation as to the reasons which induced me to bring forward this question. The remarks contained in the Amendment, to the effect that the two Houses of the Canadian Legislature have addressed a prayer to the Crown for the abrogation of the Treaties in question, is, I think, ample reason why not one moment should be lost in bringing this matter under the notice of the Imperial Parliament. In fact, if I have any expression of regret to make on the subject, it would be of regret and surprise that a matter is left to a private Member to bring forward which should rather have been introduced to the notice of the House by Her Majesty's Ministers themselves. The Treaties to which I refer are the Treaties entered into between this country and Belgium in 1862 and that entered into with Germany in 1865, and which, when combined with what are known as "favoured nation clauses" in other Treaties in operation with other countries, extend the provisions of the Belgian and German Treaties to all other countries with which we have commercial engagements. These Treaties especially prevented any arrangement for preferential treatment being entered into for commercial purposes between the mother country and her colonies. By the action of the Government some 30 years ago in entering into these Treaties with Foreign Powers the freedom of the mother country to enter into such commercial relations with her colonies as might be for their mutual benefit has been fettered. If these Treaties are to be maintained, I do not think that the connection between England and her Colonies would be worth many years' purchase, for this is the only Empire that has given foreigners the right to interfere in its own private and domestic concerns. The fact that the Address to the Crown, which I have already alluded to, praying for the abrogation of the Treaties, was passed by both Houses of the Canadian Legislature, would, under any circumstances, possess great weight with this House; but when I Mention the fact that in each Chamber this Address was moved by a responsible Member of the Government, and seconded and supported by leading Members of the Opposition, and that the Motion passed unanimously, I think it will at once be recognised that the matter especially demands our consideration. Party politics have run somewhat high in Canada, and fiscal questions have entered very largely into those politics; but notwithstanding that fact, they have unanimously agreed to urge this question upon Her Majesty's Ministers, the Address having been voted unanimously. It contained the following:—

“That your Memorialists consider that these Treaties with Foreign Powers are incompatible with the powers and privileges that have been conferred upon the Canadian Legislature, and that their continuance in force is calculated to produce complications and embarrassment in the fiscal relations between England and her Colonies,” and so on; and then they go on to say—

“That your Memorialists further believe that none of Her Majesty's self-governing Colonies should be restricted in adopting modifications,” and so on. But we must recollect that Canada does not stand alone in these views; because she is supported in her prayer for abrogation of those treaties by the accredited representatives of all our self-governing colonies. These have added their voice to the voice of Canada, and they one and all protest against the continuance of treaties which hamper the action of the Colonial Legislatures; those Colonial Legislatures having been in no way consulted or made acquainted with the treaties to which I have referred. The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down has spoken of the action of Lord North in connection with the fiscal arrangements of the United States of America. Are we again going to play the rôle of Lord North; are we going to turn a deaf ear to the united voice of the Dominion of Canada in this matter? I hope we shall hear from Her Majesty's Ministers that Her Majesty's Government are about to take prompt steps for the purpose of putting an end to this very substantial grievance. I cannot but hope that we shall hear that Her Majesty's Government have resolved upon that course, because last year it fell to my lot amongst others to be received on a deputation by the Prime Minister upon this subject, and the Prime Minister then spoke of “these unlucky treaties.” He said—

“With respect to those two unlucky treaties made by Lord Palmerston's Government 30 years ago, I am sure the matter could not have been fully considered. We have tried to find out what species of reason it was that induced Her Majesty's Government to sign such unfortunate treaties.”

And again he says—

“Although there are difficulties in the way of these unfortunate engagements the Government will not omit any opportunity which may present itself for obtaining a modification of the provisions.”

But since then the question has pressed on with rapid strides, because the Canadian Government did not think that it was justified in waiting for the convenient moment which has been spoken of by the Prime Minister, and which he was watching for, to obtain a removal of those commercial restrictions, and they come before this House and ask that they should be freed from such complicated engagements. I must say also that all the self-governing colonies have united with Canada in protesting against the continuance of these Treaties. It need not be supposed that the abrogation of these Treaties is urged merely upon sentimental grounds; it is urged because they prevent a comprehensive commercial policy between the Mother Country and her colonies from being carried into effect. All the leading statesmen of all the colonies have placed their opinion in reference to this question upon record, and from these opinions it may be gathered how deep is the feeling of the colonies upon the question. The late Sir John Macdonald, speaking in 1885, said—

“British federation might be achieved on the basis of give and take: if you give Colonial products such advantages as you give no other nation, I am quite sure the colonies will give British goods, and only British goods, preferential treatment.”

I quote these words, because it is said by some on the other side that, though the colonies wish to get these advantages, they will give nothing in return. A well known colonial statesman has said that—in these matters, and in fact all the distinguished Colonial statesmen, including Sir Gordon Sprigg, Mr. Cecil Rhodes, Mr. Service, Sir Samuel Griffith and others, pointed most strongly to the fact that a means of cementing the Empire could be found in these engagements of a commercial character. If we drive our colonies into commercial, and especially into reciprocal preferential arrangements with other States, I do not think anybody would give a very great number of years' purchase for the continuance of our Colonial Empire. One matter which I should like to bring before the House is this. I am not asking the House to embark upon any line of policy which would be detrimental to the inhabitants of these islands. This country requires a large, I was going to say, an inexhaustible supply of food and raw material for the consumption of the inhabitants and for the trade of this country. The British Empire extends over an area, roughly computed, of something like one-fifth of the discovered globe, and Her Majesty's subjects number about 300,000,000 souls, and the various climates and soils which are included in Her Majesty's dominions entirely preclude any notion whatever that under any circumstances there could be a simultaneous occurrence of scarcity throughout the limits of our Empire; and in asking the House to press upon Her Majesty's Government the advisability of removing those obstacles to the introduction of preferential trading relations between this country and Canada, I have regard to the interests of the people and the necessity of an inexhaustible supply both of food and raw materials. We may be told that this is contrary to the principles of Free Trade; but in that connection I wish to say that amongst those who have taken the most active part in urging the establishment of trading relations within the limits of the Empire are some of the most staunch free traders. Many free traders have come to recognise the fact that our first duty is to decide what is best for the country at the present time, and ask themselves whether they are not justified in looking to what would be of immediate benefit to the country. I have said that some of the most staunch free traders are in favour of a full consideration of this subject; and, though I am not myself a free trader, I can point to others who have realised that they must decline to follow upon this path. We were assured that all the world would follow in our wake as free traders. What has the world done? No doubt, up to a certain point, there were steps taken in certain countries in the direction of free trade. We found steps taken in that direction by France, and, in some respects, by the United States and other countries; but we find now that, with one solitary exception—I ought to except His Highness the Sultan of Zanzibar—scarcely a single State recognises what is known as free trade—I beg pardon, there was one State alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman for Midlothian upon a celebrated occasion as "The one anti-human specimen of humanity," and designated by another authority as "The Unspeakable Turk," though I prefer to refer to that Power as our ancient ally the Ottoman Empire. But that is the only Power which can be quoted now as having in its system the slightest suggestion of these doctrines. But I would point out to hon. Gentlemen sitting opposite that the States of the world, united as they are against every principle of free trade, one by one, have all tried something in that direction, and one by one have abandoned it. I am not now arguing protection, although I am quite ready to do so, as I have never concealed my own predilections for a protectionist policy. I am now approaching the matter from the standpoint of an impartial trader, who desires to leave the Mother Country and the Colonies a free hand in their commercial concerns, with full liberty to advance what they conceive to be the interests of the Empire at the present time. I would point out to hon. Gentlemen opposite that the States in which the doctrines of free trade are more thoroughly at a discount than in any other are the States in which popular government is in its most advanced state. I have never been an advocate of democracy; but I would point out that the most rigid protectionist tariffs are those of the great Republic of France, which is pointed to as a model to be copied; and in the new world I would point to the great Republic of the United States, which has shown a thorough disinclination to be hoodwinked by the arguments of the Cobden Club; and the whole world over I could show that wherever government has been established upon a wide basis, there you find free trade, more at a discount even than in Monarchical States. And in no place do we find free trade more thoroughly discredited and repudiated than amongst our own kith and kin in our own self-governing colonies. In all these colonies the tendency is to decline to follow our path and to strike out a policy for themselves. Therefore we are brought to this, that we are asked to reject the advances of our own colonies and to stand absolutely alone. When I speak of the United Kingdom I speak of the United Kingdom as standing against the whole world and against our own colonies. The population of the United Kingdom is about one-tenth of the population of Her Majesty's dominions, and the United Kingdom by no means forms so important a factor, relatively speaking, as it did in former days. There is another point which I would bring to the notice of the House, and especially to that of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, who has just quoted from a recent speech of the Prime Minister. I daresay the hon. and learned Gentleman noticed that part of the Prime Minister's speech in which he spoke of an attempt of the political representatives of Ireland which involved the setting up of a protectionist State upon the shores of this country. I am not going into the question of Home Rule or Separation—it is foreign to the subject—but this I do say, and the Prime Minister was perfectly correct in saying, that the people of Ireland, like the French nation when it recovered its freedom of political action, would promptly repudiate Cobdenism, and embark upon a protectionist policy. In like manner, the people of Ireland will demand from their representatives, whether they sit in this House, or whether they should sit elsewhere, they will demand that they should redress the gross injustice which was committed on Ireland by England many years ago, namely, the extinction of their manufacturing industries in the selfish interests of Great Britain.

"Nothing could be of greater advantage to the unity of the Empire than the establishment of greater sympathy between the Mother Country and her colonies"

MR. JOHN MORLEY: That was done by English protectionists.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle says that was done by English protectionists. What I say is that the people of England, in their own selfish interests, forced it down the throats of the people of Ireland; and if the right hon. Gentleman understood what Lord Salisbury gave expression to, he would see that it was that the great mass of the people of Ireland would demand some form of what is popularly known as Protection, and would eschew the doctrines of Free Trade. I see that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby is in his place. My right hon. Friend I know has never endorsed protection, and I think is supposed to be more or less in favour of free trade, or rather that he is disposed to be in favour of it; but what I have just been mentioning leads me to entertain hopes of the eventual co-operation of my right hon. Friend, for I would remind the House of a certain highly nutritive Irish product, which possesses highly digestive properties, and if his digestion were aided by a good draught of Parnellite or anti-Parnellite juice, even red-hot protection would find its way down the throat of the right hon. Gentleman with the rapidity of greased lightning. I would point out to the House that what I ask it to endorse is a Resolution which would afford an opportunity for freeing this country from foreign dictation in connection with our commercial system. I ask the House to support our self-governing colonies in this matter. Experience has shown us that our commercial system as it has existed for the last fifty years has failed to obtain favour among Foreign Powers. ("No, no!") I say as it has existed in this country it has failed to obtain favour elsewhere. At any rate, we stand alone in our advocacy of the principle, and I ask whether we are to remain alone in our isolation? [An hon. MEMBER: We are.] Some one says we are; but I would remind him that if we do, our Colonies will make their own commercial arrangements with Foreign Powers according to what they find best for themselves, and the Mother Country will be left out in the cold. That is not what I should like to see brought about; I should be sorry to see such a state of affairs, and therefore I desire to relieve myself from complicity in any such policy. The people of this country now realise that the circumstances under which our trade is carried on are widely different now from what they were half a century ago. Meetings on the subject have been held in various parts of the world. My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield (Colonel Howard Vincent) will be able to tell the House of his own personal experience how this subject was taken up on the other side of the Atlantic. Meetings have also been held in this country, at some of which I have been present, where resolutions have been adopted in favour of a re-consideration of this question. Popular opinion, my belief is, will always support Parliament and the Government in obtaining fair advantages for British trade. I do not ask the House to adopt any course which would render dear the necessities of life to this country. [Cheers and a cry of "Oh!"] An hon. Gentleman says "Oh!" but he appears not to have followed me when I pointed out that the vast area of the British Empire, and the variety of its soil and climates, would enable to be grown every article required for the population of this country, either for the purposes of food or the supply of raw material for our manufactures. The principle which has been recommended is not to put prohibitive duties on food from Foreign States. What is suggested is that we should allow each component element of the British Empire to retain absolutely its own fiscal freedom, that every self-governing Colony should be entitled to place whatever duties it thinks fit upon all goods coming into its territorial limits, subject only to the condition that a preference should be given, it may be slight, in favour of goods from other parts of the British Empire. That, I think, is a policy which cannot be open to the charge of ultra or excessive protection. The United Empire Trade League, which has been formed to carry out these principles, and which has among its members some of the most eminent statesmen among Her Majesty's colonial subjects, has that object in view. We do not desire in any shape or form to interpose barriers upon our foreign trade, because it is perfectly open to us, if we think fit, to admit all imports from our Colonies free, provided always that we give a slight preference to them over goods which come from abroad. Sir, I think that is a very moderate proposal to bring under the notice of the Government. I, of course, am perfectly aware, as Lord Salisbury pointed out to the deputation that waited upon him at the Foreign Office, that treaties entered into cannot be abrogated at a moment's notice; but the whole of Europe at the present moment affords the spectacle of every nation readjusting its tariffs, and as the Member for Bradford has just now very properly pointed out, the change is certainly in the direction of largely increasing their protective tariffs, and thereby injuriously affecting the trade of this country. That, therefore, affords an occasion for us to point out that the British Empire, alone amongst the States, has been unwise enough to barter away its own fiscal freedom, within the limits of its own Empire. I might be told—but I do not think I shall be told by any Member in this House, because the argument would be too foolish—for goodness sake do not irritate these Foreign Powers who are so anxious to afford every facility for British trade. Why, they have put up every obstacle in order to shut out British trade from their markets. But supposing there were any country which could say that it had in no way injured British trade by its tariffs, I would say, we only ask for the British Empire that same liberty to regulate its own internal affairs in this respect which every other country possesses. Does Germany, France, or any other country ask Foreign Powers what arrangements they may make with respect to their own internal affairs? It is a Universal principle that within the limits of its own dominions every Sovereign State is supreme. I do not wish to put the House to the trouble of a division, because this is a matter affecting our foreign relations, regarding which I think that everyone would be most desirous that it should not be a subject of controversy among us. But I am sure that Her Majesty's Government will share the aspirations of the Dominion of Canada; that they will be in harmony with the sentiments expressed by every self-governing community of the British Empire; that they have not receded from, but will rather have advanced upon, the expression of opinion upon this subject which I have quoted from the Prime Minister, and that they will give us an assurance that those "unlucky pledges," those "unfortunate treaties" as the Prime Minister termed them, will not continue to cause an embarrassment to the public service. I beg to move the Amendment of which I have given notice.

*COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): In seconding the Motion of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowther), I wish to trespass on the indulgence of the House only for a few minutes. My right hon. Friend has gone so fully into the subject that very few words from me are necessary. But as the matter has, hitherto, been very little understood, I may be allowed to quote the clause of the Treaty referred to—I mean the 7th clause of the Treaty with Belgium, repeated in the Treaty with Germany in 1885, which hampers the free development of trade within the British Empire. It runs thus—

"Articles, the produce or manufacture of Belgium, shall not be subject to other or higher duties than those which are or may be imposed upon similar articles of British origin."

A Return was presented to Parliament in 1888 on my Motion, which contained this note by the Foreign Office:—

"While these two Treaties remain in force the express stipulations above quoted are extended to all countries whose Commercial Treaties with Great Britain contain a most favoured nation clause, and apply to British Colonies."

The effect of these Treaties was illustrated to the Senate and House of Commons of Canada the other day, when Mr. Abbott, the Prime Minister, moved the Address to the Crown. He said that within the last three or four years they fixed a duty on goods imported from England at their value in England, while goods imported from Germany had to bear the increased cost of freight; that Germany remonstrated, and the Colony had to alter their law and put England and Germany in respect of such goods on the same footing. There is a case in which the Canadian Government, anxious to give British goods an advantage in Canada, were prohibited from doing so by these Treaties, which declare that foreign countries are to get equal advantages with British goods, whether the Colonies wish them to get those advantages or not. We can hardly wonder that the Prime Minister spoke of these Treaties as unlucky and unfortunate Treaties, and that he said we should take every opportunity that offered to deliver ourselves from such engagements. That was on the 19th June last; and we were hoping, Mr. Speaker, that we should hear some declaration either from the Leader of the House or from the President of the Board of Trade, to the effect that some means had been found in these seven or eight months to get rid of these very unfortunate engagements. My right hon. Friend has made reference to a representation made in this direction by the Agents-General of self-governing Colonies. The Member for the Brightside Division (Mr. Mundella) is in his place; and in his connection with the Trade and Treaties Committee he will recollect a deputation which came to him from the Agents-General of the self-governing Colonies urging the same thing—that the Empire should be freed from those Treaties. He will also recollect the deputation that waited upon him in which many hon. Gentlemen opposite as well as on this side took part, to urge that the Trade and Treaties Committee should recommend to Her Majesty's Government some means of freeing the United Kingdom, the Empire and Colonies from the engagements which tied our hands and prevented the development of inter-British trade. I do not know the feeling of the Member for the Brightside Division himself upon the subject. It may be that he is in favour of these restricting provisions, but we are entitled to know the view of the Committee as a whole. Several Reports of the Trade and Treaties Committee have been published, but not that No. 2 Report referring to this matter; and therefore we have no knowledge of what the recommendations of the Committee are upon this subject. I do submit to the President of the Board of Trade that we are entitled, on a matter in which great interest is taken by a large proportion of the industrial community here and in the Colonies, to know what is the definite opinion of that Committee as a whole? My right hon. Friend has referred to the expression of feeling in Canada, and he has mentioned the fact that I had had an opportunity of addressing public meetings there on this question. That is so, Mr. Speaker; and I can only say this: that addressing large gatherings called by the Chambers of Commerce or Boards of Trade as they are called in Canada and Newfoundland, I found only one feeling, and that was that the Empire should be free to make such commercial arrangements between the different portions of the Empire as seem fit to the United Kingdom and the self-governing colonies. Only this evening I received by post a resolution from the Liberal Conservatives at North Grey, on Lake Superior, declaring that their Association expressed the earnest expectation that Her Majesty's Government would see their way clear to make some declaration of their intention to make favourable Customs arrangements between the United Kingdom and the colonies. It will be in the recollection of the House that this time last Session the Chancellor of the Exchequer entered his protest against the extreme application of the view that under no circumstances could we make fiscal arrangements with the colonies without injury to other portions of our trade. But he asked—

"What chance or hope have the colonies held out to us that they are prepared to move in this direction?"

I went to Canada to obtain an answer to the question of the right hon. Gentleman, and I have had the honour of transmitting to him these resolutions from public meetings in Canada. But, in addition, he has had a copy of the Address from the Senate and the House of Commons of the Dominions and the representations of the Agents-General. Only a fortnight ago a meeting was held in Toronto which declared that Canada would be found ready to take her share in Imperial responsibilities if mutual trade were established. These, I submit, are satisfactory answers to the question raised last Session by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and it only remains for us, I believe, to free the Empire from those Treaties which tie our hands at the present time, in order to be able to enter into commercial arrangements with our Colonies, or some of them, analogous to those between Germany and France and their Colonies, and now between Germany, Austria, and Italy. What do the Government propose to do in face of the statistics of trade lately issued by the Board of Trade? The Returns for the last year show a fall in the exports of British and Irish products by sixteen and a quarter millions sterling; and the Return for last month shows that the decline is continuing. The adverse result is felt not only in the constituency which I represent, but in Bradford, in the West Riding, and in many parts of Lancashire. I ask the Government what they propose to do in view of the injurious effect of the Reciprocity Treaties which have been concluded under Clause 3 of the McKinley Tariff Act in favour of American goods over British in Brazil, in Spain, and in other countries and markets where formerly the conditions were advantageous to British trade? I submit that Her Majesty's Government could not do better than show that they are determined to use the illimitable resources, the unequalled resources, of that vast Empire of which this is the centre and the headstone, and at any rate free themselves and the Colonies from Treaties which tie their hands. The Member for the Brightside Division will probably say, "Oh, but you cannot get rid of these Treaties, because some of their clauses are advantageous to British trade." But is there any reason, Mr. Speaker, why, if there be useful provisions in these two Treaties, we cannot give notice to terminate the Treaties in a year's time, and simultaneously enter into negotiations to re-conclude them without the objectionable clauses? It is not Protection. All that we ask the Government or this House to do is, at any rate, to free our hands and enable us to have free and full development of trade within our Empire. I apologise for having trespassed so long upon the time of the House, and I beg now to second the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words, "But while glad to learn that Your Majesty's relations with Foreign Powers continue to be friendly, this House deplores the retention in certain Treaties with Foreign States of provisions which operate in restraint of the establishment of preferential trading relations amongst the several portions of Your Majesty's Empire, and humbly urges the early termination of such provisions in accordance with the prayer contained in the Addresses to Your Majesty from the Senate and House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada, supported by the Representatives in this Country of the other self-governing Colonies."

—(Mr. James Lowther.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I hope my right hon. Friend will pardon me for not dealing with that part of his speech which related to the general subject of Protection and Free Trade. I do not agree with the views he expressed. I do not believe the people of this country agree with him, but I do not think this is the time to discuss the question, which after all is not directly raised by the Motion which is before the House. Sir, my right hon. Friend asks us, in the terms of that Motion, to terminate certain provisions in our Treaties with Belgium and the Zollverein in accordance with an Address passed by the two Houses of the Dominion Parliament. I think that we should view with the greatest possible respect any Resolutions passed by the Dominion Parliament. We should give them our very best attention; but we should do so with the recollection and the belief that we are better able to judge of the commercial relations of this country than even the Dominion Parliament. Sir, the Treaty of 1862 with Belgium, and the Treaty of 1865 with the Zollverein, do not prevent, as I think my right hon. Friend is aware, the establishment of any kind of trade-relations between our different colonies. All they do prevent is the establishment of, so to speak, preferential relations between the United Kingdom and one of her Colonies, and between one of the Colonies and the United Kingdom. Now, Sir, I am quite willing to admit that these provisions are a relic of a past generation. We should not dream of entering again into Commercial Treaties affecting our self-governing Colonies without the consent of those Colonies, and the Colonies are well aware of that fact. And I go further, and say that I do not think it advisable that we should be bound by any Treaty which would prevent us establishing any trade relations we might desire between the Colonies and ourselves. But when we are asked promptly and at the present moment to free ourselves from these engagements, we are met with considerations which I think can hardly have presented themselves sufficiently to my right hon. Friend. In the first place, this question was considered ten years ago, when both the Belgian and the German Governments were sounded as to their willingness to omit from those Treaties these particular provisions, while retaining the rest of the Treaties. Well, Sir, both of them absolutely declined to consider the question from that point of view. They said, naturally enough, that if you want to revise these Treaties you must revise them as a whole; and the House must look upon this question from the point of view of the whole of the Treaties—whether they are to be maintained or to be denounced. Now, what are we offered by my right hon. Friend in return for renouncing those Treaties? We are offered what he calls a comprehensive commercial policy—but what I should call a preferential arrangement of a very remarkable character between the Colonies and the United Kingdom. I confess that, speaking for myself, I would go a long way if I could secure a Zollverein between the colonies and the United Kingdom—a common tariff applicable to them all. But this proposal would injure us on the one side, without doing us any good on the other. Why would it injure us? The colonies, according to my right hon. Friend, desire a preference in our markets for the produce which they principally send here. What is that produce? As the Prime Minister told us, it is corn, meat, wool—raw material and food, the cheapness of which is essential to the manufacturing and commercial interests of this country. Well then, supposing a duty imposed, as my right hon. Friend proposes, upon these things coming from foreign countries, leaving those coming from the colonies untaxed, what is the effect? Why the price would be raised by the amount of the duty, and perhaps more. If not raised, what good would it be to the colonies? We should, in fact, be adopting a policy of protection upon imported food for the benefit, not of our own agricultural interests, for whom we might all be anxious to do something, but for the benefit of the agricultural interests of our colonies. We should lose in that way. How should we gain? Would the colonies reduce their tariffs on our manufactured goods?

MR. J. LOWTHER: They would give us a preference.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: But what good would that do? You would leave them perfect freedom to impose as high duties as they choose upon manufactured goods from this country in competition with their own manufactures, giving a small, perhaps a 10 per cent., preference on our manufactures over manufactures coming from foreign countries. But what would be the good of that? The Colonies would take very good care to protect their own manufactures; and as regards the competition in the Colonial markets between ourselves and foreign countries, we have got these markets already on equal terms, and so on that side my right hon. Friend's scheme would do us no good at all. That is what—and I hope I have not unfairly described it—my right hon. Friend offers us in return for denouncing the Commercial Treaties of 1862 and 1865. But on what authority does my right hon. Friend make this offer? On no authority whatever. The House will not find in those resolutions of the Dominion Parliament any definite scheme proposed for the acceptance of Her Majesty's Government. The speeches of my right hon. Friend and of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield were only based upon vague resolutions of public meetings, overflowing with sentiments in which we cordially share, of affection between the United Kingdom and the Colonies; but not adopting any definite policy at all. But now, what should we lose by denouncing those Treaties? Let me just state to the House what these Treaties give us. The Treaty with Belgium secures to British subjects the same treatment as natives with respect to all rights and privileges in matters of commerce and navigation, of payment of duties on tonnage, lighthouses, quarantine, loading and unloading of vessels; permission to import and export goods in British vessels as in Belgian vessels; participation in coasting trade; protection of trade marks; payment of salvage dues on wrecked property; the right to enjoy most favoured nation treatment in all that relates to commerce and navigation; warehousing and transit of goods; and so on. The Treaty with the Zollverein confers on our subjects most favoured nation treatment in our commerce and trade, and contains stipulations respecting payment of taxes, import and export duties, reduction of carriage; prohibitions of import and export duties; and provisions for the free transport of goods and coal. These are very important provisions, as every one who knows the trade relations between the United Kingdom and those countries must be aware. Is this the time to risk the loss of them? My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield has told us that a wave of protection is passing over Europe and other countries, and he suggested that we should join in the foolish policy. Well, I should not be surprised if before very long a neighbouring country felt very sorry for the length to which it has gone in this direction. But what has actually happened? These very treaties which my hon. Friends desire to denounce are at the present moment of the greatest service to us in contending with this policy. The House is aware that certain Commercial Treaties have recently been concluded between Germany, Italy, Austria-Hungary, Belgium and Switzerland. I do not say they are free trade treaties, but in some important particulars they are a step in that direction : and we have obtained the advantage of them for this country through those most favoured nation clauses in our treaties with Germany and Belgium. I have not yet got particulars of the new German tariff; but with regard to Belgium, in addition to transit facilities and other advantages we have obtained free entry into Belgium for no less than 13 different classes of goods, and a reduction in existing duties on 20 other kinds of articles. Now, I think I have said enough to show the House that the proposal of my right hon. Friend would be injurious to this country. I do not think that such engagements would be entered into at the present time ; and I agree that when a favourable opportunity occurs it would be well to attempt to obtain a revision of the provisions to which he objects, but this is not the time to move, and Her Majesty's Government cannot undertake to move in the direction in which they are asked to go by my right hon. Friend.

Sir Michael Hicks Beach

MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon) : I must apologise for venturing to interpose during the course of this discussion, but I should just like to say that I think that there would be a benefit accruing to the British farmer if a plan of this sort were adopted. We want industrial activity in all parts of the country and among all our trades, because we know that when the manufacturing districts are doing well, when the wheels and the machinery in the cotton spinning districts are going round, the operatives in these trades under these circumstances are the very best customers of our agricultural districts. We want to see the industries of England going on at high pressure. My hon. Friend the Member for West Newington (Mr. C. W. Radcliffe-Cooke), who is a most ardent Free Trader, will scarcely dispute the statement that if our trade amongst ourselves were maintained it would be better for this great Empire than if that trade were going on in Germany, or in France. We know that almost all our English operatives, with perhaps the exception of a few that came up to London and posed as agricultural labourers, although probably they have never in their lives taken an agricultural labourers' wages on a Saturday night, believe in as much work as possible being done here at home, and as many sovereigns and shillings as possible being paid on Saturday night to the operatives here at home. As to the agricultural part of the question, I believe if you canvassed all the British farmers between the Lands End and John O'Groats, you would find that if our throats are to be cut they would prefer that the operation should be performed by our own kith and kin. We know from the position of our labourers that they are not in a position to pay high prices for the necessities of life, nor do we desire that they should do so. We want fair play between the Mother Country and the Colonies, and when all the industries of the old country are active, we learn that we shall profit by that activity, because there will be an increased demand for a great deal of the agricultural produce which can be, and which ought to be, raised on our home fields.

(11.12.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford) : Sir, I desire, on behalf of myself and on behalf of those sitting on this side of the House, to express our thanks to the President of the Board of Trade for the way he has answered the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who introduced this Amendment. Anything more sound, more candid, or more complete as an answer it would be impossible to look for. There is no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman who introduced this Amendment looks to Protection, and there is no prospect of any scheme of the kind he mentioned being successful, even from the right hon. Gentleman's own standpoint, without Protection. Reference has been made to a meeting in Bradford, and I must say that I do not think there is any man in Lancashire or Yorkshire who has thoroughly ascertained the conditions of those so-called protected industries who would wish really to transplant his industry or his prospects from one country to another. I could have wished that the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman had run upon lines such as these—that seeing the evils produced by the war system in Europe, the social and industrial condition of every nation affected by it, it would have been well if this Government could have been induced to bring about a reduction of the armaments of Europe, and thus to institute a much better condition of things. What can be ascertained beyond doubt is this: that the increased tariffs of every country in Europe and of the United States are directly traceable to the wars of 1863, 1864, and the war of 1870. What confidence can hon. Gentlemen and right hon. Gentlemen have in what they call Moderate Protection. Where is the country that is practising it? Everywhere it is being abandoned. Does not that clearly show that, like moderate drinking, there must be a continual increase of the dose? If that is not the case, how is it that no country in Europe and that neither Canada nor the United States has been content with moderate protection? Hon. Gentlelemen opposite talk of a moderate increase of five shillings per quarter on wheat, but that five shillings would be swallowed up by the landlord to begin with, and then they would want another five shillings for the farmer, and after that another ten shillings for the labourer. There is no limit. I do not hesitate to say that the hostile tariffs of every country in the world have operated to some extent injuriously to the trade of this country. But if hon. Gentlemen had been candid they would have said that the exports of every other country have been declining as well as our own—in some instances more so. There is nothing in the condition of Europe or America that should lead us to abandon our present position. We are on solid ground. If it is one-sided Free Trade, it is all in favour of this country, and the burden falls on others. They have to pay an increased, even an extravagant, price for their commodities. If we can induce this Government, or any Government or country, to take up the question of these excessive and crushing armaments, which are the curse of the world, we should do something to improve our own industries and to better industrial relationships with and in every country in Europe.

(11.19.) MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): Sir, I should not be loyal to the constituency which I represent if I allowed the opinions of my hon. Colleague opposite to go forth as the opinions of the people of Bradford. The conclusion that I have deliberately arrived at, which is shared by the great mass of the employed labour, is that unless something very speedily for the relief of our trial classes we shall be in a condition of partial depopulation. I can assure the House that I could wish better electoral cry in my constituency than the cry of Fair Trade. I was with some surprise to the state by my hon. Colleague, that the condition of the Bradford trade is better than that of the United States. I know manufacturers who, owing to the fair competition of American manufacturers, have taken their capital and moved to the United States, being unable to make a profit or to find employment for their own people at home. I fear of the cry of Protection raised against us. The great majority of the working classes are in theoretical opposition to Free Trade; advocates of a system of free importation of raw material, but also in view of such pressure being put on the Governments as will enable the products of the British artisan to have a fair share in the markets of the world.

Mr. Illingworth

MR. J. LOWTHER: After encouragement I have met with no desire to embarrass the Government by taking a division, it being the opinion undesirable to do so on a question affecting treaties with foreign Powers. I therefore beg leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Question, "That the Amendment be withdrawn," put, and negatived.

Question, "That the proposed be there added," put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.
Motion made, and Question proposed
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Broadhurst.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is unusual time to move the adjournment of the Debate on any day but the first day of the Session; but I believe it customary on the first day that we adjourn at a somewhat earlier than usual, and, therefore, I assent to the Motion.

Question put, and agreed to.

House adjourned at two minutes past Eleven

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 10th February, 1892.

The House met at 12 o'clock.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) : I beg to give notice that I shall move an Amendment to the Address in the following words :—We deem it our duty to acquaint your Majesty that a decisive majority of the Irish people and of their representatives in this House are convinced of the inability of this Imperial Parliament to legislate for Ireland as the distinctive interests of that country require, and this conviction has been intensified by the manifest failure of the Land Purchase Act, 1891, to afford an acceptable basis for the extension of the class of occupying proprietors in Ireland.

PETITION.

THE REPRESENTATION OF EAST BELFAST.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) : I have to present a Petition from the inhabitants of East Belfast, calling the attention of the House to the practical disfranchisement of that constituency, and in view of legislation affecting Ireland during the present Session, asking this House to declare the seat vacant. As the Petition affects a Member of this House I beg to request that the Prayer of the Petitioner be read by the Clerk at the Table.

Petition presented, and read by the Clerk.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) : I have to present a Petition from the Orange Lodges of Belfast with a prayer to the same effect.

NEW WRIT.

For the Borough of Liverpool, Everton Division, v. Edward Whitley, Esq., deceased.—(Mr. Akers Douglas.)

VOL. I. [NEW SERIES.]

PROVISIONAL ORDER BILLS.

On the Motion of the President of the Board of Trade (Sir Michael Hicks Beach) leave was given to introduce the following Bills :

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES ORDER CONFIRMATION (NO. 1) BILL.

Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Board of Trade under "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888," containing the Classification of Merchandise Traffic, and the Schedule of Maximum Rates and Charges applicable thereto, of the North Eastern Railway Company and certain other Railway Companies.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES ORDER CONFIRMATION (NO. 2) BILL.

Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Board of Trade under "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888," containing the Classification of Merchandise Traffic, and the Schedule of Maximum Rates and Charges applicable thereto, of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Company and certain other Companies.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES ORDER CONFIRMATION (NO. 3) BILL.

Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Board of Trade under "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888," containing the Classification of Merchandise Traffic, and the Schedule of Maximum Rates and Charges applicable thereto, of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company and certain other Railway Companies.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES ORDER CONFIRMATION (NO. 4) BILL.

Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Board of Trade under "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888," containing the Classification of Merchandise Traffic, and the Schedule of Maximum Rates and Charges applicable thereto, of the Abbotsbury Railway Company and certain other Railway Companies.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES ORDER CONFIRMATION (NO. 5) BILL.

Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Board of Trade under "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888," containing the Classification of Merchandise Traffic, and the Schedule of Maximum Rates and Charges applicable thereto, of the North Staffordshire Railway Company and certain other Railway Companies.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES ORDER CONFIRMATION (NO. 6) BILL.

Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Board of Trade under "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888," containing the Classification of Merchandise Traffic, and the Schedule of Maximum Rates and Charges applicable thereto, of the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Company and certain other Companies.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES ORDER
CONFIRMATION (NO. 7) BILL.

Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Board of Trade under "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888," containing the Classification of Merchandise Traffic, and the Schedule of Maximum Rates and Charges applicable thereto, of the Midland and South Western Junction Railway Company and certain other Railway Companies.

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES ORDER
CONFIRMATION (NO. 8) BILL.

Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Board of Trade under "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888," containing the Classification of Merchandise Traffic, and the Schedule of Maximum Rates and Charges applicable thereto, of the Taff Vale Railway Company and certain other Railway Companies.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Main Question [9th February]—"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as followeth:—

Most Gracious Sovereign,

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the gracious speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament:

We take this first opportunity of offering to Your Majesty our sincere condolence in the afflicting dispensation of Providence with which Your Majesty and this Nation have been visited, in the death of His Royal Highness Prince Albert Victor, Duke of Clarence and Avondale:

We assure Your Majesty of our heartfelt participation in the universal feeling of sympathy with Your Majesty and Your Majesty's family under this grievous affliction, and in the deep sense entertained by all classes of Your Majesty's subjects of the calamity which the Country has sustained by the loss of a Prince who had won for himself the general affection and regard of Your Majesty's subjects."—(Mr. Hermon Hodge.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*(12.25.) MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I think it is to be regretted that no Member of Her Majesty's Government—that is to say, no member of the Cabinet—is present at the commencement of business to hear what hon. Members have to say in regard to the affairs of the country, and prepared to give explanations that may be asked for. The President of the Board of Trade is entering as I speak, but still I maintain it should be the duty of the Leader of the House to be present on an occasion of this kind. My object, in the first place, is to draw attention to the remote position occupied by the Employers' Liability Bill in the programme of the business of the Session. This, I think, is a just cause of complaint, and we are amply justified in calling attention to it. For five or six years past the Government have dangled this subject before the eyes of our workpeople without making any adequate effort to deal with it. I am perfectly aware that the Government did, in the Session of 1888, introduce a Bill and, by a sort of sledge-hammer process, and against the protests of all those concerned on behalf of workmen, brought that measure to a certain stage of procedure in this House. They succeeded in carrying that stage by a considerable majority, but they proceeded no further with it, and since then the only indication shown by the Government that they really have any interest in the question has been by continually finding some corner in the Queen's Speech in which to mention it, but making no further attempt to proceed with legislation upon this important matter. Now the Government have had ample time, plenty of opportunity, with a willing—I might almost say a clannish—majority at their back; and there is no excuse for thus neglecting the interests of the workmen. Had the Government been in earnest with regard to this question, they would have found the House—on this side, at any rate—quite prepared to co-operate with them in passing a good, substantial Bill. But they have not made any such attempt; they have shown no indication of being earnest in this matter. Here we are at what is presumably the last Session of this Parliament—almost at the death-bed of the Government of the day—I mean the political death-bed of the Government. The President of the Board of Trade does not seem to believe it, but I imagine he is about the only man in the country who does not. I say we have indications from all parts of the country, the evidence we had here yesterday seems to indicate that the country, at any rate, is of that opinion, whether the right hon. Gentleman is or not. In my opinion we are undoubtedly near the last hours of the present Government, and they have on this occasion again mentioned this subject almost at the end of Her Majesty's most gracious Speech, without any evidence that they are in earnest in regard to it. Indeed, the Leader of the House, in his reply last night, made no mention of the subject at all, treating the whole affair with the utmost contempt and disdain, passing by the Home Secretary's Bill without any reference. Indeed, as Leader of the House, he dealt with some other measures in an original manner. He practically abandoned the idea of introducing the District Councils Bill, and yet that Bill occupies on the programme a superior position to the Employers' Liability Bill. Well, if the Government have made up their minds not to make any attempt to deal with District Councils, then it is apparently certain, so far as one can draw a conclusion, that to mention the question of Employers' Liability is a mere farce, and that the Government have no intention to make any attempt, direct or otherwise, to deal with the subject. Now, Her Majesty's Government know perfectly well that when in 1888 they occupied a considerable portion of the time of the House, both here and in Grand Committee upstairs, with their Bill, that we were all anxious—as anxious as the right hon. Gentleman was—to dispose of this question once for all; and if Her Majesty's Government had on that occasion shown the least inclination to meet the reasonable demands of the people, by pushing the Bill on the lines of justice, the Bill would have been passed. But the right hon. Gentleman introduced a measure which was not acceptable to the people, which was objected to by all workmen's organizations, and which was condemned by a very large minority of Members of this House. He, standing to his guns, so to speak, refused to make the least concession, and by his dogged resistance the Bill was destroyed. Now, if the Home Secretary should be permitted by the Leader of the House to proceed with the Bill this Session, and if it is a Bill conceived in the same narrow, suspicious spirit as was the Bill of 1888, then the same tactics will be adopted by those opposed to it in 1892 as were pursued in 1888. But meantime the Government have learned from experience, if they have progressed in the path of Tory democratic policy on this as they have on other subjects that they propose dealing with this Session, and I should think the Home Secretary will have kept pace with his colleagues, and will be prepared, after four years' study, to introduce a Bill having for its main principles simplicity, straightforwardness, and ample justice to the working people, for whom this measure is chiefly needed. I make a very frank offer of assistance, and equally frank is the confession of a determination to oppose the measure, unless it be a reasonably good and fair one. I hope the Government will on their part be frank in any reply they may make to-day, and will tell us whether they really intend to make any attempt with the Bill or not. If they have no such intention, if the Bill is only mentioned in the Speech to extend the programme and make a demonstration at the commencement of the Session, then let us be told that at once, just as the Leader of the House told us in regard to the District Councils Bill, that there is no hope of passing it; that it is only put into the programme for filling up purposes; that they are not the least in earnest about this or any other of the Radical measures they profess their desire to pass into law. I am not going to dwell at greater length on the subject than to say that our demands with regard to employers' liability are simply based on common justice, having regard to the existing law. All we ask is this: that the workpeople of the country shall have the same law applied to them as is applied to other subjects of Her Majesty; that we shall be under no disqualification arising out of legally spun theories of common employment, upon which the Home Secretary loves to dwell, but which most other legal authorities have long abandoned as untenable. If the right hon. Gentleman will abandon his old-fashioned notions and place himself in line with the march of the opinions of the day, then we say we will welcome him, we will help him to pass his Bill, and he may go back to his constituents and appeal to them for a renewal of their confidence with at least one measure of importance down to his credit, and having during long years of office made an effort to pass legislation in the interest of workmen, their wives and children. There is one other subject I must ask the right hon. Gentleman's attention to before I sit down. Last Session he passed an Act amending the Factory and Workshops Consolidation Act of 1878, and by that Act, if I remember rightly, he abolished certifying surgeons—["No, no!"]—well they were not abolished, but the attempt was made to abolish certifying surgeons. At any rate, the effect of the Act of last Session, if it has been effective at all, if it will have any effect beyond that part of it which the Opposition secured, namely, the raising of the age of half-timers—and that, of course, will be effective—but if the other portions of the Act, which the right hon. Gentleman is responsible for, have any effect, there will necessarily be a large increase in the duties of the Factory and Workshops Inspectors. Well but, previously to the passing of the Act causing these additional duties, everybody admitted that the staff of Inspectors was totally inadequate to cope with the work imposed upon them. The Home Secretary, either at the commencement of last Session or the previous Session, undertook in this House, in answer to questions, to consider the question of an increase of the staff, and on one occasion, if I remember rightly, he almost promised that there should be an increase in the number of Inspectors. If the Act of last Session is to be enforced, new duties will be added to the work of the overburdened Inspectors. I do not know what the right hon. Gentleman has done during the recess; but, at any rate, there has been no public intimation, so far as I have been able to gather from the ordinary channels of information, that the Government have made up their mind, or made any effort, to increase the staff of Inspectors. I know the right hon. Gentleman will get up and say, as he has said before, that he cannot fill the country with Inspectors, and that too many Inspectors will interfere with trade, and that people must assist the administration of the law themselves by making communications to the Inspectors when the law is evaded. All that we have heard before many, many times, and it has been replied to again and again, that it is the duty of the Government, if they declare these laws are necessary, to see that the laws are enforced. It is not the duty of workmen and work-women, whose bread might be taken from their mouths, and their children starved, and their prospects ruined, to become the unpaid and unauthorised Inspectors of the Home Office. What we want is a reasonable increase. We are not asking that the Government should double the number or flood the country with Government Inspectors. All we ask is a reasonable increase to such a number as will make it reasonably probable that the law declared by both Houses of Parliament to be necessary shall not become a dead letter. Is the right hon. Gentleman, and are his colleagues, prepared to meet the demands of the friends of the workpeople and all who are concerned in this matter, or not? Let us have an answer, "yes" or "no," once for all, and then we shall know how to act, and what proceedings to take to bring our views of the necessity of the case before the Government. I have no intention of occupying the time of the House on this subject; but there is one other matter to which I ask permission to refer while I am upon these labour subjects, but this does not relate to the right hon. Gentleman's Department, but to the Board of Works. During last Session of Parliament a Resolution was agreed to in this House, at the request, I believe, of the First Commissioner of Works, that in future fair wages should be paid to the men engaged upon Government contracts. While in some cases that pledge has been redeemed, in others it has not. I should have liked—but I only had a communication to day from a trade concerned, namely, the London painters and decorators—to have given the First Commissioner notice of my intention to mention this. I wish he were present to tell the House why it is that the Resolution we agreed to, a modified Resolution, a compromise made at his own suggestion and adopted by the House without opposition, why that Resolution has not been faithfully interpreted, not been put in practice with all the trades concerned in Government contracts? I understand the complaint arises chiefly from the London painters and decorators. According to a circular I have received, the painters in meeting assembled—I have not a copy of the circular with me—have passed a resolution requesting Members of this House to call the attention of the Government to this subject—that the Department still refuses to pay the same rate of wages as has been paid by Messrs. Holland and Hannen for years back to their painters and decorators. If I remember aright, the circular intimates that the Government pay a halfpenny an hour less than the recognised rate of wages in the trade as paid by the best reputed firms in the Metropolis. I have no doubt the First Commissioner will take an early opportunity of inquiring into this matter. I am glad to see he has just entered the House. I was complaining of the want of good faith, so far as information has reached me a few hours ago, on the part of the Government in not giving effect to the Resolution of last Session, that all trades employed in the Department of Public Works should be paid at the current rate of wages paid by firms in the trade. In one case, that of the painters, the Government still refuse to pay the wages as paid by Messrs. Holland and Hannen, one of the oldest and most respected firms in the country; the Government are still paying something like a halfpenny an hour less than the prevailing rate of wages. The trade concerned through its members in meeting have asked Members of the House to inquire why the Government have not carried out in good faith the Resolution which was, if I remember rightly, heartily accepted by the First Commissioner, and, indeed, was a Resolution originally moved on this side of the House and amended by the right hon. Gentleman, he, as I understand, giving his word that the terms of the Resolution should be faithfully observed. We want to know if the statement I make on the authority of a printed circular is true, and why, if it is true, the Resolution has not been observed in the case of the painters, while it has been observed fairly, honourably, and straightforwardly by the right hon. Gentleman with regard to other trades? I am very pleased to see that the Leader of the House is now present, though I regret he was not present at the commencement of my remarks, for I should like to have from him some assurance on the subject as to which I complained. Will he tell us, in the most straightforward way he can, whether the Government intend to proceed with the Employers' Liability Bill? I do not wish in any way to complain that the Government have placed a scheme for Local Government for Ireland at the head of their programme; on the contrary I am glad they have done so; because, if the measure passes, it will be an initial stage to complete Home Rule established by the House of Commons, and it will save considerable labour to this side of the House in time to come when we are engaged upon a measure for completing the liberties of the Irish people. Neither do I complain of the measure in the charge of the Minister for Agriculture; but, on the contrary, I am pleased to see the progress made by a member of Her Majesty's Government on the subject to which, at no very distant date, he was bitterly opposed. It will be an additional interest to see this measure for the creation of small holdings passed through the House of Commons by the Minister for Agriculture, who used to be the champion in heaping ridicule and contempt upon those who suggested such legislation eight or ten years back. Of these two measures I make no complaint; but, at any rate, the question of employers' liability should have been considered next in importance, if not of equal importance, with these two, if the Government really wish to do justice to the work-people by doing their utmost to protect the lives and limbs of the heads of families among the labouring community. I thank the House for allowing me to make this appeal, and not only an appeal, for again I offer support and hearty co-operation. I will stay here as late and as long as any member of the Government is prepared to stay if the Home Secretary will only introduce such a Bill as commends itself to the reasonable judgment of my fellow-workmen through the United Kingdom.

\(12.53.) THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. D. R. PLUNKET, Dublin University):* As the hon. Member has informed the House, he has given me no notice of his intention to raise the subject with which my Department is concerned.

MR. BROADHURST: I did not get the communication in time to do so, and this was my only chance.

MR. D. R. PLUNKET: I had no idea that the hon. Member intended to go into the subject to which he has referred, so far as it affects the Department over which I have the honour to preside, else, of course, I would have been in my place to listen more fully to his remarks than I have been able to do. However, he has been good enough to repeat his earlier observations, so that I assume I now know the whole of what he had to say touching my Office. I have not the papers with me, but I think that without reference to the papers I shall be able to give an answer which will be satisfactory to the House. In the first place, I am very glad that the hon. Member, speaking, as he is well entitled to speak, on behalf of the interests of the working men concerned in this question, has nothing to complain of as to the carrying out by the Government of the Resolution of the House of Commons passed last year, except on the special point to which he has referred. I have also to thank him for his kind acknowledgment of the endeavour, at all events, which has been made, so far as we could make it to give general effect to that Resolution, and to carry it out in good faith. I am glad to have his assent so far. But what I must take objection to is this. He says that in the particular matter of the painters we employ under contracts which are given out by the Board of Works we have not given effect to that Resolution. I do not think he fully intended to make the accusation of bad faith; at all events, it is not likely that, having fully endeavoured to carry out in every other respect the Resolution of last year, we should deliberately have been guilty of bad faith, even if we had made a mistake in this matter of the painters. But I will explain how the case stands. In the original agreement entered into with Messrs. Holland and Hannen, a contract with which the House is well acquainted, for maintenance and repairs, there was at first a slight mistake in the figures they gave us as regards painters, and subsequently there was some correspondence between the representatives of the painters, or some of them, in the Metropolis and my office. The demand of the painters was that they should be paid at the minimum rate of 8d. or 8½d. an hour, some giving the one figure, some the other. The House will remember it was not proposed in the Resolution, and it certainly was disclaimed by those who supported it on behalf of the workmen last year, that the intention of the Resolution was to stereotype in every case as the rate of wages current in the market the rates which Trades Unions might desire. All we undertook to do was to ascertain what was actually agreed upon between the employers and the workmen in each trade, and, so far as we could, to see that that rate of payment was adopted. I am very glad to know that in all other trades, many of them much larger than the painters, with whom we have to deal, we have been able to give effect to the Resolution of the House of Commons by finding out and adopting these rates which are agreed upon in the trades. But as regards the painters, it was much more difficult to ascertain exactly what their rate of wages was. We at first were under the impression that it was a lower rate than was afterwards adopted. After a very full and complete investigation, we came to the conclusion as to what was a fair estimate of what was generally paid. Of course, as the hon. Gentleman knows, in many instances much less is paid; but what may be taken as a fair estimate of the usual minimum rate is 8d., and that is the scale we have adopted. Now, I hope the House will agree that when the demand made by the men themselves varied as between 8d. and 8½d., and we gave 8d., we have not, at all events, failed in good faith, or in recognising the Resolution of the House of Commons, and will think that this complaint is not well founded.

Mr. Broadhurst

(12.59.) MR. BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I may be allowed a few words on this subject, as I had the honour of introducing the Resolution which has been referred to. I could wish there had been the opportunity for giving notice of the intention to mention this matter, for I have had some correspondence in regard to it, and it would be well if we were in a position to deal with documents as well as recollection. I feel sure that no one in the House, and certainly not my hon. Friend below me, would wish to bring an accusation of bad faith against the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner, or his Department, in reference to the question of Government contracts; but I am bound to say that, so far as I can judge, the Resolution, adopted by the House of Commons unanimously last Session in reference to Government contracts, has not been satisfactorily carried out, so far, by any of the Departments. I personally have had a great deal of correspondence on these matters, and I believe that a great deal of good has been done by those whom my hon. Friend calls unpaid Inspectors—members of Trades Unions, and others—in calling attention to matters which have been placed before the Departments. I may say that in every correspondence I have had with different Departments—the Admiralty, the War Office, the Board of Works—complaints have been received with the utmost consideration and courtesy. I do not propose to touch on any of the questions with which the Admiralty or War Office are concerned. I think, probably on some future occasion, in Committee of Supply or otherwise, we may have to raise this question in connection with other trades and other Departments; but, meantime, I confine myself to a few words in reference to this particular case. As my hon. Friend has said, there is no ground of complaint against the Department so ably presided over by my right hon. Friend in the matter of carrying out the Resolution passed last year, except in regard to this matter of the painters. In regard to other trades in which my hon. Friend is interested, I believe the First Commissioner has fairly carried out the letter and spirit of the Resolution; but unquestionably there has been considerable complaint as to the rate the Board of Works are paying, and propose to pay, to painters engaged in work for the Department. The right hon. Gentleman will remember that when the contract was originally made Messrs. Holland and Hannen put down the rate of pay for painters at 8½d. Well, Messrs. Holland and Hannen having paid that without complaint for a limited time, then came to the Board of Works and stated, that they had made an error in regard to the figure, and desired to amend it, substituting 7½d. Upon that the Board of Works made the alteration to 7½d. an hour, and so the matter rested for a few weeks. The men, of course, very soon came to find out this reduction had been made, and made representations through myself and others to the right hon. Gentleman. Then after considerable correspondence and several personal interviews, and a good deal of time occupied, and trouble taken, the Board of Works agreed to raise the rate from 7½d. to 8d., but declined altogether to raise it to 8½d. Now I am bound to say, that in the consideration of this demand of the painters there was a great difficulty. In other building trades there have been agreements drawn up between representatives of the masters and of the men, by which certain specific wages have been stated to be those recognised in the trade; and I think it is because there has been this agreement between masters and men in other trades that the Department of the right hon. Gentleman has found no trouble in coming to a proper conclusion. But in regard to the painters, an agreement was made in 1873 to which Messrs. Holland and Hannen were parties and signatories, and under that it was arranged that the rate of wages should be raised  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. an hour, which the next year was increased to 1d. But in that agreement it was not specifically stated that  $8\frac{1}{2}$ d. was the minimum rate for wages, but it was generally understood in the trade. It was so, and on the part of the men it is contended that for private work, Messrs. Holland and Hannen, and other contractors, do pay at the rate of  $8\frac{1}{2}$ d. It was only in regard to Government work that they reduced the rate from  $8\frac{1}{2}$ d., and paid originally  $7\frac{1}{2}$ d., and now pay 8d. I am not going to say what ought to be the real rate of painters' wages; but the accusation brought against the right hon. Gentleman in regard to this matter is this: that when the matter was decided he declined, in the exercise of his discretion, no doubt quite wisely, to meet the representatives of the men to discuss the matter, while he did so meet representatives of the employers interested, Messrs. Holland and Hannen; and it was after an interview with them, and I am not quite sure as to other employers, that the rate was fixed. What we ask in regard to the matter is, that before the rate is irrevocably fixed the right hon. Gentleman's Department should see representatives of the men, as well as representatives of the masters. I quite agree it is not the business of the Government to fix the particular rate of wages in a particular trade; but the form of the Resolution to which we unanimously agreed—and I am bound to say that I think the form of my original Resolution was better than that submitted by the right hon. Gentleman—but even the Resolution substituted by the right hon. Gentleman was, that after making provisions as to subletting, the Government should make every effort to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted in the trade as the current rate paid to competent workmen. We ask that, in the endeavour to arrive at a conclusion, the Department shall not proceed upon information derived from only one side, but should take the representations of parties on both sides. Unfortunately the question of painters' wages is very much more difficult to decide than the question of wages in other trades; but if it can be proved that Messrs. Holland and Hannen and others are paying to painters on private work  $8\frac{1}{2}$ d., will the right hon. Gentleman be prepared to raise the minimum to  $8\frac{1}{2}$ d. for Government work? That is the question we ask. The right hon. Gentleman has met us with the utmost fairness and courtesy, and we desire only that the contracts from his Department and from other Departments shall be properly carried out, as was intended by the Resolution. The essence of that Resolution is, that the Government shall not in the amount they pay tend to depress the average rate of wages in a trade, that while not paying more neither shall they pay less than the current market rate. What the painters are afraid of is, that if this contract is allowed to continue without protest, the firms now paying  $8\frac{1}{2}$ d. for private work will contend that, inasmuch as 8d. is paid for Government work, the latter figure is established as a fair rate, and private work must be reduced to 8d. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will say he is prepared to re-consider this point, and that, in order to arrive at a fair conclusion in accordance with the Resolution of last Session, he will agree to consider the views of the men as well as of the employers.

*(1.10.) MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I think the question now before us is a very proper one to engage our attention in a debate upon the Address. I congratulate the House upon having, for the first time, a labour question introduced upon such an occasion. It is a new departure the House is taking in now discussing the subject of painters' wages. We generally, in these debates, deal with subjects of far less interest—matters of foreign policy, the balance of power, and such matters—which, of course, are of far less interest to the people we represent than the question of a halfpenny more or less in the rate of wages. The only remark I shall add to what the hon. Gentleman said, is merely also to urge upon the Home Secretary that he will see that this matter of wages is put right. It was not at all with the object of speaking about the claims of wages, however interesting the subject is, that I rose this afternoon. I want to make a few criticisms upon certain phrases used in the speech of the Mover of the Address. The mere employment of the word "Unemployed," in a speech made in moving the Address, is one of the most remarkable things I have heard in this House during the five years I have sat in it. I think I have, in every debate on the Address, introduced this question of the unemployed; and as at last I have got some response from the Government on this question, I shall not despair some day of having something done. What I wish to say merely is to criticise the proposed remedy brought forward by the Mover of the Address. Speaking upon this question of the unemployed—those men by whom our commercial supremacy has been founded—it was proposed to help them by granting better facilities for agricultural labourers to acquire land in the country. That, I think, is the most inconclusive way of dealing with the unemployed that I have ever heard, even from a man who seems to speak in the name of the Government. I cannot see myself, how granting extra facilities to acquire land to agricultural labourers is going to touch the question of the unemployed in the very smallest degree. It always seemed to me to be one of the most quack remedies that could be advanced. I venture to say to any Government that is going to deal with the question that the question is not to be dealt with in that way. It would be a very easy thing indeed to deal with it, if it could be dealt with in that manner. But I maintain that it is not to be practically dealt with in that way at all. There is a tendency, I think, in this nineteenth century for people to congregate together in large towns. The superior inducements of town life, and the superior rate of wages, and the amusements held out to them tend, in the long run, to bring them together; and being there, it would be better for the Government to endeavour to deal with the unemployed in the towns themselves, rather than in the country in the very inconclusive way which was sketched out yesterday. I maintain that it would be far better for the Government to do something towards the limitation of the hours of labour than merely to refer to the question in this perfunctory manner, as was done yesterday. If you grant the land to the agricultural labourers it does not seem to me that anything that you could do at such a distance, to work upon a problem which is so very acute as this undoubtedly is, would be likely to have the least degree of success; and therefore, although I have heard with great pleasure this reference to the unemployed, I do not think that anything will practically come out of the means of dealing with the question proposed by the Government. If you really want to do anything in the country itself, in my opinion, it can only be done by the acquisition of the land by the State as a whole. The proposal to deal with the question, by giving further facilities for raising up a peasant proprietary, is, in my opinion, the very greatest system of quackery that was ever heard of. We have seen a peasant proprietary established in almost every part of the world—in Germany, in Flanders, in France—and wherever they have been raised they have fallen into the hands of the money-lenders and the gombeen men, and they have a much harder lot than our agricultural labourers. Passing from this subject, of course it is almost a duty for me, holding the opinions I do, to perform the task to which I now address myself. I have listened with every attention and great sympathy to the very eloquent speeches which have been delivered in this House with reference to the unfortunate death of the late Duke of Clarence and Avondale, and the death of Mr. Smith, the late leader of this House. In reference to the late Duke of Clarence, I deplore to see any young man so very suddenly snatched away in the prime of life, and with such prospects as that unfortunate young man had before him. I also deplore that such a tried statesman as Mr. Smith, who gave satisfaction to both sides of the House, and also enjoyed the unbounded respect of all of us, should be taken from us. But there was one man who used to sit upon these benches, whose death I personally deplore more than that of either of the men I have mentioned—I refer to the late Mr. Charles Stewart Parnell. He was human, like the rest of us. He had his faults, as we all have; but when time has blotted out his faults, and when his qualities, which I consider great undoubtedly, have been more clearly discerned, when the present unhappy dissensions among the Irish Party have been removed, as they will be removed some day, the present generation will undoubtedly say that a most remarkable man, whom those in this House, if they did not all respect, very largely feared, has been taken from us; a man with whom I myself was acquainted on terms of friendship, and whose death, under the unfortunate circumstances which occurred, I shall always deplore, as having deprived this House of the most remarkable man who sat in it in this century.

Mr. Buxton

*(1.20.) SIR ALBERT KAYE ROLLIT (Islington, South): I agree with the hon. Member for Lanark that the present condition of the working classes is one of the most important questions that could be discussed in this House, and I regard it as a good augury that such matters should have been raised and discussed at this early period of the Session. These labour questions will demand consideration and solution, and, if the House is not familiarised with them, it may be called upon to legislate upon them in haste and without mature reflection, which would be a source of great injury, perhaps, to the country and to all classes. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Nottingham spoke of his proposal as a Radical measure; but I think it should not be forgotten, when dealing with this question, that the foundation of the discussion is the reference to it in the Speech from the Throne; and, secondly, that the minor grievances brought before the House, in regard to the painters, is based upon a Resolution which was passed by Her Majesty's Government last Session, in which very proper consideration is given to the rate of wages in all trades, and to the rate that ought to exist in relation to the Government contracts. But before I come to this point, I should like to say a word or two upon the Employers' Liability Act, a subject which raises a good deal of debateable matter. A great deal has been said in favour of the retention of the Judge-made law as to the doctrine of Common Employment. It was first applied in the early part of this century, and I think it is now somewhat out of harmony with the general ideas which prevail at this time. And I venture, with some familiarity with the law, to say that it undoubtedly, in many instances, works considerable injustice. I do not suppose that, on a debate upon the Address, we are likely to come to any common conclusion on that subject. But what I venture to suggest to the Home Secretary is that, when he is preparing his measure on this question, and when he submits it to the House, he shall, at any rate take care, whatever he may do with reference to the abstract question of common employment, to deal with some of the real and practical grievances which at present affect the working classes in relation to their employment. Take first the question of notice required under the Employers' Liability Act. The Act requires that in order to sustain a claim there must have been served previous notice in writing, of six weeks, which must give certain particulars. After considerable experience in dealing with this question I am satisfied that this matter of notice urgently requires amendment. I do not speak generally of employers—far otherwise—but I do know employers who are eminently charitable during the six weeks after an accident, and when the six weeks have expired the charity disappears. The result is that a man finding himself being kindly dealt with allows the six weeks to expire, and the six weeks having expired he is without remedy at law, and benevolence is put an end to. Under the section, if the Judge is of opinion that no injustice would be worked by an amendment as regards the notice, then an amendment may be allowed to be made; but if the notice is not given, or if it is faulty in complying with certain requirements of the Act, then, no matter whether it be unjust or not, the notice is bad, or the want of it fatal, and the Court is not empowered to make an amendment. Now, I take one instance with which I have some personal acquaintance. Here an accident happened. The person injured gave full particulars of it to the Inspector. The Inspector reported it to the superintendent of the works, and it ultimately came to the knowledge of the employer. And afterwards, and within the six weeks, a letter was written by the workman to the employer again stating that the accident had occurred, and referring him to the full particulars which had so been previously given. It is held in that case that there had been no adequate notice, and no amendment was allowed to be made; and notwithstanding the knowledge which the employer possessed, that man, in my opinion, was denied justice. It has been said that law and equity are two things which God has joined together, and which man has put asunder; and I think this is a notable instance of that description. If an amendment can be allowed to be made in point of form, and if the Court is satisfied, though no notice was technically given, yet that all the facts came under the notice of the employer, and that no injustice would be worked by it, I think that the principle applies, and that an amendment ought to be made. Speaking from memory, I believe that in case of the death, of a person no notice need be given, even by his relatives or personal representatives. In other words, an action can be sustained without any notice. Well, if in the case of death, which prevents notice being given by an individual himself, notice can be dispensed with, and no injustice is likely to be done, it can equally be dispensed with in the case of mere omission through want of memory, or the exercise of charity under such circumstances as I have stated, if, again, the Judge finds it will not cause injustice or surprise or fraud. That is a practical point on which some reform is necessary, and I hope that the Home Secretary will bear it in mind. There is another point which I think equally capable of amendment. The Act limits compensation to the recovery of not exceeding three years' wages. Well, I hardly know why that limitation should have been made. It is quite true that the action has to be commenced in a County Court, the jurisdiction of which is, generally, of limited extent. But there is a right of removal of such action to a superior Court, and of course the question of the amount involved might properly be taken into account by the Judge, though, as a rule, such removal is most undesirable on the ground of the greater expense. There are, however, some instances in which the compensation which has been awarded is notably inadequate; and in order to secure a full and equitable compensation I do not see why such a limitation should not be removed, subject to the check of the trial being had in exceptional cases, but in those only, in a superior Court to which I have referred. I have only a word to add, and that is with regard to the question raised about the painters. It seems, from all I have heard, that this is a matter of fact which can readily and easily be cleared up; but that matter of fact cannot be cleared up by hearing only one side. As a member of the London Conciliation Board, which has been fairly successful, I can state that the very foundation of success is that the working classes should be fairly convinced that both sides shall equally gain a hearing; and there can be no conciliation unless that principle be rigorously carried out. I am glad to know that it has evidently been carried out as a general practice, though apparently not in this instance, by the right hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench (Right Hon. D. R. Plunket). There is no one who is not aware of the difficulties he must have in dealing with these questions of wages. I am glad to see that even the hon. Gentleman the Member for Nottingham fully recognises the great care and discrimination exercised by the right hon. Gentleman generally. May I suggest that the right hon. Gentleman will at any rate—even if it be superfluous—it will give satisfaction—reinvestigate the matter, and afford an opportunity to all interested to be heard, a practice which is not only requisite for full knowledge and justice, but which is the very basis of all conciliation, and so of the resulting benefit of good relations between employers and employed.

(1.30.) SIR JOSEPH W. PEASE (Durham): I do not propose to follow the arguments on the Employers' Liability Act. I think that this debate ought to have taken place in Committee of the House on the Bill itself. I had the honour of sitting on the Committee on that Bill, and these points, which my hon. Friend opposite has made, were discussed from time to time in their proper place on that Committee. All I shall do is to ask Her Majesty's Government, as speedily as possible, to deal with that Act, many portions of which are capable of being modified and amended. I wish to say a few words on a subject which I had intended to bring before the House last evening, but unfortunately I was not in my place when it came on. Many friends of mine in the country who have taken a large interest in the question of the Indian opium trade were disappointed on finding that there was nothing in Her Majesty's Gracious Speech with regard to the question which came before the House, and which was decided by the House in terms which were quite unmistakeable. And these terms were to urge upon the Indian Government to cease to grant licences for the cultivation of the poppy, as the revenue raised by them was immoral and indefensible. Some of us are anxious to know whether Her Majesty's Government have had any communication with the Indian Government on the subject. The question I introduced to the House on the 10th of April last was the cultivation of the poppy and the trade generally in opium. The right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House, whose loss all of us very sincerely deplore, took credit for Her Majesty's Government that they had during the last five years decreased the area which was under the cultivation of the poppy. So far that was very satisfactory to those of us who are warring against the cultivation of the poppy in India. But what we want to know from Her Majesty's Government, though this perhaps is not a very suitable occasion to ask for the information, is whether this Resolution has been communicated to the Government in India, and what steps they propose to take with regard to the question? The right hon. Gentleman the late leader of the House admitted practically that the cultivation of the poppy was immoral in its action on the whole population of India and China, to which the trade more particularly applied. I am anxious to know what the Indian Government have to say to the question. I have in my pocket a Bill in which the Government of Victoria in Australia propose absolutely to put an end by very heavy penalties to the opium consumption in that colony. It was brought forward by two responsible members of that Government, and I have been told by a late member of that Government that, in all human probability, this Bill will be passed by a very large majority in the colony of Victoria. Now, Sir, this shows practically what is the view of these men, who are acting upon their own judgment and own responsibility in the Government of that country. They emphatically endorse these allegations which we have made, that the trade in opium carried on by the Government of India is immoral and indefensible.

(1.37.) MR. ROBERT GRANT WEBSTER (St. Pancras): One might naturally feel surprised that there has been no reference made by any Member of the Opposition with regard to the fact stated in the Speech from the Throne that Her Majesty has lost in the Viceroy of Egypt a loyal ally, whose wise government had, in the space of a few years, largely contributed to restore prosperity and peace to that country. The fact of our remaining in Egypt at the present time has not been referred to, although that fact was made by Members of the Opposition a matter of considerable animadversion. Why is it? I believe it is because it has come to the mind of the Opposition that our remaining in Egypt at the present time is not only essential to the prosperity of Egypt, but essential to our commercial prosperity. We have since our arrival in Egypt carried out a number of reliable remedies, but not without very great difficulty. The courbash has been abolished; sanitation and education have been improved; and also slavery, to a very great extent, has been suppressed. I think that is a very good record for this Government, when we recollect that when this Government came into office the state of Egypt was in an eminently untisfactory condition. This being the state of things, it is no wonder that Gentlemen on the Opposition Benches have very little to say in this House regarding the question of Egypt. Turning to the reference in regard to Zanzibar, the Government have been able to make satisfactory statements at a treaty has been made with His Highness the Sultan, and that in consequence there would be opened out to British trade and commerce a very large portion of the East African Coast. owing to the hostile tariffs with which any foreign countries have recently edged round their countries, an export trade to many has been gradually diminishing, therefore the extension of our markets to new, if at present only partially developed, countries is a matter for congratulation. The hon. Member for North West Lanarkshire (Mr. Cunningham Graham) complained the Bill to provide allotments in the country. The hon. Gentleman has always advocated the system of State Socialism, but when we remember that we are a very highly civilised community, and have been so for centuries, it appears to me that any tempt to hand over the whole of the land of the country to Councils, to be parcelled out by them to the agricultural labourer, would be absolutely and completely unworkable. In looking over the Queen's Speech I find there are two very important measures to be brought in with regard to Ireland. A large number of the Unionist Members at the last general election, in their election addresses, stated that they would be willing to vote for a further extension of local self government in England and in Scotland, and to do the same with regard to Ireland when the time was ripe for such a change. Sir, that time has arrived, the conditions of fairs in Ireland have improved, five or six thousand people who had to go about their business day by day guarded by policemen, and were subject to the cruel tyranny of the boycotting system, are now as free as any of my constituents in St. Pancras. The catalogue of serious crime has greatly diminished, and that being so, and having regard to the comparative quietude that prevails, I think the time has arrived to pass a measure of local government for Ireland. There is another clause in the gracious Speech from the Throne we are considering; a scheme to extend the advantages of assisted education to Ireland. A great deal of objection was made yesterday as to a statement of the Prime Minister that some of the people of Ireland were backward. I think we are enabled, by statistics, to show that in some Irish constituencies one-half of the people who go to the poll claim to vote as illiterates, and we must acknowledge that if they have not the education necessary to enable them to put their names to a voting paper, the state of education in Ireland cannot be altogether satisfactory. I have reason to believe that in many instances other reasons besides want of education may induce them to claim as illiterates, which I hope to have an opportunity of referring to later this Session. There was also an attack made on the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby on a statement of the Prime Minister that County Councils have not, up to the present time, conducted to economy. I do not believe that when these Councils have got into thorough good working order there will be any permanent increase on the rates; but as far as London is concerned, the County Council system has up to now proved a most expensive and a not altogether satisfactory experiment. We shall all welcome the introduction into London of the District Councils Bill. London is at the present time under a variety of bodies, and it would be desirable to have District Councils. The Vestries have, in some instances, done remarkably good work, in others they have not done so, and though we generally do not desire to do away with the old divisions we should in London welcome District Councils as a valuable link in the chain of good local self-government. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby also attacked the Prime Minister for certain statements he had made in regard to the people of Ireland. It was difficult exactly to follow of what he complained. He further said such statements would offend the people of America, though why the statement that a few of the inhabitants of these Isles were backward should cause offence in America, or anywhere else, it is difficult to comprehend. The last speaker complained that the Government did not propose to do away with the opium traffic. I know something of this subject, and I know that a very great deal of the opium used in China does not come from India at all, but from China itself. The use of the drug at all is, of course, to be deplored; but whether it come from India or not, the people of China would unfortunately continue to use that drug. In considering this matter the House must remember that if we do away with that traffic we shall have to consider the question of the revenues of India. At present silver is decreasing considerably in value, and that will materially affect the finances of India; therefore, if this alteration is to take place, it ought to be made gradually, and not at one fell swoop.

(1.45.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I am sorry, Sir, I cannot agree with the sanguine expectation, expressed by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, as to the intentions of the Government respecting the District Councils Bill. The paragraph in the most gracious Speech from the Throne is certainly very vague, and is not very encouraging; but the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House last night was very discouraging. He gave a long list of measures of great importance, and he led us to think that there was no hope for the District Councils Bill unless all those measures were satisfactorily disposed of. If that is the way the Government approach this subject we can only draw one conclusion, and that is that they do not seriously intend to deal with the question of District Councils, either in London or throughout the country, this year.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): We do seriously intend to deal with the question; but whether we have the power or not depends upon the hon. Gentleman.

MR. T. H. BOLTON: If the power depends upon me, the Government will have ample opportunity of dealing with the question, because of all the measures mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, I believe this is one of the most practical and most necessary. The want of a District Councils Bill paralyses the action of County Councils, and paralyses the action of the municipal authorities in this city. I heard yesterday the expression of a hope that the Government would embody in a Small Holdings Bill provisions not only for the purchase of small holdings, but for the leasing of land, and for the sub-letting of such leased land to persons desirous of occupying holdings. How is it possible to carry out any idea of that kind without District Councils? To suggest that County Councils with their wide areas and wide jurisdiction should lease and let land would be absurd. To hand over to Boards of Guardians the control of such business would be unsatisfactory, and to suggest that the present unsatisfactory parish vestries should deal with such matters would be worse still. How it is possible to give effect to the very valuable and practical suggestion that land should be leased and sub-let, as well as sold, to persons desiring to use it, without District Councils, I cannot for the life of me understand. I can quite understand that there may be a disinclination on the part of the Government to establish Elective Councils for parishes, and it may be preferable that there should be a reformed vestry, or reformed assembly of the parish generally, rather than the creation of a Parochial Board; but there should be no hesitation in carrying out what the Government is committed to in principle, namely, the establishment of District Councils to assist County Councils to deal with those matters, local in their character, which the County Councils cannot so well attend to. If this matter is to be a pious opinion, without a serious intention on the part of the Government, it will go far to destroy the prospect or hope of anything being done this Session in connection with land reform in the country districts of England. I cannot too strongly press upon the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House the importance of this portion of the Government programme. I feel that in London, especially, there is a strong desire to have a reformed vestry system, so that the London County Council may be improved and able to deal satisfactorily with purely local questions. The London County Council is over-loaded with parochial work. At present there is a disinclination to hand over that work to the vestries. Although the larger and more important vestries do their work very well, some do not do it so well. The absence of District Councils, having the confidence of the people, prevents the County Council from confining its attention to those larger matters to which its attention ought to be confined, leaving the smaller but very important work to the districts. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give a more earnest assurance as to the desire of the Government to deal with this question of District Councils this Session. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby spoke last night of the programme of the Government consisting only of remanets. I do not object to have remanets disposed of. I do not know that it is unsatisfactory for the Government, towards the close of a Parliament, to try to pass those measures that have been repeatedly before the House. If the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House presses forward a good District Councils Bill there are many on this side of the House who will help him; but to suggest that this measure may be brought forward only after a long list of difficult measures are carried, is to show us that there is no intention of dealing with the matter this Session. I feel justified in making this appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to give us a stronger and more definite assurance that the Government will put forward this measure soon, not only in the interests of London but of the country at large.

(2.15.) MR. AINSLIE (Lancashire, N. Lonsdale): I should not have risen on this occasion at all, had it not been for the remarks which have been made by the hon. Member for Nottingham with regard to the Employers' Liability Bill, in which I took some part two years ago. He has made an omission in reference thereto which I venture to supplement. He alluded to the fact that the Government did not press forward the Bill on the last occasion with the energy which they might have displayed. In my own opinion the Government did what was in their power. They had, for reasons of their own, delegated the work of dealing with the Bill to one of the Grand Committees—the Committee on Law—and, if I may venture to say so, I think their action in that respect rather failed in effecting the object which they had in view. It brought too many persons, who were not specially concerned in the matter, into the Committee room, and the ultimate effect was the failure of the Bill to be passed. The hon. Member for Nottingham's action on that occasion is very well known. He has always taken a very strong leading part in objecting to certain clauses in that Bill, or rather in the two Bills which have been before us, and I cannot blame him for the action which he takes as representing a large body of Trades Unionists. But he has omitted to refer to the action taken by another leading representative of a large body of men in this country in his time, though, unfortunately, his well-known face is missed from those benches. I refer to the late Mr. Bradlaugh, whom I regarded as quite as much an exponent of the opinions of the working classes as the Member for Nottingham. His support on the last occasion was given unstintingly to the Government measure, even though he held an opinion that, on some one or two points, amendments might still be made with advantage. Now, I have to say, representing as I do a very large working-class community, that it would not do for the Government to neglect to pass this Bill this Session, if by any possibility it can be carried. I want to support the suggestion that the Government should place this measure in a somewhat forward position. It will redound to their credit if they can do so; but it will do very much more, for it will show to the public, and the great body of the working classes, that Governments can do something, and are ready to do something, when they are asked. But it will not do, no matter what Government may be in power, for a measure of this sort to be brought in year after year, and then laid aside, as alleged, for want of time. The obstacles which the Government have met with have not been from this side of the House. The hon. Member opposite seemed to be under two impressions: one was that the Government could not possibly last more than one Session; and the other, evidently, that the Government must last longer, or else it would not have urged them to pass this measure. Because, if a Government is to be formed by right hon. Gentlemen on the opposite benches, naturally it would have their support to pass the Bill, and he would not have to ask us on these Benches to carry it. The reference of the Bill to a Grand Committee was, as I have said, a technical mistake. I hope the Government will not repeat it, but will offer a Special Committee, and that it will go before a Committee of the whole House, and not such a Committee as that on Law or on Trade. This is one of those occasions when something may be done by a conference of those who have the subject at heart, for the points of difference between us are not so great but that they may be settled, and I hope the hon. Member will show a disposition to assist the Government in passing this measure. If he does so, he shall receive every assistance at my hands in forwarding the Bill.

(2.25.) MR. BRYCE: I see the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in his place, and I desire to have this opportunity of asking one or two questions with regard to foreign affairs, to which I hope he will find it possible to give me an answer, though, if not, I shall be glad if he can do so on the next occasion. I am glad to take this opportunity of congratulating the hon. Gentleman on his appointment to a post in the Government, and to express the confident hope that the same qualities that distinguished him when he represented the Charity Commission will not fail him in the more responsible office he now fills. I should like, in asking a question with regard to the Consulship at Erzeroum, which has been vacant for some time, and which, I hope, he will be able to tell us will be filled up, to pay, in passing, a tribute to the distinguished qualities and services of our late Ambassador at Constantinople. I think Her Majesty had not, in the Diplomatic Service, a man of greater powers of mind than the late Sir William White; a man of extensive knowledge of all foreign affairs and great technical skill in handling diplomatic business, which entitled him to the confidence of Her Majesty and this country. His loss has been very great to British interests in the East, and it is one which it will be very hard for anyone else to supply. I wish to ask the hon. Gentleman who has been appointed to succeed Mr. Clifford Lloyd at Erzeroum, and whether it is intended that Erzeroum shall be still the principal Consulship in that part of Asiatic Turkey, which has practically been the centre of the district in which most of the disturbances occurred? It is a matter, therefore, of considerable importance that a man of judgment, and tact, and knowledge, should fill the post. The hon. Gentleman will perhaps tell us when it is intended to present any further Papers relating to the state of affairs in Armenia and Asiatic Turkey generally? There is reference made in Her Majesty's Gracious Speech to the progress of negotiations with regard to the settlement of the Sealing question in the Behring Sea. That reference, however, is rather indefinite, and I hope the Under Secretary can tell us in what precise position the negotiations now stand? I see the American papers state that the delays which have occurred have been owing to Her Majesty's Government. I should think that statement is probably incorrect, but we shall be glad to know that everything has been done on the part of Her Majesty's Government to accelerate the arbitration; and in particular we should like to know whether it has yet been settled how the other arbitrators, in addition to those to be named by the United States, are to be selected: whether the Government have agreed upon them; or whether they have agreed upon the Governments who are to be asked to name the arbitrators? The hon. Gentleman will perhaps also tell us when further Papers with regard to these matters will be presented? As regards the Newfoundland Fisheries, I think the House will be glad to learn what is the position of affairs in the Colony at present, and whether arrangements have been made for the passing of the Act which the Colonial Government undertook to have passed in the Newfoundland Legislature? It is a good many months since the preliminary agreement with the French Government was arrived at, and we have not heard since then whether the French Government has presented that agreement to the Legislature for its acceptance, nor when it is likely that the agreement can be presented. The matter is one which in times past has caused much friction, and is at all times apt to involve fresh friction, and we shall be glad, therefore, to know if there is a reasonable prospect of this matter being settled? The questions pending between the United States and this country and Canada are remaining in abeyance, and if the hon. Gentleman has any information to give us with regard to them we shall be glad to have it. There is one more subject on which I shall be glad to have information. It is the Convention for the regulation of the liquor traffic in the North Sea. Six years ago an agreement was entered into between the representatives of the different Powers, whose territories adjoined the North Sea, for a scheme by which the liquor traffic carried on by the vessels going to the fisheries there should be put under some restriction. At present very great harm follows from the sale of liquor on the liquor boats or floating taverns; and it has been felt by those interested in the condition of the fishermen, not only of our own country, but by those interested in the Danish, Dutch, and German fishermen, that an international regulation of the matter would be of great advantage. In 1886 a Convention was made for that purpose, and it has been ratified by every Power except France, and I hope we shall be told now that the French Government will bring the matter before their Legislature again, and that there is a prospect that it will be accepted. This matter involves no political considerations, and yet the necessary arrangement can only be carried out by the combined action of the different Powers concerned. The point, therefore, is one of considerable importance, and it is one in which the enlightened public opinion of France, as well as of this country, would act upon the Legislature if the facts were known. I hope the hon. Member will be able to give us further assurances on this subject.

Mr. Ainslie

*(2.25.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): There is one subject which has not been alluded to by my hon. Friend below me, and that is, as to the state of the negotiations with regard to the Brussels Conference on the Repression of the Slave Trade. When the subject was last heard of the bulk of the Powers concerned had given their assent to the suggestions of the Conference, but France and Portugal were still outstanding; and we shall be glad to know whether pressure can be exercised by the Government of this country, which took the initiative in having that Conference summoned, so that its labours should not be abortive.

*(2.27.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): Allow me, in the first place, to thank my hon. Friend opposite for the very kind expressions which he has used personally to myself. I hope that, whether the time be short or long which I have to serve in the office I now fill, I shall deserve the kind expressions which the hon. Gentleman opposite has used. With regard to the first question which the hon. Gentleman has put to me, I am able to inform him that the Consulship at Erzeroum has been filled up by the appointment of Mr. R. W. Graves. This gentleman was originally a student interpreter; he subsequently served as Vice Consul at Sophia, and he for a considerable time occupied the same post at Philippopolis. I believe that it is intended that Erzeroum shall still occupy the prominent position which it is in at present in regard to Armenian affairs. As to laying Papers upon the Armenian question upon the Table of the House, I will make inquiries in the Office as to whether it is possible to do so. I do not conceive that any objection can be made to laying such Papers; but the affairs of Armenia have been very quiet during the last few months, and I do not anticipate that the Papers will be either full or lengthy. I will, however, endeavour to see whether there are materials existing for a Blue Book which can be laid before the House. I may, perhaps, add that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to lay upon the table of the House Papers relating to the riots in China, which have excited a considerable amount of attention, and also Papers with regard to the Behring Sea negotiations, and also Papers in regard to the revolution in Chili. In regard to commercial matters, it is also intended to lay Papers dealing with the commercial matters of Europe in two volumes; the first volume of which will not include any reference to the recent Commercial Treaties which have been arranged by the Central Powers of Europe, nor with regard to the recent tariff arrangements made in France; but the second volume will include those Papers. With regard to the Behring Sea dispute, I am happy to be able to inform the hon. Gentleman that a complete agreement has been arrived at between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States. The points of arbitration have been decided upon, and the Powers who are to be asked to appoint the arbitrators have also been agreed upon. Those Powers are Italy, France and Sweden; but I ought to add that the Governments of those Powers have not yet been asked whether they will agree to appoint arbitrators as proposed; but so far as Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States are concerned, they have come to an agreement to ask these Powers to appoint arbitrators. In addition to that, it is also agreed between our Government and the Government of the United States that we shall be represented by two arbitrators upon the Board of Arbitration, and that the United States shall be equally represented. Then as to the Commission which was appointed for investigating on the spot into the character of the necessary precautions which may be required for the maintenance of seal life in the Behring Sea, that Commission has completed its labours, so far as their individual investigations are concerned. The British and American Commissioners have now met at Washington, and they are just on the point of entering upon the consideration of their joint Report. In regard to Newfoundland, I am afraid that matters have not advanced very rapidly; but the draft Bill which the Newfoundland Government have undertaken to pass into an Act has been seen by Her Majesty's Government, and it now only awaits introduction to the Newfoundland Legislature. I believe some slight delay has arisen through the temporary absence from Newfoundland of one or two gentlemen who came over here as delegates, and are, therefore, seized with special knowledge of the subject, but on their return to Newfoundland the matter will be proceeded with. As to the negotiations with France, upon that matter the French Government have not yet, I believe, presented for ratification to their Chamber the agreement for arbitration. I am afraid I cannot give the hon. Gentleman very definite information on this matter, and if he requires anything further, I will ask him to put a question on the Paper. As to the North Sea Fisheries Convention, I understand that in that case also the French Government have not, up to the present, taken any measures for ratifying the Convention of 1886. Only quite recently we were approached by the German Government, and asked what steps were being taken in the matter; and we informed the German Government that, as Holland was the convoking Power, it rested with the Dutch Government to get ratification of the Convention that was made. The hon. Member opposite asked with regard to the Brussels Convention. I am happy to be able to say that the Brussels Act has been practically ratified; the French Government have ratified it with certain modifications, though the ratification by the Portuguese Government still remains in abeyance. The Portuguese Legislature is occupied at the present time with domestic matters of great interest, and it is possible some time may yet elapse before that Government is in a position to bring before the Legislature proposals for the ratification of the Brussels Act. But Her Majesty's Government do not anticipate that any difficulty will be created beyond the lapse of time which unfortunately must occur.

*(2.50.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. H. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The hon. Member asked whether there was any hope of the Employers' Liability Bill being presented and prosecuted this Session. That is a subject on which I have every hope of seeing effective legislation this Session, and I should be extremely disappointed if this Parliament came to an end without my having an opportunity of asking the judgment of the House upon it. It is a measure on which I have spent much time and trouble, and which has caused me much anxiety. Nothing has disappointed me more, in the course of my short official career, than the failure of the attempts I have made, on two occasions, to improve the law on this most important subject. The opening remarks of the hon. Member for Nottingham filled me with the liveliest hopes; he began by promising his co-operation, but from the later portion of his speech it turned out that that co-operation was only to be given on the absolute surrender of the Government; and that if a complete surrender is not made, the Bill will be met with the same dogged opposition as was displayed before. It is the fault of the hon. Member for Nottingham that the question has not been dealt with before now. The Bill I introduced in 1888 was based on the Report of a Committee of this House, appointed by a Government of which the hon. Member was himself a member, and was composed of a majority of his own political friends. The Inquiry by that Committee was full and exhaustive. I believe that every one of the views which the hon. Member has put before the House were discussed before that Committee. The Committee made a Report to this House, and upon that Report was based the Bill which I presented to the House; and I believe I did not disregard one of the recommendations of that Report, some of which were extremely obscure, one in particular, Clause 3, caused me certainly hours of labour in endeavouring to put it into practical shape. I honestly endeavoured to give effect to every recommendation of that Committee in my Bill; and what is more, I went beyond the recommendations of the Committee, and met many of the blots which legal decisions had searched out in the language of the former Bill, to the prejudice of the working man seeking compensation under its provisions. Many decisions had been given which were looked upon, and deservedly so, as detracting from the merits of the Act, and these were meant to be counteracted by my Bill of 1888. What was the course of the hon. Member for Nottingham? A great deal of the time of the House was consumed in the discussion of that Bill; it then went before a Grand Committee upstairs, and its provisions were subjected to a minute and searching examination by Members of all Parties in the House, and it then came back to this House late in the year, when the Session was drawing to a close, and the course of the hon. Member was, instead of showing any anxiety to forward enactments which were improvements, even if they did not go so far as he desired, which were alterations in the interests of working men and for the benefit of those classes whom he claimed in a special manner to represent—instead of co-operating in the passing of that Bill, he, at the last moment, chose to raise a question which of itself must require much discussion and consideration to give effect to it—the question of what was known as the doctrine of Common Employment. That is a legal doctrine of far-reaching character, requiring to be considered from every conceivable point of view. The legal ground upon which that doctrine rests is that a man who has virtually agreed to undertake to expose himself to certain risks ought not when mischief follows to turn round and claim compensation. That is the reasonable ground of the doctrine of common employment. I quite agree that there is great difficulty in applying the doctrine to certain cases, in finding out where there was a real undertaking of the risk, so that no claim for damages arises. I think there is some need for amendment of the law in the definition of common employment, but the difficulties involved in that subject are most difficult to resolve.

To a man desiring to do justice to both employers and employed it is a question requiring careful and deliberate consideration, and to foist that principle into a Bill at the last moment was to deliberately wreck the Bill. The hon. Member thought it right to take a course which ended in the loss of the Bill of 1888, which, I believe, embodied the last and best recommendations of a Committee of this House on the subject, and it was a decided advance on the existing law. Not only that, but it was an advance on the hon. Member's own Bill. In 1886 the hon. Member put his name on the back of a Bill, on which was also the honoured name of the hon. Member for Morpeth. The Bill I presented in 1888, which the hon. Member wrecked by his action, was a great advance on that. But in that year these new lights had not dawned on the hon. Member's mind, and he had not introduced in his Bill any words destroying the doctrine of common employment. In that Bill the hon. Member embodied his last and best theories, and then he was not prepared to make those startling changes in the law which he suggested to the House, at the eleventh hour, in my Bill, after careful consideration by a Grand Committee. The stimulating effect of being two years in opposition to a Conservative Government was yet to come. All I can say is that the hon. Member did cause the rejection of a Bill which was a great advance on his own Bill of 1886, by introducing at the last moment an Amendment which would require some months of discussion. Let, therefore, the responsibility be thrown on the shoulders which ought to bear it. The hon. Member for Nottingham is responsible for the fact that this question has not advanced very much. For instance, there is the practical suggestion which the hon. Member for South Islington made to-day, with reference to the injustice worked by the rule as to six weeks' notice, the want of which destroyed the workman's right to compensation on a technical point, and the question of the amount of compensation. Both these matters were dealt with in my Bill of 1888—I will not say in a manner completely satisfactory, but in a manner not completely unsatisfactory, and were capable of being improved by any rational and practical mind dealing with it in the House, without going into the doctrine of common employment. If the hon. Member had applied his mind to the Notice Clause of my Bill, and the increased compensation it gave, he would have rendered more practical service to those whom he claims to represent than by pursuing the course he did. I assure the hon. Member I desire to act justly to all classes in this question, and I shall endeavour to do so. Important inquiries are going on at this moment in relation to cognate subjects to this, before the Royal Commission on Labour, and I hope a great deal has already been learned from the evidence given. I trust also that long before the Session has closed some assistance may be got from the evidence with regard to the clauses of the Act. There is no Bill about which I shall feel more anxiety, and there is no Bill upon which I shall be more glad of the assistance of all those who are entitled to speak on the question. At the same time, my hope is strong, and has not been destroyed by the speech of the hon. Member to-night; but he must remember that this Bill does not take the first place in the programme of the Government, and there are other measures which must have precedence, and I can only hope that the hon. Member and his friends will allow these measures to pass with sufficient rapidity to enable me to bring forward this Bill, which would confer as great benefit on the country as any other proposed in the Queen's Speech. The hon. Member has not condescended to study that part of the Factory Act of last year which deals with the question of certifying surgeons, and a little time spent in such study would not have been wasted. He supposes also that it will increase the labours of the Factory Inspectors. †It diminishes in an enormous degree what they have to do. It takes away the whole sanitary inspection of workshops and gives it to the officials of the Local Authority; therefore, when the hon. Member clamours for the increase of Factory Inspectors, he shows that he has not been at the trouble of considering the provisions of the Bill to which he refers. I have already made an addition to the staff of Inspectors in the direction in which it was wanted—in the due administration of the Cotton Cloth Factories Act of 1889. Under that Act an amount of inspection was required by law, which the existing staff of Inspectors could not carry out. It was by no means easy to select men competent to administer that Act, which involves a wide knowledge of instruments and various technicalities; but after careful consideration I have selected gentlemen who have either undergone, or are now undergoing, examination by the Civil Service Commissioners, and they will then be appointed Factory Inspectors in Lancashire, and I hope the proposed additional expenditure will receive the sanction of the Treasury.

(3.0.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): We have now arrived at the time when it was understood the Debate should be adjourned and I move that the Debate be now adjourned.

• Debate further adjourned till tomorrow.

MOTIONS.

SHOP HOURS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Channing, Bill to amend the Law relating to the employment of women and young people in shops, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Channing, Mr. Hermon-Hodge, Mr. Samuel Smith, Mr. Seton-Karr, Mr. Jennings, and Mr. Provand.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 26.]

TENURE OF LAND BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Thomas Ellis, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Tenure of Land in Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Thomas Ellis, Mr. Bryn Roberts, Mr. Bowen Rowlands, Mr. Arthur Williams, Mr. Lloyd-George, and Mr. Samuel Evans.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 27.]

PLACES OF WORSHIP ENFRANCHISEMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Bryn Roberts, Bill to provide for the enfranchisement of Leasehold Places of Worship, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bryn Roberts, Mr. Samuel Evans, Mr. Halley Stewart, Mr. James Rowlands, Mr. Lloyd-George, Mr. Waddy, Mr. David Randell, and Mr. John Kelly.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 28.]

MINES EIGHT HOURS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Leake, Bill to restrict labour in mines to eight hours per day, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Leake, Mr. William Abraham, Mr. Pickard, Mr. David Randell, Mr. Philippis, Mr. Roby, Mr. Jacoby, Mr. Conybeare, Mr. Spencer Balfour, Mr. Arthur Acland, Mr. Philip Stanhope, Earl Compton, and Sir Walter Foster.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 29.]

PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) ACT (1891) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Roche, Bill to amend "The Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Act, 1891," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Roche, Mr. Justin McCarthy, Mr. Dillon, Mr. Sexton, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. William O'Brien, and Mr. Knox.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 30.]

RATING OF MACHINERY BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Gerald Balfour, Bill to amend the Law relating to the rating of hereditaments containing machinery, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Gerald Balfour, Sir Bernhard Samuelson, Mr. Mather, Mr. Tomlinson, Mr. Winterbotham, Sir William Houldsworth, and Mr. Smith Wright.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 31.]

EVICTED TENANTS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. O'Kelly, Bill for the reinstatement of Evicted Tenants in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. O'Kelly, Mr. Clancy, Mr. John Redmond, Mr. Timothy Harrington, and Mr. Pierce Mahony.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 32.]

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (PURCHASE OF LAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Haldane, Bill to enable Local Authorities to value and purchase Land, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Haldane, Mr. Asquith, Sir Edward Grey, Mr. Arthur Acland, Mr. Sydney Buxton, and Mr. Munro Ferguson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 33.]

MUNICIPAL FRANCHISE (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Condon, Bill to amend the Law relating to Municipal Franchise in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Condon, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Flavin, Mr. Pinkerton, Mr. O'Keeffe, Mr. Murphy, and Mr. Maurice Healy.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 34.]

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACT (1882) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Mattinson, Bill to amend "The Municipal Corporations Act, 1882," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mattinson, Mr. Cross, Mr. W. F. Lawrence, and Mr. Royden.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 35.]

PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE (EXTENSION TO WOMEN) BILL.

On Motion of Sir Albert Rollit, Bill to extend the Parliamentary Franchise to Women, ordered to be brought in by Sir Albert Rollit, Sir Algernon Borthwick, Viscount Wolmer, Mr. Walter M'Laren, Mr. Penrose FitzGerald, Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Burt, and Mr. Ernest Spencer.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 36.]

PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE (EXTENSION TO WOMEN) (No. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Walter M'Laren, Bill to extend the Parliamentary Franchise, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Walter M'Laren, Sir Algernon Borthwick, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Sir Edward Watkin, Baron Dimsdale, Dr. Cameron, Sir Albert Rollit, Mr. Lewis Fry, Mr. Webb, Mr. Byron Reed, and Mr. Maclure.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 37.]

ELECTORS QUALIFICATION AND REGISTRATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Stansfeld, Bill to amend the Law with respect to the Qualification and Registration of Electors at Parliamentary, Municipal, and County Elections in England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Stansfeld, Sir George Trevelyan, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Henry H. Fowler, Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth, Sir Horace Davey, and Mr. Asquith.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 38.]

LABOURERS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Joseph Nolan, Bill to amend the Labourers (Ireland) Acts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Joseph Nolan, Mr. John Redmond, Mr. Mahony, Mr. Timothy Harrington, Mr. Clancy, Mr. Leamy, and Mr. John O'Connor.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 39.]

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS TO CHILDREN BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Conybeare, Bill to amend and extend the Law relating to the prohibition of the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors to Children, and for other purposes connected therewith, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Conybeare, Mr. Walter M'Laren, Mr. Channing, Mr. Henry J. Wilson, and Mr. Octavius V. Morgan.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 40.]

STEAM ENGINES (PERSONS IN CHARGE) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Fenwick, Bill to provide for Certificates to Persons in Charge of Steam Engines and Boilers on Land, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Fenwick, Mr. Burt, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Pickard, Mr. William Abraham (Rhondda), Mr. Sinclair, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Seton-Karr.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 41.]

PLURAL VOTING (ABOLITION) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, Bill to provide that no person shall vote upon Parliamentary Elections in more than one electoral area during one electoral year, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, Sir William Harcourt, Sir George Trevelyan, Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Broadhurst, Sir Horace Davey, and Mr. Asquith.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 42.]

COAL MINES REGULATION ACT (1887) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Pritchard Morgan, Bill to amend the Coal Mines Regulation Act of 1887, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Pritchard Morgan, Mr. Pickard, Mr. David Randall, Mr. William Abraham (Rhondda), Mr. Jacoby, and Mr. Cremer.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 43.]

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Ernest Spencer, Bill to establish a Department of Labour, to be presided over by a Minister to be called the Labour Minister, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Ernest Spencer, Sir Albert Rollit, and Sir Joseph Pease.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 44.]

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (BANFF) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Duff, Bill to make better provision for the administration of certain Educational Endowments in the County of Banff, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Duff, Mr. Asher, and Mr. James Campbell.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 45.]

PENSIONS (OLD AGE) BILL.

On Motion of Sir Walter Foster, Bill to provide Pensions for poor persons over the age of sixty-five years, ordered to be brought in by Sir Walter Foster, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Winterbotham, Mr. Alfred Thomas, and Mr. Spencer Balfour.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 46.]

LEASEHOLDERS (PURCHASE OF FEE SIMPLE) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Lawson, Bill to give facilities to Leaseholders for the purchase of the Fee Simple of their Holdings, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Lawson.

MUNICIPAL FRANCHISE (IRELAND) (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. John O'Connor, Bill to regulate the franchise in municipalities and townships in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. John O'Connor, Mr. Clancy, Mr. Timothy Harrington, and Mr. William Redmond.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 47.]

LIQUOR TRAFFIC LOCAL VETO (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. M'Lagan, Bill to enable owners and occupiers in burghs, parishes, and districts in Scotland to prevent the common sale of intoxicating liquors, or otherwise to have effectual control over the drink traffic within such areas, ordered to be brought in by Mr. M'Lagan, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Mackintosh, Mr. Lyell, Mr. Cameron Corbett, Dr. Clark, Mr. Munro Ferguson, Mr. John Wilson, and Mr. Mark Stewart.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 48.]

RETURNING OFFICERS' EXPENSES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Esslemont, Bill to provide for the payment of Expenses to be incurred by Returning Officers at Parliamentary Elections in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Esslemont, Sir George Trevelyan, Mr. Marjoribanks, Mr. M'Ewan, Mr. Munro Ferguson, and Dr. Clark.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 49.]

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAYS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Broadhurst, Bill to prohibit the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sundays, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. James Stevenson, Mr. Walter James, Mr. Octavius V. Morgan, Mr. Cozens-Hardy, and Mr. Charles Wilson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 50.]

COMPULSORY SALE OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Bill to provide for the Compulsory Sale of Land in certain cases in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Dickson, Mr. Knox, Mr. Jordan, Mr. Matthew Kenny, Mr. McCartan, and Mr. Pinkerton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 51.]

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACTS (1881 AND 1887) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Dr. Fitzgerald, Bill to amend the Land Law (Ireland) Acts, 1881 and 1887, ordered to be brought in by Dr. Fitzgerald, Mr. T. Harrington, Mr. Clancy, Mr. Mahony, and Mr. William Redmond.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 52.]

RIGHTS OF WAY (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Buchanan, Bill to confer on County Councils in Scotland the power of maintaining and protecting Rights of Way and otherwise to amend the Law relating to Rights of Way in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Asher, Mr. Arthur Elliot, Dr. Farquharson, and Mr. Shiress Will.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 53.]

FIRE BRIGADES (EXEMPTION FROM JURY SERVICE) BILL.

On Motion of Viscount Curzon, Bill to exempt members of Fire Brigades from service on juries, ordered to be brought in by Viscount Curzon, Sir Edward Birkbeck, Mr. Dixon Hartland, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Gully, Mr. Baird, and Sir Albert Rollit.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 54.]

CHURCH BUILDING ACTS (COMPULSORY POWERS REPEAL) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Powell, Bill to repeal the provisions of the Church Building Acts relating to the compulsory purchase of sites for churches and burial grounds, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Powell, Mr. Talbot, Mr. Tomlinson, and Mr. Addison.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 55.]

BOILERS INSPECTION AND REGISTRATION BILL.

On Motion of Sir Edmund Lechmere, Bill to provide for the Inspection and Registration of Boilers, ordered to be brought in by Sir Edmund Lechmere, Mr. Hermon-Hodge, Mr. Mather, Mr. Burt, Mr. Coddington, Sir William Houldsworth, and Mr. Maclean.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 56.]

MARRIAGE WITH A DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Leon, Bill to amend the Law as to Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Leon, Mr. Colman, Mr. Furness, Mr. John Kelly, Mr. Lambert, and Mr. Logan.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 57.]

TENURE OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Thomas Dickson, Bill to amend the Law relating to the tenure of Land in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Thomas Dickson, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Dillon, Mr. William O'Brien, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, and Mr. M'Dermott.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 58.]

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. O'Keeffe, Bill for making better provision for the housing of the working classes in Irish cities and towns, ordered to be brought in by Mr. O'Keeffe, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Murphy, Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Mr. Flavin, Mr. Maurice Healy, and Mr. Webb.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 59.]

OLD AGE PROVIDENT PENSIONS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Bartley, Bill to provide pensions in old age to the provident poor, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bartley, Mr. Maclean, and Mr. Seager Hunt.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 60.]

POOR LAW GUARDIANS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Webb, Bill to amend the Law relating to the constitution and election of Board of Poor Law Guardians in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Webb, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. P. J. Power, Mr. Deasy, Mr. William Abraham (Limerick), Mr. Hammond, and Mr. Patrick Joseph O'Brien.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 61.]

UNIVERSITY EDUCATION (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Harrison, Bill to afford increased facilities for University Education.

in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Harrison, Mr. Timothy Harrington, Mr. Clancy, and Mr. John Redmond.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 62.]

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Johnston, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors in Ireland, on Saturday and Sunday, and for other purposes connected therewith, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Johnston, Mr. Lea, Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Maurice Healy, Mr. Mahony, Colonel Saunderson, Mr. Jordan, Sir Charles Lewis, Mr. William Corbett, and Mr. O'Neill.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 63.]

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Kilbride, Bill to improve the position of National School Teachers in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Kilbride, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Knox, Mr. Sheehy, Mr. Dillon, and Mr. Cox.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 64.]

GOVERNMENT OF SCOTLAND BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Hunter, Bill to amend the provision for the future Government of Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hunter, Mr. Laing Brown, Mr. Buchanan, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Esslemont, Sir John Kinloch, Mr. Leng, Mr. Philippis, Mr. Robert Reid, Mr. Edmund Robertson, Mr. Shiress Will, and Mr. John Wilson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 65.]

PIG IRON WARRANTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Hingley, Bill to regulate dealings in Pig Iron, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hingley, Mr. Ainslie, and Mr. Isaac Wilson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 66.]

POOR RATE (METROPOLIS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Pickersgill, Bill to provide for the equal distribution over the Metropolis of a further portion of the expenses charged to the Poor Rate; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. Howell, and Mr. Sydney Buxton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 67.]

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Channing, Bill to consolidate and amend the Laws relating to Agricultural Holdings in England and Wales; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Channing, Mr. Seale-Hayne, Mr. Cobb, Mr. Halley Stewart, Mr. Francis Stevenson, Mr. Arthur Williams, and Mr. Lambert.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 68.]

AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Tuite, Bill to improve the condition of Agricultural and other Labourers in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Tuite, Mr. Dillon, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr.

Sexton, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Donal Sullivan, and Mr. Finucane.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 69.]

OUTDOOR RELIEF (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Cox, Bill to amend the Law relating to the distribution of Outdoor Relief in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Cox, Mr. Jordan, Mr. Barry, Mr. Flynn, Mr. MacNeill, Mr. Collery, and Sir Thomas Esmonde.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 70.]

TOWN HOLDINGS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. O'Hanlon, Bill to amend the Law relating to Town Holdings in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. O'Hanlon, Mr. Mahony, Mr. O'Kelly, Mr. Harrison, Mr. Carew, and Mr. Harrington.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 71.]

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Dillon, Bill to make better provision for the construction of Piers and Harbours in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Dillon, Mr. Barry, Mr. MacNeill, Mr. Gilhooley, Mr. Deasy, Mr. Pinkerton, and Mr. Webb.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 72.]

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Stern, Bill for the purpose of facilitating the operation of "The Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890," in so far as it relates to rural sanitary districts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Stern, Sir Walter Foster, Mr. Francis Stevenson, and Mr. Brand.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 73.]

FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Conway, Bill to amend the Law relating to Fisheries in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Conway, Mr. Mahony, Mr. William Corbet, and Mr. Nolan.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 74.]

BURIALS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Osborne Morgan, Bill further to amend the Burial Laws, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Channing, Mr. John Ellis, and Mr. Illingworth.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 75.]

RAILWAY SHAREHOLDERS (LICENSING SESSIONS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Maclare, Bill to remove the disabilities of Railway and other Shareholders in public companies from acting at Licensing Sessions, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Maclare, Mr. Coddington, and Mr. Fielden.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 76.]

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Burt, Bill to amend "The Employers' Liability Act, 1880," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Burt, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Jocey, Mr. Haldane, and Mr. Lockwood.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 77.]

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Sheehy, Bill to amend the Law relating to Parliamentary Elections, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Sheehy, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Matthew Kenny, Mr. Knox, and Sir Thomas Eamonds.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 78.]

REGISTRATION ACTS (LODGERS)*AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Octavius V. Morgan, Bill to amend the Registration Acts with reference to lodgers entitled to vote at Parliamentary elections, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Octavius V. Morgan, Mr. Beaufoy, Mr. Bolton, Mr. Sydney Buxton, Mr. Cremer, Mr. Howell, Mr. Dawson, Mr. Montagu, Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. Rowlands, and Mr. James Stuart.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 79.]

TREES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Knox, Bill to encourage the planting of Trees in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Knox, Dr. Tanner, Mr. Deasy, Mr. Dillon, Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy, and Mr. Murphy.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 80.]

MARRIED WOMEN BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Ambrose, Bill to amend the Law by limiting the power of a married woman to bind her husband by contract in certain cases, and to further limit the time for the recovery of small debts and demands, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Ambrose and Mr. Bartley.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 81.]

FISHERIES (IRELAND) (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. William Abraham (Limerick), Bill for the better development of Fisheries in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. William Abraham (Limerick), Mr. Pinkerton, Mr. Morrogh, Mr. Webb, Mr. McCartan, Mr. Lane, and Mr. O'Keeffe.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 82.]

RETURN TICKETS.

On Motion of Mr. Morton, Bill to enable passengers in Railway Trains and on Steam-boats, &c., to make use of Return Tickets at any time after the date of issue, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Morton, Mr. Caldwell, Mr. Causton, Dr. Clark, Mr. Lloyd Morgan, and Dr. Tanner.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 83.]

GUARDIANS OF THE POOR (QUALIFICATION) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Henry J. Wilson, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Qualification of Guardians of the Poor, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Henry J. Wilson, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. James Stuart, Mr. Walter McLaren, and Mr. James Rowlands.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 84.]

SOLICITORS' APPRENTICES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. O'Neill, Bill to amend and consolidate the Laws relating to Solicitors and to the service of Indentured Apprentices in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. O'Neill, Mr. Maurice Healy, Mr. Macartney, Mr. O'Keeffe, and Mr. Barton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 85.]

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Chance, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Drainage and Improvement of Land in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Chance, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Maurice Healy, and Mr. Knox.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 85.]

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS (IRELAND) (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Henry Campbell, Bill to amend the Law relating to National School Teachers in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Henry Campbell, Mr. John Redmond, Mr. Timothy Harrington, Mr. Joseph Nolan, and Mr. Conway.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 87.]

WEEKLY WAGES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Sexton, Bill to provide for the weekly payment of Wages in certain cases in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Sexton, Mr. Justin McCarthy, Mr. Thomas Dickson, Mr. Flavin, Mr. O'Keeffe, and Mr. Murphy.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 88.]

CHURCHES AND SITES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. William Corbet, Bill to provide Sites for Churches, Schools, and Teachers' Residences in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. William Corbet, Mr. John Redmond, Mr. Clancy, Mr. Carew, and Mr. Conway.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 89.]

CONTEMPT OF COURT (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Finucane, Bill to amend the Law relating to Contempt of Court in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Finucane, Mr. Knox, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Dillon, Mr. William O'Brien, Mr. Sexton, and Mr. Donal Sullivan.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 90.]

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Howell, Bill to consolidate, simplify, and amend the Law relating to Parliamentary Elections; and for other purposes relating thereto, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Howell, Mr. Sydney Buxton, Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. James Stuart, Mr. Fenwick, Dr. Hunter, Mr. Bowen Rowlands, and Mr. Warmington.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 91.]

PUBLIC HOUSES (HOURS OF CLOSING) (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Dr. Cameron, Bill to amend "The Public Houses (Hours of Closing) (Scotland) Act, 1887," ordered to be brought in by Dr. Cameron, Mr. M'Legan, Mr. John Wilson (Govan), Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Hunter, and Mr. Leng.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 92.]

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (QUALIFICATION) BILL.

On Motion of Sir Joseph Pease, Bill to abolish the property qualification required by persons acting as Justices of the Peace, ordered to be brought in by Sir Joseph Pease, Sir William Harcourt, Sir Henry James, Mr. Burt, and Mr. Alfred Pease.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 93.]

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ALLOTMENTS BILL.

On Motion of Dr. Tanner, Bill to amend the Labourers' (Ireland) Acts for the purpose of providing increased allotments of land for the agricultural labourers in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Dr. Tanner, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Knox, Mr. Flynn, Mr. Gilhooley, and Mr. Sheehy.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 94.]

PLUMBERS' REGISTRATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Knowles, Bill for the National Registration of Plumbers, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Knowles, Mr. Arthur Acland, Sir Algernon Borthwick, Earl Compton, Mr. William Cross, Mr. Dixon, Dr. Farquharson, Mr. Bowen Rowlands, and Mr. Sexton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 95.]

SCHOOL BOARD FOR LONDON (SUPER-ANNUATION) BILL.

On Motion of Sir Richard Temple, Bill to enable the School Board for London to grant superannuation allowances to teachers and other employees, ordered to be brought in by Sir Richard Temple, Mr. Gilliat, Mr. Cross, and Mr. Ambrose.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 96.]

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS (ENGLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Allison, Bill to enable localities in England to control the sale of Intoxicating Liquors, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Allison, Mr. Jacob Bright, Mr. Burt, Sir Walter Foster, Mr. Henry J. Wilson, and Mr. Octavius V. Morgan.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 97.]

PARISH COUNCILS, &c. BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Cobb, Bill for the creation of Parish Councils, to be elected by reformed parish vestries, with powers as to allotments, charities, outdoor relief of the poor, the management of elementary schools, the housing of the working classes, and other matters, and to amend the Allotments Acts, 1887 and 1890, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Cobb, Mr. Channing, Sir Walter Foster, Mr. Seale-Hayne, Mr. Halley Stewart, Mr. Herbert Gardner, Mr. Arthur Acland, Mr. François Stevenson, and Mr. Leon.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 98.]

POLICE DISABILITIES REMOVAL (EXTENSION) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Schwann, Bill to extend the provisions of "The Police Disabilities Removal Act, 1887," to municipal and other elections, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Schwann, Mr. Walter McLaren, Mr. Arthur Williams, Mr. Causton, Mr. Roby, Mr. Mather, Mr. Seale-Hayne, and Mr. Haldane.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 99.]

TOWN HOLDINGS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. James Rowlands, Bill to give Compensation to occupying Tenants of town holdings for beneficial Improvements, ordered to be brought in by Mr. James Rowlands, Mr. Lawson, Mr. David Thomas, and Earl Compton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 100.]

SHERIFF COURTS CIVIL CODE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Caldwell, Bill to combine in one Code the regulations affecting Sheriff Courts in Scotland, and to extend and amend the Law of Civil Process therein, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Caldwell, Sir George Trevelyan, Mr. Philippe, and Mr. John Wilson (Govan).

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 101.]

HOSPITALS, &c. (ASSISTANCE FROM RATES) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Mather, Bill to enable municipal corporations and other local authorities to give grants in Aid, out of the Rates, if they think fit, to Hospitals and Infirmaries, and such like Charitable Institutions supported by voluntary contributions, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mather, Mr. Sydney Buxton, Mr. Knowles, Mr. Schwann, Mr. Tomlinson, Mr. Atherley-Jones, and Sir Albert Rollit.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 102.]

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY JURISDICTION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Penrose FitzGerald, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Jurisdiction of the Chancellor, Vice Chancellor, and other authorities of the University of Cambridge over persons not members of the University; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Penrose FitzGerald, Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Newnes, Sir Algernon Borthwick, and Mr. Walter McLaren.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 103.]

DECK CARGOES BILL.

On Motion of Mr. James Stevenson, Bill to amend the Merchant Shipping Acts in respect of the carrying of Deck Cargoes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. James Stevenson, Mr. John Wilson (Durham), and Mr. Feawick.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 104.]

COMPANIES ACT (1862) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Sir William Houldsworth, Bill to amend the Companies Act, 1862, ordered to be brought in by Sir William Houldsworth, Mr. Hoyle, Mr. Howell, Mr. Mowbray, and Mr. T. Harrop Sidebottom.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 105.]

COPYHOLD ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Brand, Bill to amend the Copyhold Acts, and for the enfranchisement of copyhold and customary lands, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Brand, Mr. Newnes, Mr. Cobb, Mr. Halley Stewart, and Mr. John Kelly.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 106.]

PUBLIC HEALTH (INTERMENTS) ACT (1879) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. J. W. Sidebotham, Bill to make better provision for the regulation and control of Cemeteries provided under "The Public Health (Interments) Act, 1879," ordered to be brought by Mr. J. W. Sidebotham, Mr. John Bright, Mr. William Cross, Mr. Lees, Mr. Mather, and Mr. William Sidebottom.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 107.]

MAGISTRATES IN POLICE BURGHS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Hugh Elliot, Bill to enable the Junior Magistrates of Police Burghs in Scotland to act ex officio as Justices of the Peace and Commissioners of Supply for the County in which the said Burghs are situated, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hugh Elliot, Mr. Mark Stewart, and Mr. Shaw-Stewart.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 108.]

MERCHANT SEAMEN (PROVISIONS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. J. Wilson (Durham) Bill to amend the Law relating to Provisions supplied to Seamen, ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Wilson (Durham), Mr. Fenwick, Major Rasch, and Mr. Sydney Buxton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 109.]

CONVEYANCING AND LAW OF PROPERTY ACT (1881) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Thomas Henry Bolton, Bill to amend "The Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881," with reference to Leaseholds, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Thomas Henry Bolton, Sir Horace Davey, Sir Albert Rollit, Mr. Warmington, and Mr. Restoul.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 110.]

HARES BILL.

On Motion of Colonel Dawney, Bill to enact a "Close Time" for Hares during the breeding season, ordered to be brought in by Colonel Dawney, Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Dillwyn, Mr. Alfred Pease, Dr. Fitzgerald, and the Marquess of Carmarthen.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 111.]

SALMON FISHERIES (IRELAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Macartney, Bill to amend the Salmon Fisheries (Ireland) Acts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Macartney and Mr. O'Neill.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 112.]

BEER ADULTERATION BILL.

On Motion of Colonel Kenyon-Slaney, Bill for better securing the purity of Beer, ordered to be brought in by Colonel Kenyon-Slaney, Sir Edward Birkbeck, Baron Dimsdale, Mr. Round, and Mr. Fellowes.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 113.]

INDUSTRIAL AND PROVIDENT SOCIETIES (LEASEHOLD ENFRANCHISEMENT) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Seale-Hayne, Bill to give facilities to Industrial and Provident Societies for the purchase of the fee simple of their holdings, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Seale-Hayne, Mr. Lawson, Mr. James Rowlands, Mr. Bartley, Mr. Fraser Mackintosh, Mr. John Kelly, Mr. Octavius V. Morgan, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Channing, and Mr. John Wilson (Durham).

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 114.]

NATIONAL INSTITUTIONS (WALES) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Alfred Thomas, Bill to appoint a Secretary of State for Wales, to constitute a Welsh Educational Department, to make further provisions for Local Government, and to create a National Council in Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Alfred Thomas, Mr. Dillwyn, Mr. Bowen Rowlands, Mr. Price, Mr. David Randell, Mr. Davies, Mr. Samuel Smith, Sir Edward Reed, Mr. Pritchard Morgan, Mr. Hanbury-Tracy, Mr. Samuel Evans, Mr. William Abraham, Mr. Abel Thomas, Mr. Thomas Ellis, Mr. Lloyd-George, Mr. John Roberts, Mr. Lewis, and Mr. Lloyd Morgan.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 115.]

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Seale-Hayne, Bill to amend the Law in regard to the appointment, qualification, and removal of Justices of the Peace, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Seale-Hayne, Mr. Bernard Coleridge, Mr. Howell, Mr. Stuart Rendel, Sir Bernhard Samuelson, Mr. Arthur Williams, Mr. Cobb, and Mr. George Lambert.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 116.]

TEACHERS' REGISTRATION AND ORGANIZATION BILL.

On Motion of Sir Richard Temple, Bill for the registration and organization of Teachers, ordered to be brought in by Sir Richard Temple, Mr. Howorth, Mr. Spencer, and Mr. Winterbotham.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 117.]

JURYMEN'S EXPENSES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Colonel Nolan, Bill for the payment of the expenses of those summoned to serve on juries, and for the abolition of Grand Juries at Quarter Sessions in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Colonel Nolan, Dr. Fitzgerald, Mr. Harrison, and Mr. William Corbet.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 118.]

SHERIFF COURTS (SCOTLAND) EXTRACTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Caldwell, Bill to simplify the forms of extracts of decrees in the Sheriff Courts of Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Caldwell, Mr. Edmund Robertson, and Mr. Mackintosh.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 119.]

PAROCHIAL BOARDS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Dr. Cameron, Bill to reform the constitution of Parochial Boards in Scotland, and the mode of electing the members of such Boards, ordered to be brought in by Dr. Cameron, Mr. Barclay, Mr. Shiress Will, Dr. Farquharson, and Mr. Mackintosh.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 120.]

CORPORAL PUNISHMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Milvain, Bill to amend the Law relating to corporal punishment, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Milvain, Sir Matthew Ridley, Sir George Russell, and Mr. Wharton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 121.]

COUNTY COURTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Chance, Bill to amend the Law relating to County Courts in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Chance and Mr. Murphy.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 122.]

DIVORCE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Hunter, Bill to amend the Law of Divorce, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hunter, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Cobb, Mr. Fenwick, and Mr. Herbert Gardner.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 123.]

OUTDOOR PROVIDENT RELIEF BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Bartley, Bill to amend the Law relating to Outdoor Relief in sickness and widowhood to the provident poor, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bartley, Mr. Maclean, and Mr. Seager Hunt.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 124.]

PRIVATE BANKS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Ernest Spencer, Bill to amend the Law relating to Private Banking Firms, and to make it compulsory that all such firms shall issue an annual balance sheet to their customers, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Ernest Spencer, Mr. Warmington, Mr. Maclure, and Mr. Bartley.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 125.]

PRISONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Channing, Bill to amend the Laws relating to the treatment of Prisoners under various Acts in England and Wales; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Channing, Mr. Picton, Mr. Atherton-Jones, and Mr. Barran.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 126.]

ARTIFICIAL MANURES, &c. (ADULTERATION) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Channing, Bill for the better prevention of frauds in the manufacture and sale of Artificial Manures and other preparations for agricultural purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Channing, Mr. Halley Stewart, Mr. Seale-Hayne, Mr. Cobb, Sir Walter Foster, Dr. Farquharson, and Sir John Swinburne.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 127.]

SOLICITORS' (MAGISTRACY) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Maclure, Bill to enable Solicitors of the High Court of Justice to act as County Magistrates, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Maclure, Mr. Winterbotham, Mr. Sydney Gedge, and Sir Albert Rollit.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 128.]

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) ACT (1890) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Sir Albert Rollit, Bill to amend "The Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Act, 1890," with respect to contributions for technical instruction, ordered to be brought in by Sir Albert Rollit, Lord Brooks, Mr. Woodall, and Mr. Roe.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 129.]

House adjourned at a quarter past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

*Thursday, 11th February, 1892.SMOKE NUISANCE ABATEMENT (METROPOLIS) BILL. [H.L.]

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: My Lords, I rise to ask your Lordships to read, for the first time, a Bill for the abatement of Smoke in the Metropolis. The subject has often come before the House, and at the present moment it excites considerable interest. The Bill I wish to introduce will approximate, as far as the present state of the law permits, with the form that had previously received the sanction of the Select Committee, who went with anxious care into the details and took important evidence upon it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY): The noble Lord has not given notice, has he?

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: The noble and learned Lord will admit that it is not necessary to give notice.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: For a Bill to be presented for First Reading, but nothing more. If the noble Lord was going to make any observations upon it, he ought to have given notice.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: I am not about to make any further observations, except to express the hope that Her Majesty's Government agree with me that the time for legislation has arrived, and that the time for inquiry has been thoroughly exhausted. It is perfectly usual in this House to make an observation within those narrow limits.

A Bill to amend the Acts for abating the nuisance arising from the smoke of furnaces and fireplaces within the metropolis—Presented by the Lord Stratheden and Campbell; read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 9.)

EAST INDIA OFFICERS BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to amend the Law relating to certain officers in India—Was presented by the Secretary of State for India in Council (the Vicount Cross); read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 10.)

ARMY SERVICE.*QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD WANTAGE: My Lords, I wish to ask my noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for War (Earl Brownlow), to whom I have given notice of the question, whether the Report which has been presented to the Secretary of State for War upon the terms and conditions of service in the Army will be laid before this House; and, if so, when?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Earl BROWNLOW): My Lords, up to the present time the Secretary of State has only received the part of the Report signed by the members of the Committee; but he has not received the dissent, which I understand to be signed by one or two members, nor has he received the evidence and the appendices. But it is the intention of the Secretary of State to lay the Report upon the Table in due course.

POLICE PROTECTION IN IRELAND.*QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: My Lords, I beg to ask my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal the Question that stands in my name, which runs as follows:—To ask Her Majesty's Government whether Mr. John Dillon, Mr. William O'Brien, or Mr. T. Healy have at any time been accorded police protection in Ireland since the prorogation of Parliament in August last; whether any one of these persons is at present accorded police protection when in Ireland; and whether police protection was accorded to any of these persons at their own request?

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): My Lords, my noble Friend has not elaborated the question of which he has given notice, and I am hardly in a position to answer as to the exact circumstances to which he refers. My noble Friend is quite aware that every subject of Her Majesty has the right to police protection for his person and his property, whenever such police protection may be found to be necessary. And certainly, with regard to those three persons alluded to by my noble Friend, that right has been conceded to them in the same manner as it would be conceded to all other of Her Majesty's subjects. The final clause of my noble Friend's question refers to a matter of detail, which I am afraid I am unable to answer. My noble Friend has himself been in a position in which he took a large and important share in the maintenance of law and order in Ireland; and I think that at the time when he was Viceroy he would have somewhat deprecated the putting of such a question as that. It is obvious that details of that sort are not such as it would be desirable to discuss in public or within the walls of Parliament, and I trust that to that extent, at all events, my noble Friend will not press me for an answer to his question. I do not understand him to ask with reference to any special dates or times upon the subject to which he has referred; therefore I trust that he will be satisfied with the general answer I have given, that in the case of these three persons named no distinction or difference has been made, but that such police protection has been afforded to them as would be afforded to any one of your Lordships, or any subject of Her Majesty.

*The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY: My Lords, I am afraid I cannot accept with satisfaction the reply of my noble Friend. I have, as he has mentioned to your Lordships, had a certain amount of experience with regard to the extension of police protection in Ireland. But I would remind him that, in the districts where that police protection is extended, the reasons for which that police protection is invariably extended are generally, and very well known. For instance, my Lords, if there is any member of the lower or humbler classes who has in any way offended the National League of the district by simply taking advantage of those rights which are open to every one of his fellow-citizens, it is well known that his life and his property are in danger, and, consequently, police protection is extended to him. Again, my Lords, if we take the case of a landlord who has come under the ban of the National League, simply because he declines to accept the Plan of Campaign, or any other illegal conspiracy of a similar character, —again, I say, his life is also in considerable danger, and again he is placed under police protection. And it is well known why he is placed under police protection. I have myself visited the South of Ireland, and seen some of the inhabitants of that part of the country walking about with policemen behind them; and I should be glad to know from my noble Friend whether that same system of police protection has been extended to the three persons to whom I have alluded, and whether, when they have been in any part of Ireland, either under the troublous circumstances of a general election or at any other time, they have been followed by policemen in the same way as the class of persons to whom I have alluded.

EARL CADOGAN: The question is a somewhat novel one.

THE MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY: I know that it is a somewhat novel question to be put, either to my noble Friend or to any other Member of Her Majesty's Government; but it is simply novel from the fact that the three men to whom I refer have, until a very short time ago, and I believe up to the present moment, before English audiences posed as the idols of the majority of the Irish people. Therefore that is one of the reasons why I wish to know this; because I wish to prove to the English people whether they are the idols they profess to be or not. Then, my Lords, I wish to ask my noble Friend another question. I speak subject to correction on this point, because I have not got the subject up; but I think these three Members of Parliament, about whose protection I am inquiring, were three Members who, in the most violent manner, denounced the Irish Executive for pursuing a policy which they called "shadowing;" but, so far as I can gather from the response of my noble Friend, they are extremely glad to avail themselves of this police shadowing when their own lives are in danger. ["Hear, hear!"] My Lords, I consider this question which I have put to my noble Friend (and I confess I am disappointed that he has not answered me more fully on the subject) is one of extreme importance. I fully understand such of your Lordships as are not connected with Ireland in any practical manner regarding it as of no importance ; but I assure them that we Irish Unionists regard this matter as one of very considerable importance. A very short time ago, my Lords, we viewed Members of the Opposition stumping the country up and down, reiterating the parrot-like cry of the union of hearts in the majority of the Irish, which included naturally the National League. My Lords, a more absurd and a more incorrect cry was never raised. I think, my Lords, I am justified in using these epithets with regard to this parrot-like cry, when we consider that at the present moment that majority is divided into at least—I say, advisedly, “at least”—two raging factions, who exercise the resources and ingenuity of their old foes, the Royal Irish Constabulary, in preventing them, whenever the occasion occurs, from breaking each others heads or shedding each others blood. Again, my Lords, when we consider that these three leaders, who proclaimed themselves the popular idols of the country, have been placed (for I maintain that my noble Friend has not denied that they have been) under police protection—at any rate, they have not complained to the Irish Executive that they have been shadowed ; and, again, when we see the leader, as I believe he calls himself, of one faction publicly horsewhipped in the Four Courts of Dublin by the nephew of the late leader of the other faction, I think, my Lords, I may say that a more parrot-like and incorrect cry than that of the union of hearts was never raised. I have said, my Lords, that I do not think that those of your Lordships who have no practical experience of Ireland fully realise the importance of this question ; but I am glad to say that we, who are practically acquainted with Ireland, do realise it ; and we are determined on every occasion that arises to put to the English electorate, fully and fairly, facts such as these that I defy them to contradict or controvert. [“Hear, hear!”] It is absolutely necessary that these facts should be put forward, to let the English people really understand the condition of the Nationalist Party in Ireland. When once, my Lords, those facts are put forward and thoroughly understood by the English electorate, I am convinced that they will see how utterly absurd, how utterly futile, and how utterly impossible it is that there should be any question whatever of granting any measure of Home Rule to Ireland, which would place the loyal and united minority at the tender mercy of the disloyal and disunited majority. My Lords, with all deference to my noble Friend, I think that his reply to my question is so unsatisfactory that I should be glad to repeat it on a later occasion, or, if it is considered advisable, I have no objection whatever to raise the whole question of this protection on a Motion in any shape that may be convenient to my noble Friend.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) : My Lords, I do not protest for a moment against the right of my noble Friend to bring forward the question, or to express his own views on the subject, and I need not say that my own sympathies are not very deeply involved in the three names mentioned in the paper ; but this is a matter of information that has come into the hands of the Executive as the Executive, and, if it is to be divulged or used, it must be used impartially. I apprehend that, according to the practice of our Constitution and according to our common reason, it is not competent for the Executive to use information that has come into its hands for the purpose of discrediting those who do not happen to support it, or strengthening those who do support it ; and, therefore, if we gave this information, I apprehend that we should be obliged to give information as to all persons who have asked for police protection. I do not think that would be convenient, and therefore, without complaining of the action taken by my noble Friend, I think that the course prescribed by Her Majesty’s Government is different, and that we can hardly give the information for which he asks.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDON-DERBY (Mr. Lord): I beg to give notice that I will raise the question, on whatever day is convenient, to my noble Friend, in the form of a Motion.

House adjourned at a quarter before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 11th February, 1892.

STANDING ORDERS.

Ordered, That the Select Committee on Standing Orders do consist of Thirteen Members:—Mr. Barclay, Sir Edward Birkbeck, Mr. Sydney Buxton, Mr. Cubitt, Mr. Arthur Elliot, Sir Thomas Esmonde, Mr. Halsey, Mr. William Lowther, Sir John Mowbray, Colonel Nolan, Sir Lyon Playfair, Mr. Stansfeld, and Mr. Whitbread were accordingly nominated Members of the Committee.—(Sir John Mowbray.)

SELECTION.

Ordered, That the Committee of Selection do consist of Ten Members:—Dr. Cameron, Mr. Cubitt, Sir Archibald Orr Ewing, Mr. Illingworth, Mr. William Lowther, Mr. Justin McCarthy, Sir Hussey Vivian, Mr. Whitbread, Mr. Wodehouse, and the Chairman of the Select Committee on Standing Orders were accordingly nominated Members of the Committee.—(Sir John Mowbray.)

QUESTIONS.

DEATH OF JAMES CHARD ON THE MIDLAND AND SOUTH WESTERN JUNCTION RAILWAY.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Bright-side): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has yet received the Report of Major Marindin of his inquiry into the circumstances relating to the death of James Chard, guard on the Midland and South Western Junction Railway, on 16th October last; and, if so, whether he will lay it, together with the Correspondence, on the Table of this House?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol): I have received the Report, and am in communication with the Railway Company on the subject. The Papers will be laid on the Table.

PLANTING OF LAND IN GALWAY.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, how much land has been planted or prepared for planting by the Government in the country of Galway; and also, how much has been acquired for planting?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. L. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): About 700 acres have been prepared for planting, of which ninety acres will appear on the Estimates for next year. The total area acquired is 900 acres.

FOREIGN TARIFFS.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in consequence of the Important changes recently made in foreign tariffs, he will, for the information of British merchants and manufacturers, cause a Return of the rates of Import Duties now levied in European countries and the United States upon the produce and manufactures of the United Kingdom: to be presented to Parliament, so that it may be published at an early date?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: It is proposed to prepare and lay before the House during the present Session a new Return of the rates of Import Duties levied in European countries and the United States of the British produce and manufactures. This will be in continuation of a similar Return issued in October, 1890. As changes in European Tariffs are being made almost day by day it is proposed to delay the publication of this Return until after the middle of the year, in order that it may be substantially correct for some little time after publication, which it would not be if printed at once. Meanwhile, complete statements for separate countries such as France are being prepared, and will shortly be issued.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE IN THE LONDON CATTLE MARKET.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether his attention has been called to the following statement in the Standard newspaper of the 9th instant :—

" It is said that two cases of foot-and-mouth disease were discovered at the Cattle Market, the animals affected being Norfolk cattle, which had no contact with the Danish oxen, and that the symptoms would tend to show that the disease had developed before the arrival of the Danish cattle last Monday week ; "

whether he is in a position to confirm or to contradict the report in question ; and whether it is true that careful inquiry by the Danish Government has failed to discover any trace of foot-and-mouth disease amongst cattle in Thisted or Esbjerg, from which places the Danish cattle, alleged to be found diseased, were exported to this country ?

SIR EDWARD BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.) : Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will, at the same time, answer my question with regard to the fact that an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease took place among cattle at the Metropolitan Meat Market, Caledonian Road, on Thursday, 4th February ; whether he is aware that the cattle in question were part of a cargo of animals embarked in Denmark on 28th January, and landed at Harwich on 30th January ; and whether still greater precautions will be taken in the future to guard against the danger of importing cattle diseases from those foreign Countries from which live animals are imported ?

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) had notice of the following question :—To ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he can give the House further information as to the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in the metropolitan cattle markets, and especially as to the statements that there is no foot-and-mouth disease in Denmark, and that the animals affected were from Norfolk, and had not been in contact with Danish cattle ?

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants., Basingstoke) also had notice to ask whether foot-and-mouth disease is very prevalent in Germany and other parts of Europe ; whether the disease has been already carried to England by some imported cattle ; and what steps he has taken to prevent the spread of this terrible disease in the United Kingdom ?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford) : I will endeavour to reply to all the questions on the Paper on this subject, though I am afraid at more length than is usual in answering a question, by stating all that we know with regard to the recent outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in the Metropolitan Cattle Market, and the steps which we have taken with the object, if possible, of arresting the spread of the disease. On Thursday last, February 4, the Inspector of the Metropolitan Cattle Market, Mr. Rayment, discovered that six animals out of a herd of 11 Danish cattle were suffering from foot-and-mouth disease. The discovery was confirmed by the veterinary officers of the Board, who immediately proceeded to the market, and they at once gave orders for the gates to be closed against the exit of all animals from the market. Upon inquiry it was ascertained that the 11 animals referred to formed part of a cargo of 68 cattle and two sheep which sailed on board the Fano, from Esbjerg, in Denmark, on the evening of 27th January. The cargo was landed at Harwich on the 30th, and, after being detained for the usual period, and carefully examined by the Inspector at the port, it reached the Cattle Market on Monday, 1st February. Immediately upon these facts becoming known, orders were issued for the slaughter of all animals then in the market prior to their leaving it. A telegram was sent to all the Local Authorities of the country informing them of what had occurred, and warning them to be on their guard. The Inspectors at the ports were instructed to detain all Danish cattle in their charge, or that might be on their way, as soon as they arrived. The further importation of animals from Denmark was prohibited by order ; and inquiries were set on foot at once, with the view of tracing 59 animals—i.e., 57 cattle and two sheep—belonging to the Danish cargo, which had left the market prior to the discovery of the disease. These 59 animals, I am happy to say, were all of them traced before the close of the following day to their respective destinations, at Chatham, at Rochester, at Aldershot, at Shorncliffe, at Stratford, and in the Metropolitan District, where the bulk of them had remained; and arrangements were made for the slaughter of all the animals which had not been killed already. On the same day—Friday, the 5th—two English beasts, the animals to which the hon. Member for Leicester refers, were found in the lairs at Islington suffering from the disease. It is correct that they came from Norfolk, but I have caused inquiry to be made at the place from which they came, and that inquiry shows that no trace of disease was found there, and all the stock upon the place in Norfolk were perfectly healthy. So far as we can learn, these animals must have been infected in the lairs. There is no evidence whatever to show that they could have infected the Danish cattle, who were found to be suffering on the previous day, or that the disease had developed in their case before the landing of the Danish cattle in the country. On Saturday, the 6th, information was received that the disease had been discovered in some of the Danish cattle which had been removed to Rochester. These were slaughtered, together with a number of animals with which they had been in contact, which were followed and killed; and on the same day an Order was passed prohibiting the entire movement of animals from the Metropolitan District, and from all the other places to which the Danish cattle had been sent. On Tuesday last I regret to say that further outbreaks of the disease were reported from Clapton, Bromley-by-Bow, and from Welling, near Dartford, in Kent, all of them being places within the Metropolitan District, and to which cattle from the Metropolitan Market had been sent. In all these cases, Inspectors have been immediately sent down, the animals slaughtered, and the places disinfected. Another case was reported to us this morning from Bethnal Green. There were five cattle in the shed, and the disease, as in the other cases, had been introduced from the market on the 1st of February. The same procedure has been adopted with regard to these animals to-day. In addition to these measures, the holding of all markets in the Metropolitan area has been temporarily prohibited. Instructions have been issued to all the local authorities in the Metropolitan district as to the steps to be taken on the discovery of the disease. Inspectors have been appointed to visit and watch the Metropolitan dairies; and while I cannot conceal from the House that, in my opinion, the danger of its spreading to the country is extreme, I am not without some hope that the disease may still be prevented from escaping beyond the Metropolitan area. In further reply to the Member for Leicester, I may say that the Danish Minister was good enough to send me a telegram from his Government on the 5th, from which it appeared that, up till then, they had failed to discover the existence of the disease in Denmark. But I have had no further information, official or otherwise, since then. We know, however, that it has quite recently spread from Germany, where it is very prevalent, to Schleswig-Holstein; and I am advised that it is quite possible that the disease may have been conveyed by traders from Hamburg or Altona to the cargo which left Esbjerg on the 27th, before they were embarked. Lastly, in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for East Norfolk—and I apologise to the House for the length of this reply—as to whether still greater precautions will be taken in future, I may add that the importation of animals from the Netherlands has been suspended as well as from Denmark. The only European countries from which animals are now admitted are Norway, Sweden, Spain, and Portugal, and I do not know of any greater precautions which it would be possible to take, short of prohibiting all importation from these countries also.

MR. PICTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman say, were the cattle slaughtered at Rochester part of the Danish cargo?

MR. CHAPLIN: Yes.

MR. PICTON: Was the disease traced in any other of the 59 animals?

MR. CHAPLIN: So far as I know the disease was found in two of the animals traced to Rochester, and which formed part of the Danish cargo.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman say, have any precautions been taken by the disinfection of drovers bringing cattle from Ireland, so that they may not introduce the disease into Ireland on their return?

MR. CHAPLIN: I took the earliest opportunity of informing the Irish Government of what had occurred, and I have no doubt that every precaution is being taken to prevent the importation of the disease from England into Ireland.

SIR E. BIRKBECK: Perhaps my right hon. Friend can say, have definite instructions been issued to Her Majesty's Consuls abroad that they shall keep careful watch for any outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, and report to the Government at home when any case becomes known to them?

MR. CHAPLIN: Yes; such instructions have been repeatedly given, and, so far as I know, they are carefully carried out.

OPIUM TRADE IN BOMBAY.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the statement in a pamphlet just issued, entitled The Poppy Plague in India, that the consumption of opium in the Bombay Presidency has increased 549 per cent. since 1877, and, in the City of Bombay, 2,161 per cent.; whether these figures are correct; whether it is a fact that all shops for the sale of opium are closed,

"on or adjacent to the line of march whilst a regiment or detachment of soldiers is passing, or is encamped in the vicinity;"

and whether the Government of India will be invited to extend the same protection to the natives of the country which they do to British soldiers?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): The Secretary of State has seen these figures quoted, but he cannot identify them.

At pages 73 and 89 of the Opium Papers just published will be found a detailed account of the consumption of duty-paid opium in Bombay city and Presidency from 1879 to 1889. It will be seen from page 9 of the same Return that the increase in the sale of duty-paid opium is explained by the Government of India as being entirely due to the substitution of duty-paid for contraband opium, and that the retail price of opium has been more than doubled in the last 14 years. In answer to paragraphs 3 and 4 of the Question, I have to say the Secretary of State is not aware that all opium shops are closed when troops are marching or encamped in the neighbourhood.

THE LAND PURCHASE ACT, 1885.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that a purchaser under the Land Purchase Act of 1885, having obtained an advance of £725, and having paid four half-yearly instalments of £14 10s. each for interest and principal, was informed that he could not redeem the remaining instalments for less than £726; whether it is a fact that the Schedule to the Act, fixing the prices for redeeming annuities, has been entirely miscalculated, and is in error throughout; and whether he will introduce a Bill amending the Act, and providing that annuities should be redeemed at prices correctly calculated, or in accordance with Tables to be published by the Treasury, as under the Act of 1891?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square) answered the Question as follows:—My attention has been called to the circumstances mentioned by the hon. Member in his Question, and Her Majesty's Government are considering the question of introducing a clause to meet the objections to the present Table.

ANNUITIES UNDER THE PURCHASE OF LAND AND CONGESTED DISTRICTS (IRELAND) ACT, 1891.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Tables providing for the redemption of annuities under "the Purchase of Land and Congested Districts (Ireland) Act, 1891," have yet been published; and, if not, when they will probably be published?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham): No; these Tables are not published; they are dependent on the rules to be made by the Treasury under the Purchase of Land, &c. (Ireland) Act, 1891, and the Tables will I hope shortly follow when the rules are complete.

LOUGH ERNE DRAINAGE WORKS.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when the Return ordered relating to the Lough Erne Drainage Works will be presented to the House?

SIR JOHN GORST: The Board of Public Works have prepared the Report in question, and it will be ready for presentation in the course of a few days.

H.M.S. "VICTORIA."

MR. GOURLAY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can furnish the House with any information regarding the cause of the stranding of the iron-clad Victoria on the 30th January upon a spit of rock called "Snipe Island," near Dragomesti, in the Gulf of Patras; whether the rock in question is marked upon the chart issued by the Admiralty, and if at the time of grounding the captain was using every precaution, with the lead forward or only amidships; whether the Admiral in charge of the Mediterranean Squadron is responsible for the waters in which his ships are exercised, or that officers commanding (whether deep or light draught of water vessels) are, when engaged in torpedo practice, compelled (as stated in the Times of the 8th February) to carry out the manœuvres in 10 fathoms of water, thereby, in rocky waters, endangering the safety of the ships; and can he state whether the damage can be repaired at Malta; if not, is it intended to send the vessel to one of the naval dockyards of France or Italy in place of risking the long voyage home; or, if brought to England, is it intended to re-ship the stores removed to lighten the vessel, or send them by another vessel?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): As the circumstances connected with this accident will form the subject of a court-martial, it is not advisable at present for me to do more than give a mere outline of the facts, so far as they have been reported to the Admiralty, and therefore I must respectfully decline at present to answer any question implying carelessness or conveying censure on those concerned in the accident. The Victoria went aground just off Snipe Point, near Dragomesti. There is a shoal off Snipe Point, which was discovered last year, and the existence of which was made known in the usual way by hydrographic notice. It is not marked in the chart. No rules as to the precise depth of water in which torpedoes are to be run have been laid down, and therefore ships are not compelled to run unnecessary risks in carrying out the required practice. The Victoria will shortly be docked at Malta, when the damage will be fully ascertained, and the necessary steps taken for her repair. At present the damage is reported not to be serious.

THE STRANRAER MAILS.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if his attention has been called to the frequent late arrivals of the mail train at Stranraer, and the consequent delay in the arrival of mails at Belfast and Londonderry; whether any representations upon the matter have been made to the London and North-Western Railway Company, and if there is a prospect of a more punctual service; and if the other portion of the new mail service has been worked with regularity?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir JAMES FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): There has been some irregularity, and, in several cases, apparently from avoidable causes, to which the attention of the railway companies concerned has been invited. It is right to say that the trains on the British side are timed at a rate of speed which affords little margin for contingencies. As regards the oversea and Irish railway services, they have not been altogether free from irregularity, but there has been little cause for complaint.

THE SAVINGS BANKS ACT, 1891.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer who have been appointed members of the Committee of Inspection under Section 2 of "The Savings Banks Act, 1891-2?"

MR. GOSCHEN: The members of the Inspection Committee of Trustee Savings Banks are: Sir Albert K. Rollit, M.P.; Mr. H. G. Bowen, Chief Accountant of the Bank of England; Mr. T. A. Welton, President of the Institute of Chartered Accountants; Mr. W. M. Walters, President of the Incorporated Law Society; Mr. J. M. Ludlow, late Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies; Mr. John Ure, Lord Dean of Guild, Glasgow; Mr. T. H. Newman, of New Broad Street, City.

MR. J. ELLIS: Will these names be printed and laid before us?

MR. GOSCHEN: I will consider the suggestion. Great pains have been taken in the selection, and I trust the selection will satisfy the House generally.

COUNTY ALDERMEN.

MR. MAC INNES (Northumberland, Hexham): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether County Aldermen who retire by rotation at the approaching County Council Elections can be elected as Councillors at the same elections?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. Long, Wilts, Devizes): In the absence of my right hon. Friend, the hon. Member will allow me to reply. It would appear that a retiring County Alderman is not legally disqualified for election as a County Councillor. In connection with this question, the decision of the Courts in "Regina v. the Mayor of Bangor" with regard to a similar question under the Municipal Corporations Act may be referred to.

THE INFLUENZA EPIDEMIC.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board if he now proposes to utilize in any way the scientific and financial resources of the State to endeavour to discover the origin and best means of effectually checking the fatal epidemic of influenza, now in its third year of visitation?

MR. LONG: The Local Government Board having been of opinion that further investigation ought to be instituted with reference to influenza, with a view to the discovery of its origin and the best means of effectually checking its fatal prevalence, an inquiry has already been commenced and is being conducted by the Medical Department of the Board with the assistance of pathological and other experts.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board whether any decision has been arrived at with reference to holding a special official inquiry as to the repeated outbreaks of influenza; and, if so, under whose direction the inquiry will be held, what will be its scope, and when will it commence; whether the inquiry which was held by the Medical Department of the Board in 1890, or any subsequent investigations, have rendered it practicable for the Board to draw up and issue to the various Sanitary Authorities for publication in newspapers and in conspicuous places in every town and district, concise and simple directions as to precautionary measures to be taken in a practical and shorter form than those recently issued; and whether any notification has been or will be sent to the Sanitary Authorities that the sanction of the Board will upon application be given to providing a temporary supply of medicine, either with a view to prevention or cure, and medical assistance to the poorer inhabitants under "The Public Health Act, 1875" and "The Public Health (London) Act, 1891?"

MR. LONG: My reply to the previous question deals with the first point referred to. As regards the second point, the question has been considered, but it does not appear to the Local Government Board that they can with advantage issue further directions or suggestions as to precautionary measures for general publication by Sanitary Authorities. In no case have the Board received any application by a Sanitary Authority that they should be authorised to provide, in connection with an outbreak of influenza, a temporary supply of medicine and medical assistance for the poorer inhabitants of their district under the Public Health Acts. It may, therefore, be inferred that the Sanitary Authorities have not regarded the circumstances as requiring that any such arrangements should be adopted, and the Board have no information which would lead them to a different conclusion. They would, however, consider any application where, from exceptional circumstances, such a course appeared desirable.

MR. COBB: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that some two years ago the President of the Local Government Board gave precisely the same answer in reference to an inquiry as that we have just heard. Have there been no results from that inquiry?

MR. LONG: There have been results, but nothing I think that at present it is desirable to communicate to Local Authorities. If anything result from the present inquiry, and the Board see their way to offer any assistance to Local Authorities, that assistance shall be at once given to the best of their ability.

THE ROYAL NAVAL ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

MR. NOBLE (Hastings): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what steps have been taken for the disposal of the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteer Corps, and whether any satisfactory compensation has been granted to them?

*LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: We have been in communication with the War Office as to the transfer of corps of Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers, but there is great difficulty in retaining these Volunteers as a separate and distinct organisation in connection with the military defences of the country, and this idea must, therefore, be abandoned. The Committee which was referred to in the Admiralty letter of 13th November last will, accordingly, at once proceed to examine into the financial position of the corps, with the view of ascertaining the amount and nature of compensation that should be granted. I hope, however, that the individual members of the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers will offer their services to the various corps of Submarine Mining Volunteers, which already exist under the War Office, and will continue in this new sphere to devote the same zeal and energy to the service of their country as they have previously shown when in direct connection with the Navy.

THE CARDIFF SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can inform the House what progress has been made in winding up the affairs of the Cardiff Savings Bank; whether the contributors have paid in their several amounts; and, if so, what sums have been so paid; whether any, and if so who, have refused to pay; and what steps are being taken to compel payment; and whether it is the intention of the liquidator to pay any dividend to the depositors; if so, what amount, and when to be paid?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have obtained the following information from the official liquidator:—Proceedings have been instituted against 33 trustees and managers. One case (against the president) has been argued, and judgment is reserved. A sum of £7,000 in all has, with the sanction of the Court, been accepted from seven of the trustees and managers in settlement of the claims against them. It is anticipated that some further settlements may shortly be approved. Until the proceedings are further advanced, or unless settlements are made, it is impossible to make any statement as to the prospects of a dividend. The Government have no responsibility for, or control over, the management of the liquidation. It is in the hands of the Court, under whose direction the liquidator acts; and I would suggest to the hon. Member that he may obtain any further information which he may desire from the official liquidator.

MR. HOWELL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that these winding-up proceedings have been now going on for five years?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes; I am aware of that. It is a most unfortunate affair.

Mr. Long

I hear proceedings have been continued for many years ; I wish it were in the power of the Government to accelerate the proceedings, but they are in the hands of the Court. Of course, proceedings being taken against 33 persons must involve considerable expenditure of time.

MR. HOWELL : I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can inform the House as to the total cost, legal and otherwise, in connection with the winding up of the Cardiff Savings Bank, and by whom those costs are being borne ; and whether he will consent to lay upon the Table of this House a Return as to such costs, under each head respectively ?

MR. GOSCHEN : I am informed that the taxed costs and the remuneration to the liquidator up to February 9, 1891, amount to £5,976, the legal costs being £3,476, and the remuneration of the liquidator £2,500. This amount is fixed by the Court ; we have no power over it.

MR. HOWELL : Will the costs come out of the money recovered ?

MR. GOSCHEN : Out of the assets of the bank.

BOARD OF TRADE REPORT ON TRADE UNIONS.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Report of the Labour Correspondent to the Board of Trade on Trade Unions for the year 1889 or 1890 has not yet been issued ; whether he can inform the House when the Report will appear ; and whether it is the intention of the Board of Trade to delay such Report until that for 1891 is completed ?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH : This Report was sent to the printers on Saturday last, and I understand it is to be published next week.

FOGS AND DEATHS FROM DROWNING IN THE DOCKS IN LONDON.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has caused inquiries to be made as to the number of deaths by drowning in the docks in London during the recent fogs ; and whether he has been able to advise the Dock Companies to adopt any system of protection against such accidents in the future ; and whether he proposes to order a public inquiry into the question ?

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.) had notice of the following Question : To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many cases of death occurred during the late fogs in the various docks of the City of London ; and whether he has power to compel the various Dock Companies to place posts and chains some six feet from edge of quays ?

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH : I have received 18 returns of coroners' inquests into the deaths of persons drowned in the London docks between October 1, 1890, and the 7th January last. I cannot say, however, whether any further deaths have since taken place. Of course, hon. Members are aware that the Board of Trade have no statutory powers of ordering a public inquiry or of compelling the Dock Companies to take any particular action in regard to this matter ; but I have been in communication with the Dock Companies, and at their desire have directed an officer of the Board to confer with representatives of the companies, with a view to seeing what precautions can be taken for the protection of the public in future.

MR. HERBERT GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden) : I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, considering the increase in the number and intensity of fogs in the Metropolis and the loss of life, accidents, and difficulties to traffic arising therefrom, it is his intention to cause any inquiry to be made as to means for preventing fogs in London ?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH : No, Sir. I am thankful to say the duties of the Board of Trade do not extend to the prevention of fogs in London.

IRISH EDUCATION RETURN.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when he intends to lay upon the Table of the House the Return on Irish Education promised at the close of last Session ?

MR. JACKSON: My hon. Friend will have seen, perhaps, that the Return was laid on the Table yesterday.

THE GLENTIES RAILWAY.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is he aware of the fact that since last October only eight men have been employed daily on that portion of the new Railway for 12 miles from the town of Glenties, and that the men employed on the smaller portion are only receiving 2½d. per hour for the fair hours of the day, while it is well-known to some people that the winter was a severe and wet one; and whether he would consider it advisable to notify the contractors that the men who have been thrown out of employment should be taken on again, and the works proceeded with without delay?

MR. JACKSON: I have no information of the nature mentioned in the Question. Contracts were made under the authority of the Treasury, and the contractors, I believe, are bound under penalty to complete the works within a given time.

MR. O'HANLON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the facts in the district, and are the Government prepared to undertake a scheme for the reclamation of the land by which thousands of acres might be made available, giving employment to labour with no liability for heavy unremunerative expenditure?

MR. JACKSON: I am afraid I must have more detailed information before I can answer that question.

PAYMENT TO JURORS IN IRELAND.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a Report from the Cavan Board of Guardians as to a resolution passed recommending the payment of jurors attending assizes and quarter sessions, and if he has also received a similar one passed by the Derry Guardians; and, if so, is the Government prepared to bring in a Bill to amend the jury system generally?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that no such resolutions as those referred to have been received by the Irish Government.

THE COMMITTEE ON DESIGNS FOR THE NEW COINAGE.

MR. ERNEST SPENCER (West Bromwich): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Committee, which was appointed in order to assist the authorities of the Mint with their advice both as regards the design and the general character of coins, have yet reported to him as to the various designs which have been submitted to them, and especially whether they have reported in favour of all silver coins having their value inscribed thereon?

MR. GOSCHEN: Various designs have been submitted to the Committee, and I understand that the final meetings of the Committee are now being held. They have made their choice, though they have still several points of detail to consider. They hope to make their Report in a short time.

BETTING AND GAMBLING LAWS.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to introduce this Session the Bill for the consolidation and amendment of the laws relating to betting and gambling, referred to by him in the debate of last Session?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): It is still too soon in the Session for me to make any definite announcement on this subject, or to add another controversial measure to the list of Government Bills. An amending Bill would take up a good deal of the time of the House.

WORMWOOD SCRUBS PRISON.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken to investigate the causes of the outbreak at Wormwood Scrubs Prison on the 19th December last; and whether it is true, as stated in the Standard newspaper, that "large numbers of old and hardened criminals were placed in charge of young and inexperienced warders," and that

"the ventilators in the cells of the prison were so imperfectly devised that they served the purpose of speaking-tubes between one prisoner and another."

MR. MATTHEWS: The circumstances of the disorder at Wormwood Scrubs were duly investigated by the Prison Commissioners and reported to me. In the formation of a new staff, consequent on the conversion of Wormwood Scrubs into a local prison, a certain proportion of new officers were appointed, but I am informed that the disorder, which was quickly checked, was not due to this cause. There has been no repetition of the occurrences of the 19th December. The ventilators at Wormwood Scrubs are of the same construction as at other prisons, and are not imperfectly devised. The prisoners cannot communicate with one another through the ventilators except by shouting, and this is at once heard by the officials and repressed.

MESSRS. WATERLOW'S CONTRACT.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether Government has renewed, or is about to renew, a contract with Messrs. Waterlow; and, if so, what is the nature, and what is the duration, of the contract; and what steps have been, or will be, taken to secure (in compliance with the engagement given by the Government last Session)

"the payment of the rate of wages generally accepted as current for a competent workman in his trade."

SIR JOHN GORST: Messrs. Waterlow and Sons hold two contracts with the Stationery Office for vellum binding. These contracts were, on the 31st of October last, provisionally extended for two years from the 31st March, 1892. The proviso attached to the extension was that the contracts might be terminated on or after the 31st of March, 1893, on six months' notice given by either side. The Controller of the Stationery Office has been instructed to send to all contractors a circular similar to that now being issued by the Admiralty, War Office, and other Departments of Government.

THE PRISON COMMISSIONERS.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Mr. Ruggles Brise has been appointed to the Prison Commissionership vacated by Admiral Hornby; and, whether Colonel Garsia has been appointed Secretary to the Prison Commissioners?

MR. MATTHEWS: Both these appointments have been made.

THE POSTMASTER AT ABERDEEN.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the postmaster at Aberdeen has been retired with full pension; whether the Town Council of Aberdeen, the Chamber of Commerce, and other public bodies interested, have made representations to the Treasury that the postmaster is able and willing to discharge with efficiency all the duties of the office; whether, at the time the postmaster at Aberdeen and other public servants were appointed, there was no Minute of the Treasury requiring retirement so long as such servants were fit to perform their duties; whether the retirement referred to will involve an additional cost to the Treasury of £433 6s. 8d.; and, in all the circumstances, whether, in terms of the Treasury Minute, he may consent to an extension in this case of a further period of five years?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): An Order in Council, founded on the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments, prescribes retirement at the age of 65, unless, in a particular case such retirement would be detrimental to the public interest. The postmaster at Aberdeen has accordingly been retired on the pension earned by his long and good service. Representations have, I believe, been received from Aberdeen in favour of this officer's continued employment, but the Government are bound to carry out the policy laid down in the Order in Council—an instrument ranking next in authority to an Act of Parliament, and I cannot say that this officer's retirement is detrimental to the public interest, although he was in all respects an efficient public servant. It has always been the rule that officers could elect to retire or could be retired on pension after 60 years of age. I cannot admit that, in order to save the amount of the pension, there is economy in retaining civil servants beyond the age deliberately fixed by a Royal Commission as that at which, in the interest of the efficiency of the public service, they ought to retire.

THE "EQUIVALENT GRANT" TO SCOTLAND.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer when Her Majesty's Government intend to state to the House their proposals with reference to the money payable to Scotland under the head of the so-called "Equivalent Grant," and whether those proposals are intended to be made in the form of a Bill; or, if not, in what other form?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): My right hon. Friend has requested me to reply to this question. The Government are decidedly of opinion that the best way to proceed in this matter is by Bills and not by Resolutions, and they propose at the very earliest day to lay their provisions before the House. If the exigencies of public business or otherwise should render it impossible to carry through the Bills, they might reluctantly proceed by Resolution, but they would do so with great regret.

MR. BRYCE: Am I to understand from the right hon. Gentleman that he means by the expression "the very earliest day" within the next fortnight?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Bills will be printed and circulated immediately after the Queen's Speech has been disposed of.

EDUCATION IN DOCKYARD TOWNS.

MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the serious loss which is occasioned to the Board and Voluntary Schools at Sheerness and other dockyard towns owing to the recent decision of the Education Department that no fee grant is to be paid in respect of any child who has passed the seventh standard; whether he is aware that it is necessary in dockyard towns to retain the elder children at school for the purpose of fitting them for apprenticeship to the various trades, these children being those of working men who can ill-afford to keep them so long at school after passing the exemption standard; and whether it was the intention of the Committee in Council at the passing of the Act that such children should be excluded from its provisions, seeing that section 1 only refers to an age and not to a proficiency limit?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir WILLIAM H. DYKES, Kent, Dartford): If my hon. Friend will refer to the report of the discussion in Committee upon this section of the Act on June 30th, 1891, he will be able to satisfy himself that the case only of children in average attendance at Elementary Schools was under consideration. The Department must therefore, I fear, be bound by the strict terms of the Act, which restrict the payment of the fee grant to children in average attendance at Elementary Schools.

IRISH PAWNBROKERS.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland if it is his intention this Session to introduce a Bill to amend the Law relating to pawnbrokers in Ireland; whether the extension of the English system to Ireland is contemplated; and whether there is a clause in the English Act preventing pawnbrokers taking pledges from drunks?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The matter referred to in the Question of the hon. Member is one which is very difficult to deal with, and one upon which nothing like unanimity prevails amongst the several interests concerned, and the Government are not prepared to deal with the matter at present.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he would be willing to receive a deputation of traders and residents in Belfast and the North of Ireland, who desire to have an opportunity of laying their views before the Government?

MR. MADDEN: I have given considerable attention to this question for the last two years. I have recently been made aware of the views entertained by the traders of Belfast and the North of Ireland; but, so far as I am personally concerned, I shall be exceedingly obliged to any persons who bring their views before me.

Sir James Fergusson

THE PADDY TAX IN CEYLON.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Government has come to any decision as to the abolition of the Paddy Tax in Ceylon; if so, have instructions been sent to the Government of that Colony to introduce legislation to carry that resolution into effect; and by what taxation is the revenue supplied by the Paddy Tax to be replaced?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): If the hon. Member will postpone his Question for a short time I trust I may then be in a position to make a definite statement on the subject.

DEEDS OF ARRANGEMENT IN IRELAND.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the provisions of "The Deeds of Arrangement Amendment Act, 1890," so far as relates to private arrangements, and especially Sub-section 5 of Section 2, have been disregarded; and what steps the Government proposes to take to compel the observance of the Act?

MR. MADDEN: I have no official information before me at present on this subject. If the hon. Member will kindly repeat his Question, I shall endeavour to obtain the information he desires.

MR. FORMAN'S MISSION.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is in a position to state the result of the Mission of Mr. Forman to the Continent; whether this officer was successful in getting a reduction in the transit rates charged by France and Italy for the conveyance of the Indian and Australian mails between Calais and Brindisi; and whether he is in a position to inform the House of the result of his inquiries regarding the feasibility of sending our Eastern mails via Salonica?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I have been in communication with the French and Italian Post Offices on the subject of the hon. Member's Question. There will be in future a reduction of about £7,300 a year upon the charge for the conveyance of the Eastern mails by special accelerated trains. Books and newspapers will be carried at the territorial transit rates of the Postal Union. As regards the Salonica route, it is undoubtedly feasible, and it might afford a certain acceleration, but it is not proposed at present to resort to it.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: Has the right hon. Gentleman any objection to lay the Papers on the Table of the House?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I will consider that.

COUNTY COURTS IN IRELAND.

MR. CHANCE: I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland whether the Government intend to take any steps to secure the efficient administration of the law by County Courts in Ireland, in accordance with the views put forward by the Associated Chambers of Commerce?

MR. MADDEN: The subject is under the consideration of the Government, and I hope to be able to embody the views put forward by the Associated Chambers of Commerce in a Bill which I intend to introduce on an early day.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What day?

MR. MADDEN: As soon as possible.

OLD AGE PENSIONS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if, having regard to the statements laid before the country of the extent of old age pauperism among the industrial classes, the Government will assent to the early appointment of a Select Committee to ascertain the facts, and the best means of remedying the evil, and enabling the thrifty to secure State guaranteed pensions in old age upon easy terms, through Friendly Societies or otherwise.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This matter has excited, and I think rightly excited, very great interest in the country ; but since I saw the hon. Member's question on the Notice Paper this morning I have had very little time to consider it myself, and have had no time to consult my colleagues on the matter. The hon. Member, however, will bear in mind that a large part, if not the whole, of this question, has already been very thoroughly examined into by a Committee who sat during the three years from 1885 to 1888. They took a large batch of evidence on this subject, and laid a very important Report before the House. Whether there is anything that can be usefully added to that Report I have some doubt.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION.

MR. THOMAS SEXTON: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware of the fact that the usual monthly Returns of the proceedings of the Irish Land Commission have not been put in the hands of hon. Members since July last year, a month preceding the passage of the Land Purchase Act ; so that we are entirely in the dark upon the proceedings that have taken place under the Land Purchase Act. I wish to ask if he can state to the House the number of applications that have been made under the Act, the number of the tenants concerned, and the number of applications that have been sanctioned, say, up to the end of the year ?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman when the annual Report of the Land Commission will be issued ?

MR. JACKSON: I am not able to answer the question of the hon. Member for West Belfast. If he will furnish me with the particulars he wishes to have specified, I shall endeavour to have an answer. In reply to the hon. Member for South Tyrone, I will inquire about the annual Report of the Land Commission.

CAULKERS IN ROYAL DOCKYARDS.

MR. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if he will explain why the caulkers employed in Her Majesty's Dockyards, who perform the same duties and have hitherto been on an equality and received the same wages as shipwrights, under the recent new scheme of wages receive one shilling per week less than shipwrights ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. FORWOOD, Lancashire, Ormskirk): In determining the rates of pay, the claims of the caulkers were carefully considered. Their trade, however, is more limited in scope and of less importance than formerly, compared with that of the shipwrights ; and when advancing the scale of pay for each of these classes, it was considered desirable to mark by a slight variation the difference in the character of their respective work.

MR. DE COBAIN.

(4.15.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I rise to make the Motion which stands in my name, and in doing so I do not think it necessary for me to inform the House that on the 14th of July last a Resolution was adopted requiring Mr. De Cobain to attend in his place in the House in the succeeding week, that during the course of that week he sent a letter to you, Sir, explaining fully to the House his inability to come over to the House, and in consideration of this the order was withdrawn and the matter was allowed, for the moment, to rest. I think the House will probably feel that I have no alternative now but to renew the Resolution and ask the House—

"To require Mr. Edward S. W. De Cobain to attend this House in his place upon Tuesday the 23rd of February."

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Mr. Edward Samuel Wesley De Cobain do attend this House in his place upon Tuesday the 23rd of February."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour).

(4.18). MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I should like to ask a question of the First Lord in relation to this Motion. I think it is a Motion which he was bound to make, and therefore for my part I do not intend to quarrel with it ; I think this House acted very indulgently towards the hon. Gentleman in its proceedings of last Session, and I think the House at that time was under an obligation to you, Mr. Speaker, for the way in which you prevented it from taking any precipitate action in the matter. But it appears to me that the Motion is extremely curious in its character, because when it says that Mr. De Cobain is required to attend in his place on Tuesday the 23rd of February, everybody knows that the moment Mr. De Cobain landed on this shore in pursuance of the order of this House, he would be at once met by a detective at Dover and forthwith arrested. And what appears to me is that an appendage should be added to the motion, to the following effect :—

"And that this House will treat the attempt of any person, whomsoever, to prevent the said Member from complying with its orders as a contempt of this House."

I think that this is the inevitable logic of the situation. It seems to me that the true course for the Government to take is this, either to withdraw the present motion and treat the past action of Mr. De Cobain in not presenting himself for trial as a contempt of this House, or else, if the Government are going to invite him here, that at least you should make it clear that his path should not be barred by the police in the interval. This House has no business to pass blind orders that cannot be obeyed, but orders that can be given effect to, and until the right hon. Gentleman has made up his mind, I move that, in addition to the resolution, the following words should be added :—

"And that this House will treat the attempt of any person whomsoever to prevent the said Member from complying with its order as a contempt of this House."

Let me say that the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Belfast circulated amongst the Members of this House a document which I suppose none of us have had time, even if we had the wish, to study, but no doubt there is a strong impression among representatives of the democratic Orange Party in Ulster that a considerable pressure has been applied to him, because he represented more or less the working-class interest.

MR. JOHNSTON: I beg to contradict that.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That may be contrary to the fact. I give no opinion on it whatever, and I assure the hon. Gentleman, the Member for South Belfast, that I am not dealing with the subject as one settled in my mind. I only state that an impression prevails that while other gentlemen, including a noble lord, were assisted, as we know from a declaration of the hon. Member for Northampton, and enabled to quit the country, Mr. De Cobain has been singled out because he represents the democratic Orange party, and they are opposed in that impression by gentlemen from Ulster who represent the more aristocratic Orange party. Personally I myself think Mr. De Cobain placed himself entirely in the wrong by not coming over and standing his trial, and this House, so far as my judgment is concerned, and no Member of this House, is now called upon to seek further for any special treatment in regard to him.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words "and that this House will treat the attempt of any person whomsoever to prevent the said Member from complying with its order as a contempt of this House." —(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

(4.22.) SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I think the course which the Government has taken is the only course they could have pursued, and that it is the right course to pursue. I cannot agree with what my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford has just said. The truth is that the proceedings of this House are against a Member who is a notorious fugitive from justice, and continuously a fugitive from justice. Last year reasons were alleged why he should have time, and that he was involuntarily a fugitive from justice. Nobody can believe that now. The pertinacious and determined absence of the hon. Member from this House shows that he is determined not to meet a Court of Justice. For months he has been capable of proving his innocence of all the allegations made against him there if he came to England. Now it concerns the honour of this House that he should not be a member of it who is continually a fugitive from justice. It is therefore right to order Mr. De Cobain to return here. We say to him here: "either come and clear your character or cease to be a Member of this House." That is the plain meaning of these proceedings. We have nothing to do with a Court of Justice or the arrest of

Mr. De Cobain. I venture to think that my hon. and learned Friend's Amendment is not Constitutional. The House cannot order a warrant not to be executed. Such an assumption on the part of the House would be a breach of the principle on which a free Constitution rests. The execution of justice is independent of the Crown, or either House of Parliament. For one House of Parliament by Resolution to order the course of justice to be intercepted, is a thing we could not countenance at all—therefore it seems to me our proceedings are perfectly clear. We say now that there can be no doubt whatever that Mr. De Cobain is a fugitive from justice, and he must either return and meet the accusations against him in a court of law, or cease to be a Member of this House. If he come back and, before a court of law, prove to be innocent, we shall receive him with gladness and satisfaction. If he persist, under the grave accusations against him, in absenting himself from a fair trial and the means of vindicating his character, then this House must declare that he ceases to be a Member of it, in consideration of its own dignity and honour. Therefore I cannot support the amendment of my hon. and learned Friend.

MR. THOMAS SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for North Longford may, perhaps, be technically open to the objection pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. No doubt, however, it is the intention of the House and the Government that Mr. De Cobain should return to this country and have an opportunity of obeying the Order of the House, and I think the difficulty might be met by an undertaking on the part of the Government that when Mr. De Cobain returned to the country he should be allowed to obey the Order of the House without any action—["No, no"]. Why not? Surely if an Order of the House is issued it is intended to be obeyed. The ends of justice would not be thwarted, because after he had obeyed the Order he could as easily be arrested as before; and therefore I think the Government should give an undertaking that Mr. De Cobain should be allowed to obey the Order of the House before being arrested.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Gentleman will feel that his argument has been answered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. If we were to give any engagement about the arrest of Mr. De Cobain we should, in the first place, be doing that which we have no power to do; and if we did a Court of Law would disregard it. Even if we could, we should, by such proceedings, obviously be interfering with the Courts of Justice. The case could not, I think, be more lucidly or concisely put than as it has been put by the right hon. Gentleman. Mr. De Cobain is still a Member of Parliament, though a Member of Parliament with a warrant out against him. He refuses to come home and clear himself, and let the matter be decided according to the evidence on the trial, on one side or the other. It would not be consistent with honour for the House to allow one of its Members to remain in this position. We require him to come back, and no doubt if he did come back he would be obliged to do that which he ought to have done long ago—namely, to submit himself to the proper tribunal of the country. If the House were to attempt to do what the hon. Gentleman has suggested, it would be an attempt to do that which is in itself unconstitutional, and which I believe there is no legal power to do.

MR. CHARLES J. DARLING (Deptford): The necessity for the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Longford does not arise. If Mr. De Cobain return and surrender himself to justice, he can apply to the Magistrate for bail on the ground that he wished to obey the order of the House, and no Magistrate in the country would refuse bail under the circumstances.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to withdraw the Amendment, and I think the best course for the right hon. Gentleman to adopt would be to put down a Motion for expelling the hon. Gentleman from the House a fortnight hence.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Sir William Harcourt

Ordered, That Mr. Edward Samuel Wesley De Cobain do attend this House in his place upon Tuesday the 23rd of February.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Main Question [9th February] [See page 51.]

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

(4.25.) MR. JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): Mr. Speaker, at the commencement of the observations which I shall ask the permission of the House to make, I hope I may be permitted, on behalf of my hon. Friends and myself, to associate ourselves entirely with all that has fallen from the Leader of the House, and from my right hon. Friend who is acting as the Leader of the Opposition, with regard to the lamented death of the Duke of Clarence. In the fierce light which beats upon a Throne, the whole nation participates in the joys and sorrows of the Royal Family, and in the present case the pathetic circumstances which attended the death of the Duke, who had been cut off in the flower of his age, at a time when he was hopefully entering upon a new responsibility with the brightest prospects of domestic happiness, has appealed, I think, to our feelings of common humanity, so that the House of Commons in expressing its sympathy and its grief is only expressing the universal sentiment of the whole of the people. Sir, in such times we all feel that any condolence must be unavailing to assuage so bitter an affliction. But we know, on the authority of Her Majesty herself, that she and those members of the Royal Family who have suffered more severely have found some comfort in the knowledge that the whole of their people have sorrowed with them. Mr. Speaker, I should like also to say one word with regard to the loss which the House has sustained in the death of its late Leader. Full justice has been already done to the eminent qualities of Mr. Smith, to his genial kindness, to his unwavering devotion to duty, to his unselfishness, and to his strong common sense—all the qualities which appear to me to be the very best characteristics of the English people. He had no claim to possess those showy gifts which in others have commanded popular admiration, but he had one exceptional quality to which reference has not been made. Mr. Smith was essentially a man of good counsel, and I think those who went to him for advice, whether in the position of personal friends or political colleagues, or political allies, always found him quick to seize the bearing of a question, able to appreciate the circumstances and to give trustworthy and sagacious advice. Sir, I think that the loss which the country and his party have sustained by his death in this respect has not, even yet, been fully realized. Mr. Speaker, I now turn to the more general topics suggested by the Queen's Speech, and the discussion that has hitherto taken place on that document. In the first place I am bound to express my surprise, I may even say my astonishment, at the course which the Debate has hitherto taken. I believe it is understood that the Debate on the Address at the beginning of the Session is not only an opportunity for a declaration of the policy of the Government, but an occasion eagerly seized by the Opposition to bring to the test the opinions which they have expressed in public during the Recess and to give a clear indication of their present attitude and intention. Sir, the Recess has been an exceedingly active one. We have been warned that this was to be a "fighting Session" and that the Opposition at least meant business. We have been told that the present is the worst and weakest Government which ever sat on these benches, that they are tottering to their fall, and that if they did not at the commencement of the Session perform the happy dispatch, the representatives of an indignant nation would combine to turn them out of their places and would force them to make room for abler and for better men. We have even heard threats that on the first day of the Session a dissolution would be demanded, and that if a dissolution were refused, supplies would be stopped. [Opposition cheers.] I gather from the cheers behind me that I have only fairly stated the case—[No, no!]—well, I have given a short and incomplete summary of the oratory of the Recess, and what I want to point out is that in the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby, delivered on Tuesday night, there was not from beginning to end one hint that these truculent intentions were going to be carried out. I paid to that speech the attention which its ability deserved, and from first to last there was not in it even a stray allusion to the Septennial Act, which we have been taught to look upon as, next to the Act of Union, the most iniquitous piece of legislation ever enacted. But yet there is no proposal from these Benches to repeal the Septennial Act. Even with the blushing honours of Rossendale thick upon him my right hon. Friend does not express any anxiety—he conceals the anxiety he feels—for a general appeal to the constituencies. What is his explanation? I thought that I had found it yesterday in a statement which appeared in the newspapers that my friend Mr. Schnadhorst had warned the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues that he could not, even with his machinery, produce a majority of more than 30 at the next election. But to-day Mr. Schnadhorst says he never promised them any majority at all. I think Mr. Schnadhorst was very wise. He has given proof of all the shrewdness with which I have been accustomed to credit him, and he is quite right not to prophesy unless he knows. But again I say that is not an explanation. How comes it then that this Session which was to come in like a roaring lion has come in like a bleating lamb. My right hon. Friend the Member for Derby occupied the great part of his very interesting speech in a somewhat discursive attack on a certain portion of one of several speeches made by the Prime Minister during the recess. I did not think that attack very relevant to the business in hand, and I have only one word to say upon it, that I think it very hard that we should be accused of exciting to religious bigotry and intolerance, and insulting our Roman Catholic fellow subjects, when we are only pointing out the dangers of ecclesiastical domination. Where did we learn our lessons? We sat at the feet of two Gamaliels—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne. What is it the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian says, not in a speech in the excitement of party politics on a platform in the provinces, but in writing in a careful essay on the subject:—

“To secure rights has been, and is, the aim of Christian civilisation—to destroy them, and to establish the resistless domineering action of a purely central power, in the aim of Roman policy.”—Vaticanism. 1875.

Is that an insult to the Roman Catholics? Is it true? If it be true, why do you blame us for saying the same thing? Then, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, a long way after, and with rather feeble voice, said—

“The Church, it has been truly said, has broken with knowledge, has taken her stand upon ignorance, and is striving with might and main, even in countries where she has no chance to use the machinery of popular Government, to keep back education. The worst enemy of Science is also the bitterest enemy of Democracy—c'est le cléricalisme.”—Fortnightly Review, Feb., 1886.

Is it not a strange thing that a Gladstonian may steal a horse, whilst we may not look over the hedge? When did Lord Salisbury, or any of those who have been criticised by the Opposition, including myself, say anything worse than that? It is perfectly absurd to say that we have learned our lesson too well, when we have only repeated it verbatim. But the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was only intended to take us off the scent. He had not anything really to say about the policy or proposals of Her Majesty's Government. What he said was most friendly to us. In his most conciliatory manner, he was inclined to welcome those proposals and give them favourable consideration, and the only complaint he made—and this is the most amusing part of the whole thing, taken in conjunction with what he and others said in the Recess—was that the Government have not provided enough work for this Parliament to do. He seems to think that all the principal Bills of the Government will, with his assistance, be cleared off by the end of July. Is he waiting for the dissolution? No, certainly not! He is prepared to go on, but does not think all the excellent material of this Parliament is to be wasted! and he wants us to proceed with District Councils and Registration and other items in the Government Programme. It is a most excellent frame of mind. I do not like to accuse my right hon. Friend of inconsistency, but there is a difference between the policy in the speech of my right hon. Friend and that of the Recess. Why, Sir, we were told in the Recess that every item of the policy of Her Majesty's Government, foreign and domestic, past, present and future, was to be arraigned as soon as Parliament met. My right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian denounced the continued occupation of Egypt. My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle had his suspicions; he was distrustful of the Triple Alliance, and he gave us to understand he was prepared to reverse the whole Foreign Policy of the Government at a moment's notice. My right hon. Friend the Member for Derby was disconcerted about extensions in South Africa, and especially did it pain him to think that the Government were going to propose some addition to the expenditure in order to secure the abolition of the Slave Trade and to promote civilisation in that part of the world. On this, right hon. Gentlemen and all their followers were agreed, that as regards Local Government it was perfectly ridiculous to consider the question of Local Government for Ireland as long as the Crimes Act were in existence. That is a policy if you like. But what trace or hint of it is there in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. Everybody recollects the celebrated trial of "Bardell v. Pickwick," and how, after the case for the Plaintiff was opened by Mr. Skimpin, it appeared to the Court and the jury there was nothing in it. That is very like the indictment preferred against Her Majesty's Government. But Mr. Skimpin was a junior counsel, whereas my right hon. Friend, in the absence of the Member for Mid Lothian, speaks with an authoritative voice. Well, Sir, let us take one question as a test. I say that by this extreme reticence on the part of my right hon. Friend we are left in doubt as to the intention of the Opposition. What are they going to do about Local Government in Ireland? My right hon. Friend and other speakers on the same side of the House gave us to understand during the Recess that, in their opinion, Local Government in Ireland was exclusively an Irish question, and, therefore, that it ought to be left to an Irish Parliament. Well, if that is their view, I should expect them to come down here and scout the idea of taking up the time of the House with a discussion on Local Government which, according to them, is perfectly futile and inept. Not a bit of it. My right hon. Friend says he is only eager that this question of Local Government should be brought to a second reading before Easter, and he goes on to promise that if the Bill is conceived in a liberal spirit, he and his friends will give it their support.

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT: I have always said so.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: My right hon. Friend has always said that Local Government in Ireland was for the Local Parliament, and is inconsistent now in being so ready to welcome the introduction of Local Government by the Imperial Authority. I wish to be perfectly fair to my right hon. Friend. He says they are willing to discuss the Local Government Measure, but that he does not consider it a final settlement of the question of self-government in Ireland. He appeals to me to say the same, and he appeals to a speech of mine delivered five years ago, and he quotes it as usual without the context; and I must say I take it as a very great compliment that my right hon. Friend is so continually quoting my speeches. He must have somewhere a cabinet choke full of my speeches.

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT: They are all on the "Round Table." (Laughter.)

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am delighted to hear that my right hon. Friend still preserves the "Round Table." My right hon. Friend, however, keeps those speeches to make them, on occasions, the subject of his rather boisterous merriment. In the present instance, what is the state of the facts? In 1887, after the "Round Table" to which my right hon. Friend has just referred, I was making a speech in Birmingham, and I said what was perfectly true, both of Lord Hartington and myself, that after Mr. Gladstone's revolutionary proposals in 1886 we thought at the time the circumstances had altered, and that it would be impossible to look upon a mere scheme of Municipal Government as finally concluding the question of the government of Ireland, and that something more might have to be done; and I said that I was prepared to accept the principle of some kind of legislative authority in Dublin, provided that the conditions which Mr. Gladstone himself had attached to that concession, namely, the undoubted and unquestioned supremacy of the Imperial Parliament and the protection of minorities, could be guaranteed. My right hon. Friend challenges me, indiscreetly as I think under the circumstances, to produce any plan of my own by which this legislative authority in Dublin with the necessary securities may be created. That is a very fair challenge. I think my right hon. Friend was quite within his rights. We have no right to talk of a great subject involving sudden changes without being prepared to bring it to the test of public discussion. I think my right hon. Friend is justified in calling on me for details; only my right hon. Friend has forgotten somewhere or another on the "Table" my published plan, published at the time of which he speaks in all its details; a plan by which this might be secured. I have complied with his request; I have published my plan, and I must say it met with universal disapproval. It was ridiculed by the right hon. Gentleman, it was scornfully repudiated by the Irish Gentlemen below the Gangway. It was not accepted by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I confess I was discouraged with what attended my honest attempt to deal with the matter. I relinquish my plan; I am prepared to hand it over to my right hon. Friend. I do not refer to this with a view to disinterring a plan which fell still-born; but I do so in order to appeal to my right hon. Friend for a little reciprocity. He knows my plan now. Will he not tell me something about his? I do not ask for all the details; general lines will be quite sufficient for my purpose. Well, Sir, I have asked for this before, and I have been refused; but I am much more sanguine now than ever before. I have two reasons for thinking that at last the mask will fall, and this carefully guarded secret will be disclosed. I will put them before my right hon. Friend, who has an open mind on all questions, except, of course, questions of principle; and I will ask him to re-consider my application. My first reason for thinking he should change his policy is this: that this is the last Session of the present Parliament (Opposition cheers). Yes; we are all going (renewed Opposition cheers) to an election; some of us are going to come back (Ministerial cheers). I see many, many Members present, even in the ranks of the Opposition, who might well say morituri te salutamus; but surely the fact that we are going to our constituencies is a reason why we should let our constituencies know something of the policy upon which we are going to seek their approval or disapproval. We ought to know, it is not too early to ask for, the policy of the Opposition, which is to be their principal object if they go into power. It is not too early to ask that they should put that forward for general discussion, so that the country may pronounce upon it with full knowledge. But I have another reason even more strong, and that is that during the last 12 months a great deal of light has been thrown upon the subject which we did not get before—light as to the intentions and motives of hon. Gentlemen representing Irish constituencies; and I want to know whether my right hon. Friend and those who follow him have in any way modified their views in consequence of this light? This matter is really of extreme importance, and I shall have to trouble the House with a few quotations, and I hope the House will appreciate them. What was the state of the case in 1886? The House and the country were asked to accept the Home Rule Bill, on the ground that it had been frankly, entirely, and completely accepted by the great majority of Representatives of Ireland as a full, final, and complete solution of the Irish question. This is what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle said immediately after the speech made by Mr. Parnell on the Second Reading of that Bill:—

"Now, Mr. Parnell said, in the most emphatic, clear, unmistakable, and for ever undeniable words, that the Irish nation in every section of it, both in Ireland and in the United States—and wherever Irishmen are found—that every section of the Irish people has accepted our plan. Gentlemen, this was a very serious announcement. It commits Mr. Parnell and his friends. They applauded his statement. It commits them to an endeavour—which I am thoroughly certain they have no intention of shirking or avoiding—to an endeavour to make our plan work, and to make this settlement what they say, a real, sincere and a final settlement."

That was the conviction under which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle invited us to pass the Second Reading of the Home Rule Bill. Can he pretend he has any longer a similar conviction? I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman correctly represents, by giving verbatim, the speech of the late Mr. Parnell; but, at all events, I know this: that within the last twelve months Mr. Parnell declared, and his colleagues have declared, that he and they only accepted the proposals in the Home Rule Bill pro tanto, and as an instalment of their just rights. Mr. Parnell called it a trumpery Bill; and it is perfectly certain that if the Home Rule Bill had been carried on the assurances of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, he himself and the country would have been bitterly deceived. Now, I want to know what reason has he for saying now, that for his new plan, whatever it may be, he will be able to get assurances from any section of the Irish Representatives which are one whit more trustworthy than those on which he relied in 1886? Now I will carry this a little further. What is the principle declared by my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby to be the principal feature of this new plan? He has refused to give us any details. I will quote his exact words. On the 17th April, 1891, he said:—

"The principle for which the Liberal Party had contended had been the right of the Irish people to manage their own affairs, subject always to the control of the Imperial Parliament. That was the principle they had always proclaimed and depended upon, and that was the principle on which they would always stand."

I must say that when my right hon. Friend speaks of a principle on which he is prepared to stand, I begin to think that our foundations are extremely insecure. He went on to say:—

"Mr. Parnell, up to the last moment, professed to accept that principle cordially and thoroughly, but he had now repudiated it, for reasons which he need not here explain. The system for which Mr. Parnell now contended was one which the Liberal Party had never countenanced, and which they would never support."

There are two statements there to which I would call the attention of the House. First, here is a principle on which the Liberal Party, the Party represented by my right hon. Friend, will always stand—the principle of the control of the Imperial Parliament; and here is the second statement, that the system for which Mr. Parnell contends is one which they will never, never, never support. That is the most definite thing we have got yet. What is the system for which Mr. Parnell was then contending? Mr. Parnell expressed his intention at Waterford in January of 1891, and again he repeated it in the same words at the Leinster Hall in July. He said—

"It is now known to all men that when our Parliament has been restored to us it shall have power to make laws for Ireland, and that there shall be no English veto upon those laws except the Constitutional veto of the Crown, exercised in the same way as the Imperial Parliament."

That is to say, Mr. Parnell says distinctly he will not have the control of the Imperial Parliament. He says the only control he will look at is what he calls the Constitutional veto of the Crown, which we all know to be a Constitutional figment, which has never been exercised during the present generation, and which could not be exercised without the most serious difficulties and complications. Here is, at all events, a broad distinction of principle between my right hon. Friend and the Party he represents, and Mr. Parnell and the Party which is now led by the hon. Member for Waterford. I assume the hon. Member for Waterford is pledged to the principles laid down by Mr. Parnell. Then what is the position at which we have arrived? Remember, these right hon. Gentlemen have said again and again that they would think it a most stupid act of folly to bring forward any Home Rule Bill which had not the support of the majority, the great majority, of the representatives of Ireland. Very well, then at all events they are cut off altogether from all hope of any support from those representatives of Ireland for whom the Member for Waterford speaks. They cannot make it up with him without giving up the principle on which they are always, always going to stand. Of course it may be that in their opinion the hon. Member for Waterford and his friends are like the Dissident Liberals; they are doomed to extinction. Well, we shall see. That is a matter I shall leave to the hon. Member for Waterford to settle with my right hon. Friend. But I now come to a more important, numerically at any rate, section of the Irish Party—that section, the Anti-Parnellite, the National Party, I believe they call it. What is their position? The Freeman's Journal in December last (laughter from the Irish benches)—I wonder why hon. Members laugh. I will read what the Freeman's Journal says, and then I will ask the House to consider whether it fairly represents the Party of which it professes to be the organ. The Freeman's Journal in December 1891—I have not the exact date—says:—

"A deliberate attempt is being made to represent that the National Party would be willing to accept an abortion of Home Rule. We, therefore, state once again for the benefit of Mr. Redmond and those friend of his through the country who imagine that the late Mr. Parnell and his followers are the sole repositories of national independence that the definition of national self-government laid down by Mr. Parnell himself on 31st July, 1891, in which he referred to the essential provisions of the next Home Rule Bill, is entirely satisfactory to us as a fair definition so far as it goes of the only Home Rule which would be either safe or honourable for our people to accept."

(Ministerial cheers). Has my right

Mr. J. Chamberlain

hon. Friend got that on the Round Table? I do not know that I understood the laughter just now when I quoted the Freeman's Journal. Does the passage in the Freeman's Journal correctly represent the views of the National Party? Do they, or do they not, adhere to the declaration of Mr. Parnell on 31st July, 1891? If they do not I leave them to the hon. Member for Waterford. If they say they do, how are they going to reconcile themselves to the right hon. Member for Derby? (Ministerial cheers.) Now, I appeal to the House. I appeal to the hon. Members who support the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. I say, "Is not it wise in your own interest to clear up this doubt? Are you going to the election not certain that when you come back a great part of your supporters will not turn their backs upon you?" That is the risk on one side or the other. Will the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby say now whether he still sticks to his declaration that there shall be the control of the Imperial Parliament, or does he mean to surrender that, as he has surrendered so much else? If he does not say that, will the hon. Member for Derry (Mr. Justin McCarthy), who leads the National Party, say whether he is willing to make the concession, whether he is willing to take an abortion of a Home Rule Bill? Will he say whether he is willing to accept a subordinate Parliament? I do not know what the hon. Gentleman would say, but I do find that the attitude of the National Party, of those who are specially the friends of my right hon. Friend, is one which I should describe as a state of suspended suspicion. The National Party held a meeting at Mitchelstown on Sunday the 22nd November, which was addressed by the hon. Member for Mayo and the hon. Member for North-East Cork, who were both present, and must therefore be assumed to approve of the admirable Resolution which was passed at that meeting, namely:—

"Whilst we indignantly repudiate the allegation that the Irish Cause is to be made subservient to the exigencies of English Liberals we consider it prudent and patriotic to trust for the time being—(Laughter)—to the pledge of the Grand Old Man, reserving to ourselves the right to refuse any Home Rule Bill derogatory to the power of Ireland."

Was there ever such a prospect before a benighted Party as that which awaits my right hon. Friend? No sooner does he read a first time his Bill, which is to contain provisions to make the Parliament in Ireland subordinate to the control of the Parliament of Great Britain, than the friends upon whom he rests entirely for his majority will withdraw, will consider it prudent and patriotic to withdraw from provisional trust in the pledge of the Grand Old Man, and will exercise their privilege of refusing a Home Rule Bill derogatory to the power of Ireland. I say, I think I have made out my case. I am not exacting. I ask for a little information. I ask my right hon. Friend, or anyone who speaks on his behalf, to say whether they adhere to that declaration which was made in April, 1891, that a Parliament in Dublin was to be under the control of the Imperial Parliament. I ask only for a single piece of information, but there are friends and supporters of the right hon. Gentleman who have asked for a great deal more. There is the Pall Mall Gazette for instance. In the Press they have used arguments much more cogent than mine to show the unwisdom of proceeding to a General Election without knowing really what the issue is for which we are contesting. There is the Evening News, which I believe is the great Gladstonian organ of Edinburgh, and the Evening News used very nearly the same language, except that I blush to say that they have spoken disrespectfully of my right hon. Friend, for they have even called him an "artful dodger." Then there is my hon. Friend the Member for East Fife (Mr. Asquith). He has put forward in the clearest language, the most conclusive language, his reason for desiring to have information on this subject, and he has said that if the information is not afforded it is very probable that even when they get the majority—which Mr. Schnadhorst will not promise them—the party will break to pieces as soon as the Home Rule Bill is introduced. What is really to be the position of the supporters of the Opposition if this information continue to be refused?

Really I think the sympathy of the House ought to be extended to them. (Laughter.) They will be in the position of those persons described in the well-known lines of Churchill:—

"Those sheep who never heard their shepherd's voice;
Who did not know, yet would not learn their way;
Who strayed themselves, yet grieved that I should stray."

Before I sit down there is one other point upon which I think the House is entitled to a little information, and that is with regard to the question of Egypt. I was perfectly amazed to find the extremely light way in which, after the speeches during the Recess, this important subject was passed over by my right hon. Friend the other night. In the course of the Recess the right hon. Members for Mid Lothian and Newcastle-on-Tyne were understood not only in this country, but in foreign countries, which is more important, to have advocated the immediate evacuation of Egypt, and if they doubt it I appeal to the foreign Press, and, above all, to the Press of France, which asserts it again and again. They did not hesitate in their speeches to embarrass the Government, to make its difficult task more difficult, and now when they have an opportunity to bring this question to discussion and to the test of a vote in the House of Commons, the speech which opens our proceedings by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition does not contain a single word about it. I could quite understand a patriotic silence which was governed by a desire not to embarrass the action of the Executive. But they have not been silent. They have done all the mischief possible by their platform speeches. Having spoken so loudly on the platform, when they come to this House they are as silent as mice. What was it that the right hon. Member for Midlothian said? He said—

"I shall indeed rejoice if before the day comes for the present Administration to give up the ghost, it be possible for Lord Salisbury to make an effort to relieve us from that burdensome and embarrassing occupation of Egypt, which so long as it lasts, rely upon it, must be a cause of weakness and a source of embarrassment."

There has been an attempt made to minimise these words. (Ministerial cheers.) The right hon. Gentleman says "No." It was made in the organ of his Party, the Daily News, two days after the speech was delivered. I say the plain meaning of the speech, if words are intended to have any meaning, is that within six months, which is the longest time which the member for Midlothian has ever given to this Government to endure in recent days—that within six months Lord Salisbury is to take steps to arrange for the immediate evacuation of Egypt. If he thinks so, why does he not come here and say so? (Cheers.) Why does he only say it on a platform? I commented upon the language of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, and I said it was due to an inability to meet pressure, to an unwillingness to face national obligations; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle took me to task, and he said according to my speech inability to meet pressure meant inability to violate pledges, and unwillingness to face responsibility meant a breach of public faith. Yes, but now I want to know, is that platform declamation, or is it serious opinion? (Ministerial cheers.) If it is platform declamation, I say it is unworthy and unpatriotic to attempt to discredit a Government without any real intention behind it. If it is serious opinion, I say that the right hon. Gentleman is bound at the earliest possible moment to bring this matter before the House, and to adhere to the statements which he made, and to endeavour, to the best of his ability, to relieve his country from the stigma of dishonesty which he seeks to impose upon it. What are the facts of the case? There have been only two pledges given by any Government with regard to Egypt—by the preceding Government, and by this Government—and those pledges were that we would leave the country as soon as the country was relieved from any fear of foreign invasion or domestic anarchy, and the other pledge was that we would not leave until that work has been fully and completely accomplished. We gave an estimate of six months.

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT: That estimate was given by Lord Hartington.

Mr. J. Chamberlain

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Does the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby wish to separate Lord Hartington from the responsibility of the Cabinet? Now, we see the sincerity of the attacks which were made upon me during the recess, because it was said that I sought to put myself, as an individual, outside the Cabinet, for which I was jointly responsible. Sir, Lord Hartington spoke the language which he was instructed to speak by the Cabinet. We made the estimate of six months at that time. Later on Lord Salisbury appears to have made an estimate of three years as the probable time during which this work would be accomplished. It was not only Governments who made mistakes in this matter. Even the able officials who carried out the government of the country were mistaken, and believed that we could get to the end of the business much earlier than it has been possible to do. Both the estimate of Lord Hartington and of the Wolf Convention were mistaken. But our pledges remain absolutely intact. They have not been violated either in spirit or in any other way. It would have been cowardly and unworthy of this nation to allow that wonderful work which has been carried on in Egypt to be interrupted, to throw back the country to anarchy, or to allow it to be rescued from anarchy by the intervention of any Foreign Power. I say, therefore, if the language of right hon. Gentlemen during the recess has been misunderstood, they should take the earliest opportunity to correct themselves. But if they do mean what they appeared to mean, what it was said by the French and other foreign papers that they did mean—the immediate evacuation of Egypt—then we ought to know that these and other blessings are in store from the foreign as well as the domestic policy of a Government of which my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian should be the leader. In the course of his peroration, the Member for Derby made an eloquent appeal to the Whigs—the descendants of Fox, Burke, Russell, and Grey. Where are the Whigs? He turned round as if he expected to find, somewhere cowering on the back benches, degenerate descendants of these great men. Why, Sir, it was only four or five years ago that my right hon. Friend used publicly to boast that he, himself, was the only living descendant of the Whigs—that he was the only man who had preserved intact and in their pristine purity the traditions of the principles of the Whigs for future ages. If that be true, why he himself then is the only person who can answer his question, “Where are the Whigs?” I am afraid the last of the Whigs is still stewing in Parnellite juice, and the shades of the great men he evoked, if they care at all for the condition of their sole representative, must shudder at the pitiful plight to which he has reduced himself. However, one thing I am confident of, and that is that the great Whigs to whom he appeals would never have consented to palm off upon their followers or upon the people of this country a policy which they could not define, or which they were unwilling to describe.

(5.23.) MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Mr. Speaker, one of the many satisfactory circumstances attendant upon the tolerably speedy approach of the dissolution of the Parliament is that when that event happens we shall get rid of the unseemly comedy from which we have suffered so much during the last six years, of a gentleman sitting upon these benches denouncing and assailing from that position Liberal principles and Liberal measures and his old Liberal colleagues. The right hon. Gentleman asked, where are the Whigs? Where is the Radical? Sir, the right hon. Gentleman complains that we are afraid of bringing to the test of discussion in the House the assertions we made during the recess. (“Hear, hear!”) The right hon. Gentleman entirely misquotes. He did not quote in full. He says the declarations of my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian and myself pointed to instant evacuation. The right hon. Gentleman says that I desire a complete reversal of the foreign policy of the country. On the contrary, in all that I said upon Egypt I asked not for a reversal of foreign policy, but for a continuance of it. I said:—

“This remark will remain true until you have somebody at the Foreign Office with the courage to explain to his countrymen the effect of our occupation of Egypt upon our diplomatic relations, upon our military position. Somebody who will have the courage to describe the cost—I do not mean the money cost—but the whole cost in weakness of our position, military, diplomatic, and marine; somebody who will have the courage to point out that England in the present system of indefinite occupation in Egypt is a vulnerable England—England in constant risk of being drawn into the vortex of Continental war.”

Is that a reversal of the foreign policy of this country? The right hon. Gentleman referred to the Wolff Convention, but he does not seem to have acquainted himself with the full scope of that Instrument. Nothing can be more important than that this country should present, if possible, an unbroken front to foreign nations. I am as strong as he is in that view. Well, now I want to ask: Does Lord Salisbury contemplate the permanent and indefinite occupation of Egypt? If he does not, in what does he differ from me? If he were in favour of a definite occupation it would be discreditable to him, both to his statesmanship and his good faith. There is no foundation for such a charge, the action of Lord Salisbury completely establishes that. Let us see what happened. Lord Salisbury had not been in office many months before he despatched a special plenipotentiary, Sir Drummond Wolff, formerly a well-known Member of this House, to Turkey, and the first step he took was a Convention specially stipulating for a future arrangement regarding the withdrawal of British troops at a convenient period. That was the first step, and accordingly there came a second Convention, and in the month of May, 1887, Sir Drummond Wolff was instructed by Lord Salisbury to negotiate a Treaty with Turkey for the evacuation of Egypt by Great Britain, and the neutralisation of Egypt. It was stipulated, what? That at the end of three years from the date of that Convention the British Government should withdraw from Egypt, subject, I admit, to conditions of delay or return in certain specified cases of danger. Since May, 1887, the occasions specified as constituting special need for delay or return have never come about, therefore, if the Turkish Government had ratified that Convention—as unfortunately, owing to some misunderstanding either on the part of Turkey, Russia or France, she did not do—if Turkey had ratified that Convention, this country would have been out of Egypt, which the right hon. Gentleman regards as so cowardly a betrayal of duty, in June, 1890. This Convention was deliberately tendered by Lord Salisbury to Turkey, and the right hon. Gentleman should be the very last person, I think, to use the language he has used to-night upon the subject because we cannot forget his own speech upon the subject in 1884. I would like first to complete the record of 1887. It is well that we should regard the language of the British Government towards Europe through the mouth of her plenipotentiary in a despatch approved by Lord Salisbury in May, 1887. They are important words, and should be in the minds of right hon. Gentlemen whether they are discussing this—which concerns the strength as well as the honour of England—in this House or on platforms—

"Her Majesty's Government had disclaimed all desire of annexing Egypt or establishing a protectorate over it. It has more than once been suggested that England should take permanent possession of Egypt, which would be a violation of the traditional policy of England, of her good faith to the Sultan, and of the public law. In time of peace it would have exposed England to continued jealousy and danger, and in time of war it would have been a weak point entailing a continual drain on her resources."

What is the difference between the language used by Her Majesty's plenipotentiary and my own, that England in the persistent and indefinite occupation of Egypt is a vulnerable England, constantly in danger of being drawn into the vortex of European war? It was added that England was ready to promote the neutralisation of Egypt, not as master or mistress of Egypt, but as the mandatory of the other Powers; but the duty was regarded, and justly regarded, as a burden rather than a privilege. The House will observe this was put on two grounds—the violation of public law involved in an indefinite occupation; and the ground of danger and mischief to this country. What more did my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian say than was said by the plenipotentiary and approved by Lord Salisbury? The right hon. Gentleman is the last person to use language of this kind. What did he say in 1884—and, mark you, he was in the Cabinet then?—

"The fulfilment of the pledges we have given has been delayed by circumstances which could not well have been foreseen, and now there is growing up in certain quarters a demand that our policy should be changed, and that we should make ourselves permanently responsible for the government and protectorate of Egypt. I should be inclined to pay some attention to the advice if it had not come from a very suspicious quarter. It comes from those who have always been in favour of annexation. There is a great party in this country which seems to have learned nothing by experience, which is always eager for an extension of an Empire already, I should think, vast enough to please the most inordinate ambition, and which taxes our resources to the utmost in the attempt to govern it well and wisely."

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That is annexation.

MR. J. MORLEY: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon, but he was protesting the position of those who—

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Recommended annexation.

MR. J. MORLEY: "Make ourselves permanently responsible." What else is the position taken up by the right hon. Gentleman now?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have not said a single word here or anywhere else in favour of the permanent occupation of Egypt. What I have spoken of is remaining there till our work is accomplished, and I only complained of the language of the right hon. Gentleman because I believe it will tend directly to immediate evacuation.

MR. J. MORLEY: I think the language of which the right hon. Gentleman complains is exactly the language he used:—

"If we were to accept the advice so freely tendered to us I predict the temporary difficulties we have to face would become permanent dangers."

That was in 1884. What change has taken place in the condition of things since that which enables us to distinguish between permanent annexation and the position the right hon. Gentleman now takes up? Will any hon. Gentleman opposite get up and define to us—the right hon. Gentleman himself cannot speak again—what are the conditions, what are the terms under which he conceives our work will be satisfactorily done?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I stated them distinctly; I said we had pledged ourselves not to leave Egypt until she was relieved from any fear of foreign invasion or domestic anarchy.

MR. J. MORLEY: If the right hon. Gentleman took the position described in his own passage, how can he take up his present position when, according to constant asseverations, the position of Egypt is stronger than it has ever been? The right hon. Gentleman forgets that he was a member of the Cabinet when he used that language, and he is the last man who, in order to find favour with his new allies, should use such language to endeavour to steer the country into a policy which he himself was most energetic in repudiating at the time, and for the repudiation of which he was, as much as any member of the Government, responsible, and he cannot divest himself of the responsibility by having left his colleagues of that day. He regretted that the hon. Member for Midlothian was not here; it was well for him that the right hon. Gentleman was not here. Perhaps I have said enough to explain our language, which has never been misunderstood by the foreign press; they have not understood it as pointing to an immediate evacuation. The right hon. Gentleman did me the honour to refer to a passage in my writings as to clerical domination. I have written a great deal about these very serious subjects, and I have nothing to retract or to withdraw; but the right hon. Gentleman has completely misunderstood, and may I say, without offence, misrepresented the charge that was made the other night by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby against the Prime Minister. We have never complained against him for speaking against clerical domination. He was speaking of the Catholic religion; of the majority of Ireland. The point of his excessively pungent speech was as to giving the power of the majority of the State, and therefore the power of the State, "to those who through long ages had been enemies of England." That is not the Catholic clergy. He went on to say "they fought against us when we fought against Spain"; that was not the clergy; "when we fought against America and against France"; and that was not the clergy; "and this majority you are going to support and so place under their heels the rich and enlightened minority who are in sympathy with yourselves." So all that part of the right hon. Gentleman's argument, quoting from myself, was entirely wide of the mark. The assertion of the Prime Minister was certainly the most extraordinary I have ever heard from any man so accomplished as he is in matters of history. I am not going to weary the House with many extracts, but I should like to read one. First of all "they were against us in the American war"; the majority of Ireland was against us. What does Mr. Lecky, your own able and powerful Unionist historian, say:—

"The Republican religion of the Northern Presbyterians gave them some bias towards Republican Government, and their sympathy with the New England Puritans in their contest against England had been passionate and avowed."

So much for the American War. But before that Mr. Lecky says—I beg the House to notice this, because we shall hear of this again and again for several months—

"The Catholics of Ireland had maintained an absolute, unbroken tranquillity during the Scotch Rebellion of 1715; during the expedition organised against the House of Hanover by Alberoni in 1719; during the great Rebellion of 1745; during the long and desperate war with France that terminated in 1763, and amid all the complications that had since arisen."

In the American War it was not the Catholics who were against us, who moved a finger against us, it was the Republican Presbyterians of the North who were the passionate and avowed enemies of England. Then we come to the French War:—

"On the very eve of the rebellion of 1790," Mr. Lecky says, "the object of the Government was to separate as much as possible the Catholics from the Dissenters, and the Catholic question from the question of Reform. This was for some considerable time the keynote of the Irish Policy of the Duke of Portland, who was much struck with the fact that Protestant Ulster was the most disaffected of the four provinces, that at least five-sixths of the leaders of the United Irishmen were Protestants; that Munster, though now disturbed, had shown itself perfectly loyal during the French expedition of 1796; that Connaught, the most purely Catholic province in Ireland, was the one province that was still almost untainted."

What are the names of the leaders of the so-called Rebels? Wolfe Tone, Napper Tandy, the Emmets, Hamilton Rowan, the Sheeresses, Neilson, Lord Edward Fitzgerald, and Arthur O'Connor, and every one of them not Catholics, but Protestants. There never was a more unfortunate declaration historically, or a more mischievous and provocative one politically. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say a great deal about the Local Government of Ireland, and he declares that we are guilty of inconsistency in opposing the project of the Government for Local Government in Ireland. But why should we oppose it? First of all you have got, thanks to the right hon. Gentleman and his friends, a majority in this House. Why should we embark on a dogged opposition to a measure which, if you are bent upon it, you can, undoubtedly, with your confederated majority, carry through. We have never said, and I do not think my right hon. Friend has ever said, or that the hon. Member for Midlothian has ever said, that we should resist the project of the Government for Local Government in Ireland. You bring in a Bill for extending local self-government in Ireland, and we know as well as possible that it can only be, fetter it and safeguard it as you can, a stepping-stone to the larger and safer policy. Why should we oppose it? I do not grasp the right hon. Gentleman's point. But when he says we are eager for it, he certainly misrepresents our position. I wonder what the feeling in the breasts of the Government supporters themselves is? I think they are as little eager and ready for this as the right hon. Gentleman accuses us of being. There is not one single section in Ireland, or any serious portion, to whom this proposal is not either odious, or contemptible. It is odious to the section represented by hon. Gentlemen sitting there, and contemptible to hon. Gentlemen sitting here. The First Lord of the Treasury himself, in the language he used at Plymouth, and afterwards at Huddersfield, seemed in a very doubtful and apologetic state of mind about bringing it forward; and rather implied that he was doing so to carry out the undertaking given by his predecessor in that office and by the Government, before he himself was a Member of the Cabinet. He did distinctly imply that it was in consequence of that policy that he initiated it. He has never said one word in favour of it, except that it was taken up by his predecessor.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not my speech here, but I cannot accept that version of my speech.

MR. J. MORLEY: I read the right hon. Gentleman's speech and took it in that sense, but perhaps when we come to the words of the Bill and it is under discussion he will make the contradiction good. The Prime Minister at Newport, in 1885, said—

"That a large central authority was better than these multiplied local authorities, inasmuch as the wisdom of the central authority would neutralise the narrowness and passions of the local authorities."

At the memorable gathering, at Birmingham, in October, which consecrated the Alliance, the rank and file of the Tory Party passed a resolution throwing over their leaders, repudiating their Irish policy altogether. The hon. Member for South Tyrone, is he zealous for it? He says—

"If I were asked to provide for Ireland, it is not County Councils I should first of all supply, it would be something entirely different, but I recognise facts."

What facts, except that the Liberal Unionists have demanded it?

"I am not advocating what I think is theoretically the best for Ireland; on the contrary, we in Ireland may have to go through much tribulation, through these new Boards. In time to come, when calmer counsels prevail, they may even work for good. We may even now be shooting Niagara, but the venture must be made."

That is not a very enthusiastic way of approaching a reform which is to be the keystone of the Irish policy of the present Government. When that Bill is brought before the House I do not say we shall give it an entirely dispassionate and unprejudiced examination, because I think we have a deep conviction that the policy of the Bill is mistaken; that you are beginning at the wrong end; that you are preparing for yourselves or for your successors great tribulation, and that the safeguards that you propose to guarantee the minority against the concessions you make to the majority will be absolutely inoperative for good, and can only operate for increased friction between the new bodies and the central authority at Dublin Castle. I want to know—we shall know no doubt when the time comes—whether that is what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham promised three or four years ago. He said—

"The Conservative Party are not averse to large and drastic changes in the Government of Ireland; they are prepared to consider and review the whole of the irritating system of administration which is known as Dublin Castle; but if they come to this they will be compelled, if they have not done so already, to accept the main principles of Mr. Gladstone's Bill."

That is a passage standing absolutely by itself, and the right hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not read all the context. He goes on—

"They (the Conservative Party) will have to substitute for the administration of Dublin Castle some kind of legislative authority, subject to the guarantees Mr. Gladstone has laid down, and this will be the case, though they have rejected Mr. Gladstone's plan as dangerous and his guarantees as inadequate."

We shall be curious to see, when the proposals for the improvement of local self-government in Ireland come before the House, if this promise of the right hon. Gentleman is fulfilled by his allies. Upon this point I do not admit that the representation of his views on Home Rule by the right hon. Member for Derby was in any sense a misconception or misrepresentation. The right hon. Gentleman talked about his plan. Which plan? I believe the right hon. Gentleman's pigeon holes are bulging with plans. Is it the plan of giving to Ireland the Canadian system of internal Government? Is it the plan which he told to his distinguished friend of that day, Mr. Hurlbert? Is it the plan which distinguished his views from the policy of the right hon. Member for Midlothian; that is to say, that the Government in Ireland was to be identical with that of the United States? All we know is that when he asks us what we mean by Home Rule, I should be at a loss to find a better definition of it than his own, that if there is to be a substitute for the administration of Dublin Castle, it must be subject to the guarantees which Mr. Gladstone has laid down. He said—

"You must allow them to organise some form of Government. What the exact form of Government is to be concerns them much more than it does us. I should think if they were anxious to be economical and business-like, they would have as little red tape and form as possible; and they would be satisfied with a Standing Committee, with a Council of permanent officers of some kind or another. But if they thought they would be better served by imitating the cumbersome form of our Parliamentary Government, if they desired to have a Ministry—a Prime Minister, a Minister of Agriculture, a Minister of Public Works, a Minister of Education, and a Cabinet—all that I can say again is that it seems to me to be a matter entirely for their discretion, with which, at all events, I have no desire to interfere."

Therefore, in 1887, which was long after all disputes as to the retention of Irish Members, the right hon. Gentleman himself was in favour of an Irish Parliament and an Irish Cabinet. The right hon. Gentleman asks for details, and in connection with that demand there is a very curious fact. He says that they want full knowledge. Who wants full knowledge? Rossendale does not want full knowledge. (Cheers.) Rossendale got such knowledge as justified us in claiming that election—whatever else you say about it, as must be evident to anybody who read the speeches of my hon. Friend the new Member for Rossendale—(cheers)—it justifies us in claiming that election as a triumph for Home Rule. (Cheers.) Was it not fought upon Home Rule? (Cries of "Yes!" and cheers.)

An hon. MEMBER: But all the details were not given.

MR. J. MORLEY: You say that all the details were not given. How can it be expected—which of you would expect—that all the provisions of a Bill are to be produced, to be examined, to be discussed and perfected upon a platform? It is without precedent. There are two places for the production, for the discussion, for the perfection of details of any such plan; there is first of all the Cabinet, and there is secondly Parliament. (Cheers.) And the country expects this; the country understands this; and your charge as to the knowledge of Rossendale not being minute and in detail is beside the question. (Cheers.) What that election means, and the other elections fought upon the same lines, is this. It means that the electors say, "We accept the principle that Ireland is to have a legislative authority for affairs declared by Parliament to be Irish affairs; we understand you," they say to the Leaders of the Liberal Party, "to be prepared to provide for Irish representation at Westminster; we know that the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament is to be guarded, and we trust to you to devise a plan to carry out these views, and for shaping the fabric to be raised." I do not think any gentleman opposite can contradict the position. It is the position in which other matters have been discussed in the country and accepted by the country, and eventually produced in Parliament. If the constituencies have confidence in the intention, and in the ability of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, and in his colleagues to perfect a plan upon the lines that our Party accept, and which they desire to see carried out, why should we listen to the bland and benevolent demands of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. If the Liberal Party is satisfied, why should we depart from the Constitutional usage to please the little handful who have quitted that Party. (Cheers.) I know as well as the right hon. Gentleman how many difficulties there may be in carrying out the policy of Home Rule. This is not the time to examine that matter, because I rather think the First Lord of the Treasury the other night complained of a right hon. Gentleman for introducing Home Rule into this discussion at all; this is not the time for going into all the difficulties that may confront us in regard to Home Rule. We know these difficulties. We do not quail before them—and when the General Election comes we shall then be face to face with you, and you only, who oppose Home Rule upon Conservative principles. We shall not be attacked by enemies in the flank—except by speeches—for the Liberal Unionists will have disappeared. The right hon. Gentleman himself knows, and nobody better, what sort of a figure the Liberal Unionists will cut when the issue is placed before the country of carrying this measure of justice to Ireland, or of falling back upon the old position, which has made the Irish vote a dominant factor in politics. (Cheers.) It is said that you are going to give to the Irish priesthood the power of governing Ireland. That was implied by the Duke of Argyll, who said, "You are going to give to the Irish priesthood the power of returning the Irish Members." But supposing we are swept from Parliament at the next General Election, you will still have the Irish Members to deal with. The country now understands the issue. If the right hon. Gentleman and his friends believe that we are making promises which we shall not be able to fulfil, if they believe that we shall be brought face to face with difficulties that we cannot overcome, then the sooner they set us face to face with the constituencies the better. (Cheers.) And that is a question which the Government has not thought fit—and I do not think we have much right to blame them—to disclose their intentions upon; but this is worth remembering: that Lord Salisbury himself declared, in 1884, that the Prime Minister "might interpose his own will between the wishes of the country and a dissolution, yet such a course was not a Constitutional course;" and that is what we say to you, if there is a prolongation of this Parliament beyond the present Session, that you will be guilty of the same breach of Constitutional law which Lord Salisbury laid down in 1884. (Cheers.) I am willing to believe you have no intention of making such a breach. But the right hon. Gentleman says that we have not referred to dissolution. I have thought it proper to make that remark, and to say that we shall expect from the right hon. Gentleman opposite some assurance that the Constitutional point raised and affirmed by Lord Salisbury in 1884 will not be evaded in their own case. I thank the House for their attention, and I believe I have met all the points that are relevant to the discussion.

(6.10.) MR. JOHN E. REDMOND (Waterford): I have not risen for the purpose of replying to the right hon.

Mr. J. Morley

Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham ; nor do I intend to refer to the topics discussed by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. I recognise the grave importance of those topics, and when the proper time comes, as probably it will come very soon, Irish Members will be called upon to express their opinion as to the necessity of the Liberal Party dealing more in detail with proposals for Home Rule. I do not rise now for the purpose of discussing these topics to-night, for I recognise that they must furnish material for many debates during the Session upon which we have just entered. I propose, with the permission of the House, to divert the discussion into another channel, and to move an Amendment of which I have already given notice. It is to add at the end of the Address—

"And we humbly represent to your Majesty that the time has come when the cases of all prisoners convicted under the 'Treason Felony Act,' who are, and have been, for many years undergoing punishment for offences arising out of insurrectionary movements connected with Ireland, may be advantageously re-considered, with a view to the speedy release of these prisoners."

I do not think that it will be necessary to make any apology for introducing, at this early stage of the Session, a Motion for dealing with the amnesty of the prisoners convicted under the "Treason Felony Act." The prisoners to whom the Motion refers number 16, and they were convicted under circumstances that justify us in asking for their release ; they are prisoners convicted of political offences, and I ask the House to agree with me that it is inexpedient that they should be further punished ; and that, seeing that the liberty, and, perhaps, the lives of these 16 men are at stake ; that the feeling of large masses of the Irish people are aroused upon this matter ; that serious doubt exists as to the guilt of these prisoners, whether I am not justified in appealing to the House of Commons for the principle of fair play being extended to them. Last year I directed the attention of the House to the case of John Daly and of Egan, and I went into some detail in regard to their cases. To-night I propose to deal entirely, and by way of illustration, with the cases of those two men. And let me first say upon what grounds I base my claims for reconsideration. I base my claims for amnesty upon three grounds, and I submit that if I establish any one of the three grounds it will be sufficient for proving the necessity of reconsideration. I say, first, that these are political offenders, and that being political offenders it is expedient to amnesty them. Secondly, I say that the convictions were wrong, and that in all the cases the convictions were obtained under circumstances which render it desirable that the punishment should be curtailed. Thirdly, I base my claim upon the fact that the prison treatment meted out to these men has been excessive, and has intensified the tortures of penal servitude because of the political offence of which they were convicted. I will only trespass for a short time upon the indulgence of the House in endeavouring to establish my case as based upon those three grounds. First, are they political offenders ? The House will note that in the Amendment I submit to the House and speak of these prisoners as prisoners convicted under the Treason Felony Act, and who are, and have been for many years, undergoing imprisonment for participation in insurrectionary movements in Ireland. Last year there was a Return presented to Parliament of the names and sentences of all these men. I find that there are 16 of these prisoners, and that the whole 16 were convicted under the Treason Felony Act—that is, of having taken part in a conspiracy "to levy war against the Queen and to subvert the Empire." I know it is said of these men that they are dynamitards, and I know that prejudice has been raised against them by their being so-called. Now, it is unnecessary for us to say that we have no desire to palliate offences known as dynamite outrages. Those offences were not only stupid, but they were intensely criminal. The point I wish to make is that not a single one of these prisoners was convicted of any dynamite outrage whatever. In 1863, at the instance of the Member for Derby, the Explosives Act was passed for the purpose of dealing with dynamite outrages. Now, that Act was not put into force with reference to any one of these men; it was not put into force, because the evidence which had aroused a certain amount of suspicion in reference to their cases, was not strong enough to obtain a conviction under it. The course of procedure of the Crown was that, having got sufficient evidence for suspicion against these men, they hounded back into the lives of each and all of them, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they in their youth, and so far back as in 1867, had not been members of the Fenian Brotherhood; and this was when some of the leaders of the Fenian movement had been amnestied, and when some of them were actually sitting upon the Benches of this House. They were in fact convicted and sentenced simply because they had been suspected of dynamite outrages. Take the case of Daly. The indictment against Daly was not an indictment for a dynamite outrage; it was not an indictment under the Explosives Act; he was convicted for having been a Fenian from the year 1867, and for a number of years afterwards. In order to make that point plain to the House it is only necessary to go to the account of the trial. The right hon. Gentleman for Bury explained the charge, as what is known in legal language as Treason Felony; and of levying war and raising a conspiracy against the Queen in these realms. But Sir Henry James said—

"They had to go back to 1868; and certainly at that time an association had been formed called the Irish Republican Brotherhood, the object of which was to levy war and to establish an Irish Republic."

And then he goes on to say, in a long passage to explain the accountability of the prisoner, and as to certain documents in his possession as proof of his having taken part in the conspiracy. The learned Judge, in delivering sentence, said—

"The prisoner has been convicted of having conspired to sever Ireland from these dominions, and nobody who perused the documents could come to any other conclusion than that a wide-spread conspiracy existed for that purpose."

Now, neither in the indictment nor in the speeches of counsel for the Crown, nor in the declaration of the Judge was the case treated as other than as a political offence—for having taking part in a conspiracy to raise insurrection in Ireland. In the case of Daly, and of Egan who was tried at the same time, they were not convicted of a dynamite offence. Daly was suspected of connection with dynamite, but convicted of a political offence, and I submit that he ought to have got the benefit that might arise from the fact that he was held to be a political offender. The evidence that he was a political offender goes back to 1868. This was an old, it was a stale, charge for there are thousands and thousands walking about in the light of day in Ireland and there are, I believe, Members in this House, against whom an offence of twenty years ago might be adduced such as that which led to the conviction of John Daly. No doubt the conviction is technically right, but what I urge is that you should give him the benefit of the fact of his having been convicted of a political offence. He was convicted upon evidence of an informer brought from Sligo. There was evidence given of his connection with the Fenian Movement in 1868 and 1883, and, having been convicted, he was sentenced to penal servitude for life; and the facts show that in his case, as in all the others, they were convicted of having been guilty of political offences. I submit that the cases of these men, every one of whom, with one exception, was sentenced to penal servitude for life, therefore demands re-consideration at the hands of the House. I know that the answer will be that the sentences were large because they were dynamitards. They were arrested and tried for treason felony, for a political offence, and having been convicted of a political offence they were sentenced as dynamitards; and I say that establishes a strong case why these sentences should be re-considered by the Government. The cases I have quoted of Daly and Egan are only sample cases. The same is true of all the 16 men, and I claim without going elaborately into the cases that I have shown that these men were convicted of political offences, and that it is only fair and just that the question of their continued incarceration should be judged as the consideration of the cases of men who were so convicted and not of the case of the men who were convicted of the dynamite outrages; and I would seriously ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and I would seriously ask the House of Commons whether they think that anything is to be gained for the Empire, for the internal peace of these countries, for the cause of the Union, if you like, of Great Britain and Ireland by prolonging the punishment which has already existed in the case of these men so convicted of nine years in some cases and of eight in others, in view of the fact that for years and years ago amnesty has been granted for every political offender imprisoned in these cases, and in view of the fact that the dynamite conspiracy for suspicion of which these men were imprisoned is absolutely as everybody knows dead and gone. I would further ask the Government to consider what has been the effect of every act of amnesty that this country has extended towards political offenders. If the right hon. Gentleman were in a position to show that amnesties to similar offenders in the past had been attended with bad results he might have some reason for opposition to the Motion I make; but I think he will admit that the amnesty which was granted in past days so far from leading to renewed conspiracies has, in the cases of all the individuals who were amnestied, led to a better state of feeling towards this country and this Empire. Now, the second ground upon which I rest my claim for the amnesty of these men is that in some of the cases the convictions are tainted with the very gravest suspicion. First of all, I desire to point out that these convictions were obtained at a time of passion and prejudice in this country. Everybody will remember the excited state, the naturally excited state if you like, of public opinion when criminal efforts were made to injure public buildings and others by the use of explosives in the streets of this Metropolis, and everyone must remember the denunciations in the Press towards everything Irish and everybody who happened to be in Ireland; and I assert without bringing any accusation against the fairness of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury, and the other eminent Counsel who conducted these cases for the Crown, and without making any accusation against the fairness of the Judges—I think I may fairly say that any man who was accused of dynamite offences and who had been tried for treason felony was called a dynamitard in England: men who had suspicion raised against them could not expect, and did not receive from English jurors, that fair play which, under ordinary circumstances, they would receive from the hands of jurors in this country. Take again the case of Daly and Egan. What is the story of Daly? He was a man with whom very many men who sit around me in this House were very intimately acquainted for many years. He was a man who played an important part in the public life of Ireland. He was a man who held extreme opinions. He was a man with whom many of us here may have disagreed on many points; but I appeal to every man who is listening to me, who knew Daly personally, or who knew him through others, to bear me out when I say that through all the troublous times of the past he bore the character of, and remained, an honourable man. He was a comparatively young man and a man of great intelligence. He belonged to the Fenian organisation, but it is notorious that at all times he protested vehemently against anything in the shape of outrage, of assassination, or of murder. In 1883 John Daly went to America, and this dynamitard who was to eke out the rest of his days in Portland Gaol was hunted out of America by a section who were advocating dynamite in America—by O'Donovan Rossa and others who denounced him in their newspapers and hunted him out of America. He came back to England and took up his quarters in Birmingham in the house of an old schoolfellow and friend, and he remained there from the 11th of October till the 9th of April following; and at the trial the inspector of police, who gave evidence against Daly, said that during all that time he was followed day and night, and never lost sight of by the police, and the police never saw him do anything suspicious; but suddenly he was arrested in Liverpool on the 11th of April—arrested under circumstances so extraordinary that I say, if they stood alone, they would constitute a justification for my claim that his case should be re-considered. On the 9th of April he received a telegram from a man in Liverpool who had been an old friend and confidant of his. The right hon. Gentleman knows his name. He asked him to go to Liverpool. He went on the 9th of April from Birmingham to Wolverhampton, and from thence to Liverpool; and the evidence of the police examined in the case is that when he arrived in Liverpool on the 9th of April the detectives lost sight of him. They did not know where he went; for two days he was absolutely out of their sight, and for all they knew he might have left the city. But suddenly, at eight o'clock on the morning of the 11th of April, he went to the railway station at Birkenhead to get a ticket, and when he walked into the booking office carrying with him a brown paper parcel, which had been handed to him half an hour before by this very man, whose name the right hon. Gentleman knows, who was never arrested, who left the country and was never heard of since—when he went into that station at 8 o'clock that morning he found the police to the number of 25 in that place surrounding the booking office, one with a black bag ready to carry away the parcel, and another with hand-cuffs and so on, and he was arrested on the spot. And Constable Humphries, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, who effected the arrest, was asked at the trial by Daly, who defended himself, why he arrested him, as Inspector Stroud had sworn that during the seven months he followed him night and day he never saw him doing anything suspicious; and the answer Humphries gave was—"Oh, we saw your pockets bulky and we arrested you in consequence." Now, at the trial all the attempts made by Daly, and necessarily they were clumsy attempts, to trace up this matter of the man who gave him the package were peremptorily stopped by the Judge, on the objection taken by the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for Bury. Under these circumstances I claim that if the case of Daly stood there alone a sufficient case would have been made for the gravest suspicions as to whether his connection with this parcel was not part of a deliberate plot on the part of the Irish police who were at that time in London and other parts of England, for the purpose of hunting out this dynamite conspiracy. But the case does not stop there. The case developed two or three years after his conviction in a manner which fairly startled anybody who took any interest in it, because a charge of the most horrible character was made against the Irish police, and an accusation was made by an English gentleman of high official position, occupying the position of chief of the police in the important town of Birmingham, Mr. Farndale; by a man who had been in control of the detectives during these seven months, who had been watching Daly. It was the statement of a man who knew what he was talking about, and knew of the efforts to take Daly, in this conspiracy net, and a gentleman who having made this accusation stood by it, and, as far as I have information, stands by it. He is still a trusted official of the Government, and entrusted with the highly important duties which belong to the office he holds. What was his statement? He made the statement first to an Alderman of the City of Birmingham, called Manton, and then he made the statement to the Watch Committee in the City of Birmingham, and his statement in a sentence was this, that he was determined to rest no longer with this load upon his conscience and mind of the knowledge which he possessed of the way in which this parcel of explosives had been planted on Daly's person, and he solemnly made the accusation that that parcel had been planted on Daly by an agent in the pay of the Irish police, that that agent had been receiving the pay of the Government for a considerable time before this transaction, that these explosives were actually bought and supplied by the Government through the agency of the Irish police, and that agent of the Government the right hon. Gentleman knows, and he has left the country, and he handed the parcel to Daly half-an-hour before he was arrested. The man who handed the parcel to Daly told the police to bring their men to Birkenhead and wait for Daly, and then the man disappeared. Here is the statement. The words of Alderman Manton in a letter addressed on the 6th October, 1887, to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary —

Mr. John E. Redmond

"Mr. Farndale swore on oath—Mr. Manton, you will be surprised when I tell you that the explosives found on Daly were planted on him by the police . . . Mr. Farndale replied, 'really so!' I said to him 'are you absolutely sure?' Mr. Farndale said 'I am, and I promise you that I will never engage in another such a business as long as I live.'

That statement was brought under the attention of the Government and the Home Secretary, and I would seriously ask the House of Commons to consider for one moment what a grave accusation that was to bring, and what a terrible position it was which it placed all those who were responsible for the administration of justice in these matters. What did the right hon. Gentleman do? He told us in the last debate he sent for Mr. Farndale, and though he had a private investigation he refused to tell us anything about the investigation, he refused to tell us what evidence was adduced there and whether it was evidence taken upon oath. In fact, we know absolutely nothing about the private investigation except this, that the right hon. Gentleman says he, the Home Secretary, convinced himself that Mr. Farndale was wrong. I asked him did the investigation convince Mr. Farndale that he was wrong. He said—"No," and there the matter rests. An investigation is held into this terrible charge, the investigation ends by the Home Secretary convincing himself that the accusation was untrue, and Mr. Farndale remaining in the same position, and Daly is left these years to rot in gaol under this accusation. I submit that this investigation of the Home Secretary leaves this matter in a most unsatisfactory position. The right hon. Gentleman says he thinks that the horrible accusation against the police was all wrong but he still continues in a responsible position the man who made such a horrible accusation and who will still persists that the accusation is true. I venture to submit that the question is an extraordinary one at the very least, and all I ask from the right hon. Gentleman is that he may institute something like a real and bona fide investigation into this matter. Chief Constable Farndale was the only police official in a responsible position who was not called at the trial. If Chief Constable Farndale had been called and like a truthful and honest man had stated in the box what he stated afterwards, do you believe that any jury of Englishmen would have convicted Daly? No. Under these circumstances, is it too much for us to ask if you would institute a fresh investigation into this case? My friend reminds me there might have been a verdict of treason felony, notwithstanding Chief Constable Farndale's evidence. I do not believe that there would. I believe that if Chief Constable Farndale had given that evidence, the jury would have been so disgusted that they would have refused to find any verdict whatever for the Crown. Does the right hon. Gentleman not think for the sake of satisfying the minds of large masses of the Irish people who know Daly, and from their knowledge of him know him to be incapable of being a dynamitard, does he not think that, after what has taken place, for the sake of satisfying their minds and for the sake of the purity of the administration of justice in England he ought to grant a new investigation? We believe that no matter how bitter an enemy of your rule in Ireland Daly may have been that he was not an assassin, and was not implicated in this plot; and strong in that belief we urge upon you in the name of justice to grant this man another investigation. Now, what I said of Daly I can say of all the others in the list. Yet a still harder case than of Daly is the case of James Egan. Egan was convicted solely, just as in the case of Daly, so far as proof goes, of being a Fenian. But there was this difference between the two cases, that whereas it was shown that Daly had been in communication within recent years with men supposed to have been connected with the Fenian Conspiracy, it was shown conclusively that since the year 1875 Egan had no connection with the Fenian Organisation whatever. He was tried in 1884. It was shown that he had been a Fenian before 1875—nine years before. During that period of nine years there was not one tittle of evidence to show that Egan had ever been a Fenian, or connected with the Fenian Organisation. So far as evidence raising suspicion is concerned, there is only one piece of evidence against Egan—namely, that there was found in the corner of a large garden at the back of his house a little bottle, I believe only about an inch long, containing a small quantity of nitro-glycerine, and Daly declared in the most solemn way that it was he who buried the bottle in Egan's garden. No doubt was expressed during the trial as to the truth of that statement, and the Judge in sentencing Egan said that while it was clear upon the evidence that he ought to be convicted as a Fenian, there was a shadow of a doubt as to his guilt as a dynamiter. Well, if there was a shadow of a doubt in Egan's case as to the suspicion of dynamite, surely the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary might fairly re-consider Egan's case, seeing that he has now served eight years of torture in Portland and in Chatham. Egan's case is the hardest of all the prisoners convicted of treason-felony. The mere fact that the convict Daly lodged in Egan's house is no proof of Egan's complicity in Daly's crime. I have seen him, owing to the spirit of courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, who has given me most ample opportunity for seeing the prisoners. I desire to thank him publicly for his courtesy. I have seen Egan and I have seen something of his life. He was a man of absolutely blameless life, a man who by years of industry had raised himself to a position of trust in Birmingham. There was absolutely nothing against him except this misfortune. Daly, whom the Irish police had determined to drag, by fair or by foul means, into their net, unfortunately went to lodge in the house of his old friend Egan. From that moment suspicion was raised against Egan. The police went down to the garden and found there the bottle containing the nitro-glycerine and they knew that Egan, like Daly, had been a Fenian. Egan is a delicate man, and the life that he and the others are leading is killing them. It is impossible to see them month after month without seeing that they are dying almost before one's face. In the case of Daly I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman for a re-investigation. In the case of Egan I appeal for a re-consideration of the sentence—as to whether nine years of torture in Portland is not enough for having given shelter to his friend Daly for seven months in one year. There are, in all, sixteen cases; there was suspicion of dynamite in all; there was a conviction for treason in all. I cannot possibly deal with the whole of the sixteen cases, and I have mentioned these two as samples. Sir, I think I have shown, firstly, that these men are entitled to be treated as political offenders; and, secondly, that with reference to some of the cases there are circumstances of suspicion which ought to give rise to a consideration of their cases. I come to the last ground on which I base my appeal. The prison treatment to which these men have been subjected is cruel in the extreme. I do not make any accusation against the prison officials, but what I complain of is that within the rules—without breaking one of them—these men have been subjected to a course of treatment which makes penal servitude a far greater torture than it is to convicts in ordinary establishments. Daly, moreover, was poisoned accidentally on three occasions in gaol. He was told he was dying, and he believed he was dying. On one of those occasions he made a very touching declaration, which is recorded in the Blue Book, declaring the absolute innocence of Egan of any knowledge of the bottle in the garden, or of his (Daly's) political opinions. No authority is given to endanger a man's life when he is sent to penal servitude, and, therefore, the fact that he has been poisoned on three occasions should be taken into account. Now, though I would be sorry to outstep the limits of the courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman, or to abuse the privileges he has extended to me, I should like to say something as to the system of treatment to which these prisoners are subjected. One thing that renders convict life more easy after a while is that if the convict behaves himself well he is taught some kind of trade, and by degrees will get skilful in that trade and take an interest in it, and it is manifest that working in association, the men find a new interest in life, which enables them to pass their days better than they otherwise would. In the case of these Irish prisoners there has been an exception. They have never been allowed to learn a trade. They have been kept apart from all other prisoners. In Portland they are kept in what are called penal cells, originally built for refractory prisoners, the windows of which are covered with perforated iron, so that they cannot get so much as glimpse of the sky. They are kept for sixteen and a half hours in these cells, and for six and a half hours they are put to work, not in a room or in the open air, but in a dark corridor leading from one part of the prison to another. There they are employed chopping sticks, pumping water, and mending old flannel shirts. Only one hour per day is allowed them for exercise—for fresh air. On the whole case, I submit that these men were convicted as political offenders; that as such their cases ought to be reconsidered; that as to some cases there is doubt as to their conviction, and that these should be specially considered; and finally with reference to all the cases, the punishment meted out has been of a peculiarly savage and terrible character. There is in Ireland a widespread feeling in favour of the men, and I sincerely trust that in the claim I make for the reconsideration of their cases I will have the support of all sections of this House. I hope the Nationalist representatives will speak to-night with a united voice. Finally, Sir, I would ask, What is to be gained by keeping these men in prison? Absolutely nothing. This dynamite scare is dead. Its folly, its wickedness, its absolute uselessness has been proved before the whole world. Any further detention of these men will amount to vindictiveness and cruelty. On the other hand what is to be gained by releasing them? It always adds to the strength of the strong to be merciful. An exhibition of clemency never endangered authority in this or any other country in the world. The act of clemency for which I now ask will for ever redound to the honour of this country, and I appeal to the House, to rise above the prejudices and the passions which surround this question and to send a message of peace and forgiveness which I believe will find a responsive echo in the hearts of the Irish people throughout the world, and which will do more to strengthen your Empire and to prevent the recurrence of such conspiracies than any exhibition of vindictiveness and cruelty.

*(7.20.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Mr. Speaker, I think no one can complain of the tone and spirit in which the hon. Gentleman has presented his case to the House. I must, however, decline to follow the hon. Member into his narrative of prison treatment. I am sure he must see and feel it is quite impossible that details of prison discipline can be usefully, and indeed, truthfully, discussed between a prisoner and his private friend, and if I decline to deal with any complaint not made through the constituted authority, I do not in the least complain of what the hon. Gentleman said. He said he did not charge the prison authorities with harshness or injustice. In a recent inquiry it was shown that the treatment of the Irish prisoners differed in no respect from that of any other convict having received a similar sentence, and undergoing it in the same prison. If the House is of opinion that the treatment of convict prisoners is too severe and requires to be overhauled, that is a matter upon which I am perfectly ready to enter; but to discuss the system of convict treatment and convict discipline as a bye-question in a debate of this sort would be highly undesirable. The other two points raised by the hon. Member fully deserve an answer. The hon. Member in an extremely ingenious argument contended that the whole of the sixteen prisoners, whose names were mentioned in the Return laid on the Table of the House last year, are political prisoners because their conviction was for treason-felony. I must absolutely take exception to that. I allege that every one of these sixteen prisoners is a dynamite prisoner having been found guilty of dynamite offences, upon which their conviction proceeded. The hon. Gentleman was entitled to urge that technically and in legal parlance their offence was treason-felony, but he overlooked the fact that the dynamite might be used against a private person to cause injury to that person, and then the offence would not be treason-felony; but it might also be used for a public object—to bring about a change of Government, to alter the advisers of the Crown. Then the offence becomes treason-felony and is technically called levying war against the Crown. Am I, however, to be told that because the purpose for which dynamite is used is not merely injury to a private person, but to a whole class, or party, or Government, that therefore its use becomes less infamous, less disgraceful, less deserving of the severest punishment? Hon. Members might turn to the pages of the weightiest authority on the point I can mention, namely, the Report of the Commissioners on Extradition, comprising the most eminent lawyers. There were the late Lord Chief Justice, Baron Bramwell, the present Master of the Rolls, Sir James Stephen, who as a criminal lawyer stands second to none, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, a constitutional lawyer who could give lessons to many. Well, then, the Extradition Commissioners stated—

"The principle hitherto adopted in the matter of extradition, of excluding offences of a political character should therefore be maintained.

"But it becomes a very different thing when, in furtherance of some political or pretended political purpose, some foul crime, such as assassination or incendiarism, is committed. Thus, attempts by conspirators to assassinate a reigning Sovereign, regardless, perhaps, that in doing so other lives may be sacrificed; or the setting fire to a prison, at the risk of burning all those within it; or the murder of the police for the purpose of rescuing prisoners in custody for political offences, are crimes in respect of which, though the motive was a political one, we cannot think that any immunity should be afforded. Civil war and insurrection take place openly, in the face of day, and may or may not be justified or excused by circumstances; but assassination or other forms of revolting crime lose none of their atrocity from their connection with political motive.

"Generally speaking, we would therefore decline to recognise the suggestion of a political motive as a ground on which a magistrate or judge should refuse a demand for the surrender of a person accused of what (in the absence of such motive) would be an ordinary crime, unless the act to which a political character was sought to be ascribed occurred during a time of civil war or open insurrection."

That is about as sound and tenable a distinction as could be made in a matter that presents some difficulty. It was also pointed out by the Commissioners that if you have a state of civil war and insurrection, the violence inflicted upon one party by another took place openly and in the face of day; that each man had warning of the attack and knew what to expect. But those dynamite outrages have none of those features. There was no warning to the enemy to stand upon their guard, but there were all the elements of secret contrivance that constituted an odious and a dangerous crime. I regret that the hon. Gentleman indulged in that argument about political offences without stating what the character of the offence committed by these 16 persons was. Daly and Egan were charged with a dynamite offence; this was proved in the evidence, and was treated in the summing up of the Judge to the jury as a dynamite offence. There were two counts in the indictment, in which they were charged with having aided a treasonable object; and, with design to overthrow the power and authority of our Sovereign Lady the Queen, in that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland, having in their possession at Birmingham 15 ounces of nitro-glycerine with intent to employ the same in furtherance of that object; and that in furtherance of their treasonable object they had also dynamite and dynamite bombs, four dynamite shells, and one pound of dynamite in their possession.

MR. T. M. HEALY (North Longford): Did the conviction cover all the counts in the indictment?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, the conviction was general, and covered all the counts. It was not proved for what purpose the bombs were to be used. These bombs were such as were capable of being thrown from the gallery of this House. ("Oh, oh!" from Irish Members.) I do not know from whom these sounds are uttered.

MR. J. REDMOND: This is a very unfair suggestion. There is not one tittle of proof behind it.

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not say it has been proved. I say these bombs were capable of being used in that way. It would be difficult for ingenuity to suggest for what innocent purpose the bombs were intended. I have yet to learn that is not a purpose for which the bombs found on Daly could be used. That was the case of Daly and Egan. Nitro-glycerine buried in Egan's garden: bombs found on the person of Daly. Then there is a large group in which McCullagh, Devany, Callaghan, and others figure. They were charged in connection with explosions at the Glasgow Gas Works, at Possil Bridge, and Buchanan Street Railway Station. Each of these explosions took place on the same night, and these men were all members of the Irish Brotherhood. The explosives found were in certain tubes brought from Cork to Liverpool. Is that to be treated as a political offence when railway bridges, and gas works in a town in Scotland are made the object of a dynamite explosion? I must leave it to the common sense of the House to deal with such a case as that. Then there is the case of Whitehead, Gallagher, Wilson, and Curtin. That was a case in which dynamite was found in india-rubber bags, sent by Gallagher to Whitehead's house, in order to bring to London nitro-glycerine, of which Whitehead manufactured large quantities. Gallagher said this explosive was to blow up the House of Commons and other large buildings in London. Can that be honoured with the name of a mere political offence? It is an outrage of the most wanton kind which anyone can imagine. Two other of the prisoners are Featherstone and Dalton. They were men in the possession of an ingeniously constructed infernal machine such as those used at the Glasgow and at the Local Government Board explosions. These explosives were also brought from Cork to Liverpool.

MR. J. REDMOND: Has the right hon. Gentleman ever heard of Macdermott?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am speaking of the character of the offences. The hon. Member is referring to some individual whose acquaintance I have not the honour to possess, and who he says was really the culprit. I pray that hon. Members may keep their minds to the point. I say these are all dynamite offences, and the appeal for clemency made by the hon. Member for Waterford in his very temperate speech seems to me inappropriate. I know of no reason why offences certainly most dangerous should be treated with exceptional leniency except it could be suggested that the class of offence was not likely to be committed again; and that the deterrent object of severe punishment was no longer called for in the public interest. That is a kind of argument which a person in my position might be inclined to listen to. But that cannot be said. Within the last month or two we have had explosions in Ireland, which show that the use of explosives has not yet been abandoned, and there have been indications in more than one quarter in England as well. No one can suggest that these are political offences, dealing in these extremely dangerous explosives. Quite apart from any sympathies or antipathies, this is a class of offence which is the least deserving of sympathy. Considering the advance in chemical knowledge at the present day, and the terrible increase in the power of explosives put within the reach of any mischievous or malicious person, it seems to me that public safety demands, that when explosives of this kind have been prepared in order to commit outrages, the most stringent and deterrent punishment should follow conviction. The appeals for mercy might be appropriate if you were dealing with a political party fighting in a fair way, but they are altogether inappropriate when you are dealing with secret and malicious offenders. Then the hon. Member says the conviction of Daly for treason felony was wrong. No doubt that would be so if the object had been to inflict a wrong upon a private person, but it was not wrong where the guilty party sought to injure the Government of the Queen, and change Her councils by the use of dynamite bombs, and by having nitro-glycerine concealed in a garden. The use of dynamite may be for private mischief or for public mischief. When for public mischief it is called treason felony. The hon. Gentleman has referred to Mr. Farndale's opinion, I am not Mr. Farndale's superior, and I have no right to call him to account, and I desire to say nothing of him which is not respectful. But after the most careful inquiry I am convinced that the inferences which Mr. Farndale drew from what little he knew of Daly's capture were inferences which were entirely mistaken. The inference he drew was that the bombs had been planted upon Daly by the police. I instituted an inquiry into the matter and I say what I think will probably not surprise the hon. Member if Daly has been candid with him, that I am satisfied from inquiries I made, that Daly applied to Breslin of New York for money and these bombs, and that he received from New York both the money and the bombs. I have no doubt that this is the fact.

MR. J. REDMOND : Was that proved at the trial?

MR. MATTHEWS : No it was not proved at the trial, but that is what I assert to the House.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR : Breslin is dead.

MR. MATTHEWS : I say the result of my inquiry is that bombs were applied for by Daly in New York and were received by him from Breslin in New York, together with money.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR : Will you lay that information on the Table of the House.

MR. MATTHEWS : Certainly not. I am here, in my capacity as Minister, asked to extend mercy to Daly, and I tell the House of Commons what steps I have taken to ascertain whether the charge made against officials of the Government is well founded or not. These things were laid before the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby from day to day as the case proceeded, and the greatest care was taken to sift every piece of information which came before the Home Office. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby is my political opponent, but I trust I am not so unfair as not to pronounce him, in my opinion, right in the inquiry into the material before him at the time of Daly's conviction. I came to the conclusion that that these matters were fully and satisfactorily established. The hon. Member says that the bombs were bought by and the money given by the police. I say that is untrue. The police never purchased bombs nor gave money, either directly or indirectly. The bombs came from New York. They came from a person about whom I need not give any information ("Oh, oh!" from the Irish benches). Do you suggest that John Breslin was the agent of the Government? (Cries of "No!") Then that is the person from whom they came. He sent them over under the description of "love apples" for purposes which were not proved, but which could only be of one kind. To talk about a plant is a dream and altogether an inaccurate suggestion of Mr. Farndale. Why was he not called at the trial? Because he knew nothing about all these facts. He knew nothing about the bombs or how they came into Daly's possession. He conjectured and drew inferences from facts of which he had no personal knowledge of his own. The hon. Member says, Will you investigate further? No further investigation would throw any light upon the subject. I have been reminded that one agent in the transaction, a gentleman in New York, is dead. Every day makes it more difficult to arrive at any fresh information. All the materials were before the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and have been reviewed by me, and I am perfectly satisfied of their genuineness. I am persuaded that no fresh inquiry is necessary, and that this suggestion of a plant by the police is an absolutely unfounded suggestion. For these reasons, therefore, I must decline to make any further inquiry and to go into this matter over again. I must decline to extend any mercy to Daly upon the suggestion that his conviction was not only wrong, but obtained by infamous means. If there were the slightest foundation for supposing that the agents of the Government, whether the police of England or Ireland had bought these bombs and foisted them off upon Daly, that would be conduct so disgraceful, that not only should Daly not be detained a day longer, but the most ample compensation and apology should be made to him. There is no middle course. There was either absolutely infamous conduct on the part of the police, which I do not believe, or Daly was justly convicted. With regard to Egan it would be extremely injudicious and unwise to give any pledge or to say what may happen across the floor of this House. I have stated that the case against Egan was a different one from that against Daly. But looking to the character of the letters and looking to all the circumstances, I have never been able to doubt that Egan knew that nitro-glycerine was buried in his garden, and therefore he was assisting the preparations for these awful explosions. Egan was therefore an accomplice and participator with Daly in the possession of these explosives, and in the knowledge that they were being accumulated for an unlawful purpose. But I do not think there is against Egan any proof that he participated in the active use of this explosive material, though I cannot doubt that he was cognisant of the kind of use that they were intended for. That is an offence, no doubt, of a lighter kind, and the time may possibly come when it will be possible to reconsider the case of Egan, but that time is not yet. With regard to the other prisoners, the hon. Member has entered into no details—I shall follow his example. It has been my duty, at one time or another, to examine the evidence against all the prisoners, and I have examined it with a mind perfectly unbiased, and I hope as open as possible to any flaw which I could detect in the evidence against the prisoners. But I am bound to tell the hon. Member that I have not found anything unsatisfactory in any one of the six or seven cases, which has induced me to doubt that the men were properly convicted of dynamite offences, and that they were convicted of offences of a very dangerous character, towards which leniency or clemency is in no respect the right policy. I quite disregard the political flavour attempted to be given to the case of Daly. I admit that Daly is not a man of the same character as those who caused the explosions in London or in Glasgow. I can only think of Daly as a fanatic, a dangerous fanatic, who was ready to risk his life for purposes which he appeared to consider important. That is not a man of the same class or character as those who caused the explosion in the railway station in London or the gasworks at Glasgow or Possil Bridge. The one man is far more cultured, far more intelligent, and I dare say, in many departments of private life, is a far superior person. But that the social danger is fully as great as with the commonest and coarsest criminal is so obvious that it is hardly necessary to enforce it by any argument. These dynamite offences work the most widespread and terrible damage to innocent persons in the twinkling of an eye, and the difficulty of detection is always very great. The House must know that many dynamite explosions have completely escaped the efforts of the police to bring the perpetrators of them to justice. It is a class of offence very dangerous in its character and very destructive in its effects, and it would be the very worst policy in these days when the use of explosives is better understood than formerly by evil-disposed persons, to show leniency as if they were not offences of the grossest kind. On these grounds I regret that I cannot give a more favourable answer to the right hon. Gentleman's request. The hon. Gentleman says there is sympathy in Ireland with these men. I deplore the fact that there is considerable sympathy for many of these men—I hope not for all—in Ireland. I regret it. It think it is most misplaced sympathy. If the Irish people knew the facts of this case as fully as I do they would not sympathise. I can only deplore that a certain halo of romance is thrown round some of those offenders, and in the circumstances, perhaps, one cannot wonder at the chivalrous way in which the hon. Member has pleaded their case in this House. While, on the one hand, I can understand that Irishmen are sorry to see any of their countrymen in prison for such offences, it would be wiser and more dignified on their part to acknowledge that offences of this sort can in a civilised State only be dealt with in one way, by very severe punishment which ought not to be excessive, but which must be proportioned to the gravity of the offence. The whole administration of justice would be interfered with if, on the grounds of nationality, we were to interfere with the punishment awarded for such offences.

Mr. Matthews

(8.30.) MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary): The right hon. Gentleman, as he concluded his speech, spoke, as he said, as a Minister of the Crown. It needed some assurance upon his part that he was a Minister of the Crown, or otherwise I should have thought, and many Members of the House would have thought, that the right hon. Gentleman was addressing a packed Irish jury in a Government prosecution in Ireland. (Cheers.) The right hon. Gentleman also made revelations that would become a Crown Prosecutor rather than a Minister of the Crown defending the administration of his Department in this House. I can conceive nothing more mean than the suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman that the bombs found upon John Daly, and which it has been clearly proved were planted upon him without his knowledge, were intended to be thrown into the midst of hon. Members. Daly and his associates were tried in passion, convicted in passion, and they are to be retained in passion by an appeal to the passions of the people of this country, and to the passions of some hon. Members of this House. He made a still further suggestion, which I say is unworthy a gentleman in his position; he made a revelation which should not have been made in this House, or out of it, affecting the guilt—if he be guilty—of one of the prisoners; a matter which we have heard to-night for the first time, and which was not produced upon the trial—it was a kind of special pleading of the right hon. Gentleman. And what is the nature of that revelation? It is that one of the prisoners for whom we pleaded addressed a letter to a man in America asking for bombs and money, and that these bombs and money were sent to him in like manner. Now, the man to whom the application is said to have been made is dead, and the prisoner against whom the accusation is made is politically and civilly dead. The prisoner, therefore, has no opportunity of rebutting the charge, and it is unworthy of a Minister of the Crown to make an accusation of that kind when all possibility of proving, or disproving it is absent. Such conduct was mean; it was contemptible. He got rid of the case made by my hon. Friend the Member for Waterford without replying to it. He did not reply to my hon. Friend with regard to his assertion that the bombs that were found upon John Daly were planted upon him by Government spies and by Government agents, of whom these poor men were the victims. He made no reply to that. The right hon. Gentleman was accused of knowing the man who gave Daly this bomb, and again that part of the statement of my hon. Friend received no reply whatever. It is true the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the enormity of the crime; it is true that he expressed his horror of assassination; it is true that he read out a statement of the Judges. With regard to the enormity of the crime of outrage by the use of dynamite, we all agree with the opinion of that gentleman; but the right hon. Gentleman made no reply to the charge made against the Government by my hon. Friend. The right hon. Gentleman introduced the name of a man named Featherstone, upon whom was found some infernal machine, and he also said that Featherstone was associated in Cork with dynamite. The Government was doing the very same thing as had been done in the case of Daly. It is notorious that James McDermot, when he came from America and visited Ireland, was really in the pay of Dublin Castle; that he came down to Cork, and that he established the conspiracy with which Featherstone was proved to have had some connection; that that conspiracy was founded by some Government agent; so that most of these men are simply victims of Government agents. The right hon. Gentleman also endeavoured to rouse the feeling of this House by alluding to assassination. We will not allow the right hon. Gentleman to excel us in our abhorrence of assassination. We, in common with him, condemn—we have condemned it publicly, we have condemned it upon public platforms in the country, even in our own country—this policy of dynamite, which involves the innocent and the guilty alike in common slaughter. I would point out, with regard to the dynamite demonstrations in London, and with regard to those deeds for which some of them have been found guilty, that there was no assassination, and that there was no life lost. I may be told that these men were assassins at heart ; I may be told that these men, handling a dangerous compound such as dynamite, had the intention of carrying out assassination. I say they must, having regard to the character of the explosive, have taken special precautions not to take life. I believe that the men who were engaged in the explosions must have used the dynamite in such a manner that it was more dangerous to themselves than to those amongst whom the explosions took place. The right hon. Gentleman concluded his speech with the entirely unnecessary task of showing the great enormity of the crime of causing such explosions ; his whole speech was entirely unnecessary. There is not one of us who has not fixed ideas with regard to the enormity of the crime ; but I hold that his speech is no reply to the hon. Member for Waterford. My hon. Friend put his case upon three grounds—first, that the offence was a political one, if they were guilty ; secondly, that their convictions were wrongfully procured ; and, thirdly, that their treatment was of a very exceptional character. With regard to the first, the right hon. Gentleman has admitted that the charge was of a political character ; he has admitted it for the first time to-night. I have for years drawn attention to the manner of treatment of these prisoners, and of the especial severity that the officers, for some reason or other—I will not call it a pretext—exercise towards them ; but never, during the whole course of the discussion, could I get the right hon. Gentleman to admit that the crime was in any way of a political character. He maintained at all times that it was a crime, but the right hon. Gentleman has now stated what he never before admitted, that it was a political offence. I think the right hon. Gentleman said that “it is a political offence, but it is none the less a crime.” I reply, it may be a crime, but it is none the less a political offence, and being political offenders they would receive special treatment, and be more leniently dealt with in every other country in the world except this country when dealing with Irish offenders. I may point out that in France, after the war of 1870, the Communists of Paris, who all but burned their city to the ground, had a malicious purpose, but they also had a political purpose ; these men and women were transported across the sea for their offences ; but after a few years, when political passions had subsided, these men, women, and children were every one emancipated, and allowed to return to their homes and kindred, and many of them have, since that time, become law-abiding citizens of their country, some of them filling positions no less honourable than those filled by right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Front Bench. Political offenders have been treated all the world over in a different manner to other offenders. Offences prompted by self-interest and self-aggrandisement have always been treated in a different manner to offences of a political character. I think I would be right in saying that if the Emperor of Russia could be sure that if he emancipated every Nihilist confined in Siberia, the agitation, of which these men and women formed a part, would cease, he would be glad to empty the prisons of Siberia ; if he thought there would be an end to the agitation he would not hold these men and women in prison for the mere vindictive purpose of punishing them for their political offences. Every country to which I turn my eyes over Europe treats its political offenders in a different manner to other offenders ; England alone has been slow to emancipate those who offend against her politically. Yet, even though England has been slow to extend pardon to her political offenders, she has from time to time allowed the feeling against her political offenders to drop. I doubt whether at the present moment there is a worse feeling entertained towards the men in Chatham and Portland prisons than a former generation entertained towards the men of 1848 and 1867. The men of 1848 were some of them sentenced to be hanged; others were sent away into penal servitude, as also were the men of 1867; yet in the course of time, when the political events with which these men were connected had ceased to have any force, then England slowly relented, and gave the pardon to these political offenders which every civilized country in the world gave to men in the same position. The right hon. Gentleman for the first time in the course of this discussion admitted that the men for whom we are pleading here to-night committed offences that were tinged with a political character. I shall not dwell upon the wrongful manner in which their convictions were procured. My hon. Friend the Member for Waterford has dwelt upon the subject in a manner that I could not hope to emulate; he has described the position of the case with an ability and a forensic eloquence which I could not hope to arrive at. But he also made an appeal that the men whose cases we bring before the House to-night are entitled to have their cases investigated, and I will go further, and say that they are entitled to a release, by reason of the special treatment to which they have been subjected for the past eight or nine years. My hon. Friend spoke only of the manner in which they had been treated in Portland prison; but they were in other prisons before arriving at Portland. John Daly and others had been in Chatham, where they were specially sent in order that they might be specially punished, and they were specially punished because they were political offenders. There is scarcely any need to dwell upon the political character of their offences, except to show that it is not we alone who regarded them as political offenders, but the very men who were employed to inflict punishment upon them. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the Report of the Visiting Committee, which was put into the hands of hon Members of this House, and for which I applied, and also the hon. Member for West Limerick, whose efforts on behalf of these men have been of a very patriotic character. This investigation into the treatment of these men was conducted by persons who were connected with the prison service itself. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but it is a fact that these men were connected with the prison service, and the evidence taken by the Committee of visiting gentlemen was the evidence of those who were accused of having maltreated these men (hear, hear); and some of the evidence goes to show that they were especially badly treated. Henry J. Wilson says that the bitter hatred of the average Chatham officer towards political prisoners makes itself apparent in a thousand ways; in fact, the men were hounded down as Fenians, and as Fenians treated in an exceptional manner. Another of the prisoners is Egan, whose case has been singled out for exceptional treatment on an early occasion—Egan, who by the statement of the right hon. Gentleman to-night, is admitted to be suffering wrongfully, the man who is innocent of the charge. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but he should recollect it had been stated that if Egan's case was investigated he might be released at an early day. The unfortunate position of these men is that right hon. Gentlemen upon both sides of the House are responsible for the injustice done. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was in office when they were convicted; was cognisant of everything, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury was their prosecutor, and we all know that right hon. Gentleman on the other side of the House carried out their hereditary policy when dealing with political offenders in Ireland. They are all alike, and they conceive it to be a duty to themselves, instead of honestly admitting their error, to back up their error rather than release these men. What does Egan say, whose case has been specially singled out? He says that the officers employed would give him pieces of newspaper so as to get him punished. They have been specially singled out for specially bad treatment by the prison officials, and it is on that account, and I hold it is the strongest claim, that the hon. Member for Waterford asked for an investigation into their cases—an investigation not like the last, by a Committee composed of prison officials. Some of those gentlemen had investigated the case before, and when another investigation was started, the very men we accused were put upon the Committee to sit in judgment upon themselves, so that nothing could have been more unfair. It is not that kind of an inquiry that we want, for if there is to be an inquiry into the charge we hope that neither the prosecutor nor the Home Secretary will form portions of that Committee. I have visited these men. I have seen them year after year and month after month fading away before my eyes, the strong and hearty young men that I knew at home becoming blanched with a premature old age. I have seen the strong, hearty This demand for details has a very men becoming decrepit and weak before my eyes, week after week and month after month, by these petty and shameful persecutions of petty officials who are engaged in carrying out the law in their regard. Will the House believe that these men, when they take their exercise in a hot sun in the summer time, are compelled to walk fast, while in the winter season, when it is cold, when they want to walk to circulate the blood, they are compelled to walk slowly. These statements have been proved, and can be found in the pages of this Report. In my experience of prisons, and my observation of the prisoners, I have seen men with the convict jackets on them allowed to stand at ease. Mr. Clayton, the Governor of Chatham prison, reprimanded the warders of Chatham prison for allowing these men to stand at ease. Let me give another instance of cruelty. Wilson complained to the doctor when he saw him, of being ill, and he was not allowed to see him (the doctor), when he requested to see him. Wilson requested to see the doctor. He was not allowed out on that and other occasions; but he became so ill that at last, in order to save his life, they allowed him to see the doctor, and then he complained to the doctor that he was not allowed to see him when he required, and of course he was reported for having made such a statement; and, will the House believe it? Wilson got three days' bread and water for having complained to the doctor that he was not allowed to see him when he required. And when he then complained to the director of this he said—"The less complaints you make the better." The unfortunate prisoners who are thus persecuted by the warders have no friend but one, and that one the Protestant Chaplain of Chatham. The one kind word we find within the pages of that book that was spoken about these men was uttered by the Protestant Chaplain, and he said to the Visiting Committee—"They are well-conducted men, and were treated with unnecessary violence." It is not unnecessary rigour, it is not unnecessary treatment, but this Christian Minister says they were treated with unnecessary violence. And the other Christian Minister, of a Christian Government, stands up here and has nothing to do but to make accusations against men who are naturally and civilly dead, and make suggestions which are more worthy of a public prosecutor than of a respectable Minister of the Crown. It was stated by my hon. Friend, the Member for Waterford, that Daly was known to Members of this House. I say I am not ashamed to affirm in this House that Daly was an acquaintance of mine, and a friend of mine for many years. We grew up boys together, and a more honourable young man I would never wish to meet than the man whose case we are investigating here to-night; and I assert, from my knowledge of him, that he would be incapable of committing the crime for which he was charged and convicted. On the contrary, I know of my own knowledge that he was as strongly opposed to that policy as I was myself, and that is saying enough, because without having been called upon to do so, I have publicly denounced the policy of dynamite, and I never denounced it more strongly than John Daly would have done himself. It is true that John Daly was an extreme Nationalist, but if he was, he was an honourable man. He sought to separate the country by force of arms, but he would not stoop to any dis honourable act, even to win the independence of his country—a cause which was most dear to his heart. From a close acquaintance with these men for years, I have made myself acquainted with the special treatment to which they have been subjected, and I hold that these being men of intelligence, of education, and of some culture, have suffered more for the past eight or ten years than common criminals could suffer in three lifetimes; that if you want vengeance you have had it in abundance; that your duty is to give these men their liberty, by reason of the fact that they have been excessively and exceptionally badly treated. Might I appeal to the Government? We have been told in the course of this discussion upon the reply to the most gracious Speech from the Throne, that this Session of Parliament is to be the last Session of the Parliament. The Government are about to appeal, sooner or later this year, to the country, and they will most likely appeal upon the success of their Irish policy. They have brought into this House, and passed into law, remedial measures for Ireland of such a character as will enable them to boast of their good intentions towards the people of Ireland; whether their measures have been sufficient or inadequate for the purpose it is not my purpose, nor am I called upon now to say. It is enough for me to admit that they will go with what they consider a strong hand to the country, and they will point to the remedial measures for Ireland. Would it be too much to ask them to make their Irish policy more perfect—to make it more complete by the release of these men for whom we plead to-night, rather than keep them in prison; not because justice demands it, but merely for the purpose of indulging in the vindictive spirit which is unworthy of an enlightened nation.

(9.20.) MR WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork County, N.E.): This is a subject on which there is no difference of opinion among Irish Nationalists. I appeal to the men on all sides of the House to pay some attention—to pay, I should say, respectful attention—to the unanimous and deeply-rooted feeling on this question among the whole people of Ireland. But really it is not a matter of contentious debate about this or that; it is a question of humanity and of the broad national policy. The facts in the Daly and Egan case stand further apart from the rest, and I do not propose to weary the House by going again over the ground traversed by hon. Members, but I would respectfully submit to any dispassionate man that it is almost impossible to examine the evidence and the statement of the Chief Constable, Mr. Farndale, without to say the very least, a feeling of uneasiness as to the conviction of John Daly, and without a feeling that everything has not been done to clear up the story—that shocking statement which is made deliberately by one of the chief officers of the police. If that story of these bombs having been planted on John Daly by an agent of the police was invented by Mr. Farndale, he ought long ago to have been dismissed and punished. On the other hand, if that story is well founded—I go further, and say if there is a colour of suspicion that would account for the impression which was, and which remains, upon Mr. Farndale's mind—then I say better ten thousand times that John Daly, even if guilty, should go free than that the public mind should rest under the horrible suspicion that his conviction was brought about by such means as this. The moral of this question is—and I must say the case has not been yet dealt with—the question is, who was the person who gave these bombs to Daly, and brought him to Liverpool for the purpose of receiving them? Was he a police agent? The Government know who he was. I venture to say that until we have the whole story out, who this man was, as to how he slipped through the fingers of the police, and as to where he is now, and as to how it happened that the police came to be at that particular spot in readiness at the very moment when Daly had the parcel in his possession—I venture to say you will never satisfy the public mind that Mr. Farndale was under a mere delusion when he solemnly made this shocking statement, that the whole thing was a contrivance of the police for the purpose of getting into their toils a man whom, no doubt, they had reason to suspect had been engaged in treasonable practices of another sort. It seems to me that the weakness of the Home Secretary's investigation, which no doubt was a bona fide one, was this: Did his investigation extend to the Irish police? because it is the Irish police, not the English police, that are implicated by Mr. Farndale's statement. I agree at once, and I am sure that no Home Secretary would be capable of employing an agent provocateur of this character; but it is notorious that subordinates of his in Ireland are capable of doing such things. I should be very sorry indeed to take up needlessly a state of things that I hope has passed away or ever; but I am sorry to say that I have only too many materials for remembering this subject. I shall only mention one fact. It is notorious that the man who was at the head of the Irish Constabulary Detective Department at that time was a man of the most infamous character. It is notorious that this man, the head of the Detective Department in Ireland in these very years, organised at least more than one of those "plants," so to say, of precisely the same character as Mr. Farndale has mentioned in the case of Daly. He employed one man—Noonan, I believe, was his name—as an agent of the police, and from that man's lips I took down the confession that the head of the detective force in Ireland employed him to get up a bogus plot against the life of one of the Irish Judges, in which he was to endeavour to implicate, if possible, a Member of this House, the hon. Member for South Tipperary, who is after speaking this moment. That is not a single case. We all unhappily remember the case of James Macdermott. We know beyond all question that this man Macdermott was visiting Mr. Jenkinson in Dublin Castle at the very time that he was organising a dynamite conspiracy in Cork. We know that Macdermott escaped, as this man escaped from Liverpool, and his unfortunate victims found their way to penal servitude. I remember well the case of Mr. P. L. Fitzgerald, of Cork, who was acquitted by a Crimes Act jury, and the jury were so shocked by the methods employed in that case that they actually added a rider to their verdict condemning the methods that had been taken to implicate Mr. Fitzgerald in a murder conspiracy. These things it is most painful to us to recall, but they are matters that are notorious in Ireland, unhappily. And when we know that Mr. Farndale's statement, the statement of an influential police officer in England, corresponds exactly with our own experience of what happened in similar cases in Ireland; and when we know, as I must say, like the hon. Member who has just spoken, as I do know from my own knowledge, that John Daly was a man of integrity, a man of singular ability, a man who was an honest and consistent opponent of Parliamentary agitation, but who had undoubtedly an honest abhorrence of crime on his character, and who had, I may say, the most chivalrous ideas of fighting England in the open — when the Irish people have all these facts before them, what can they conclude in this case, except that this unfortunate fellow, who was no doubt a Fenian, who was proud to be a Fenian, was not convicted as a dynamitard, but for all we know, and certainly until we have heard much more about it, he was the victim of some nefarious proceeding on the part of some police officer. I do hope the hour has at last arrived for reconsidering Egan's case after eight years of frightful torture in an English prison. He was convicted of a crime of which he is as innocent as any man in this House. At one time he was a believer in physical force as the only method for the redress of Irish grievances. Thousands and tens of thousands of men are walking free in Ireland to-day who were participants in a crime for which I am not ashamed to confess myself on a very humble scale a participant. Sir, there is here a much broader question than whether there has been a possible miscarriage of justice in two or three cases. I do not deny that in a number of those cases the prisoners were rightly convicted, and of a dreadful crime; and I think there can be no doubt either that if there was any substantial danger of the renewal of this system of dynamite conspiracies, it would be unreasonable and unjust to extend mistaken leniency to men capable of making war with such weapons. But all the world knows the circumstances under which these dynamite conspiracies originated—the desperation and hopelessness of other remedies. All the world knows that they are passed away and gone as utterly as the wrongs of the terrible penal laws. We have been reminded by the Home Secretary to-night of some circumstances to the contrary. We have found in some countries a lunatic who will resort to dynamite or something of that sort for the purpose of public or of private vengeance. But that is a wholly different thing. The police may be thoroughly trusted to deal with lunacy of that sort, and there is not the slightest hope of any section of the Irish people sympathising with them. It is inevitable and natural that the Irish people should remember that the motives of these men were not selfish. Their offences were committed at a time of desperation and bitterness, and although the explosions they organised were most reckless and criminal, they manifestly were not planned with any intention of destroying human life, but, on the contrary, were intended to create as much alarm as possible without destroying human life. Compared with the frightful bloodshed and blowing up of public buildings under the Commune in Paris, what are the offences of these men? And yet the men convicted under the Commune have been amnestied, and the effect has been to extinguish all danger of anything like revolutionary feeling. I do not mean to extenuate the offences that were committed, they were horrible offences, but I do say the public danger is completely passed, and these men have expiated their offences by many long years of penal servitude. A feeling of trust is growing up between the two countries, and its continuance depends upon the readiness to grant frank amnesty for all things past, without measuring too nicely the feeling whether enough has been done to satisfy public justice. The Irish people do not want to make political capital out of this matter, they desire to see these unfortunate men restored to liberty while life remains in them at all, and would respectfully impress upon the Home Secretary, and upon men on both sides of the House, that in yielding to the earnest desire of the Irish people, they will be doing more than anything else to remove unpleasant memories, and to knit the two nations together, and to make these wretched crimes impossible for the future.

(9.45). MR. EDMUND LEAMY (South Sligo): The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary said he acknowledged the sympathy existing in Ireland with Daly and with his fellow prisoners, and he said he deplored that feeling. If, during the short time the right hon. Gentleman represented an Irish constituency, he had learned anything at all he would be prepared to know that the speech he has delivered to-night has intensified the feeling of sympathy with this man. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that if the Irish people knew as much as he does about these men they would not have the same feelings they now have. Some of the Irish people respected and honoured them. It is not so long ago since public feeling became sympathetically aroused in England on behalf of a woman convicted of husband-poisoning. She had a perfectly fair trial and was sentenced to death. Why was she not executed? If properly tried and convicted the Home Secretary had no right to yield to public clamour and mitigate that sentence merely to meet the public demands and the sympathy of the man in the street. The Irish prisoners were arrested in a time of panic and of fear, hostile to anything done by Irishmen against England. No doubt, though the jury that tried them were desirous of doing justice, they must have gone into the box with strong feeling against the dynamitards, so that the prisoners had to face a tribunal that was insensibly prejudiced against them. The next point is that the Chief Constable at Birmingham, and some of his subordinates declared that these bombs were put upon John Daly by some of the agents of the Irish police. Does the right hon. Gentleman believe that the Chief Constable at Birmingham, Mr. Farndale, made that statement believing it to be untrue; does he know that Mr. Farndale is still the Chief Constable in Birmingham, enjoying the confidence of the people there? Sir, that circumstance goes far to explain he feelings of the Irish people. The right hon. Gentleman says there is good ground for re-considering the case of Egan, but how long is it to be before he case is re-considered? The right hon. Gentleman refused to go into the prison treatment of these men, but it is admitted that they were put in special cells where they were confined 16 hours per day deprived even of the light coming from heaven—shut out from the light of the sun—and I would ask whether it is right in this 19th century that men should be confined in a cell from which God's light is excluded. Then there is another matter. My hon. Friend the Member for Waterford invited the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that Daly on three occasions was poisoned and actually brought to the door of death. I want to ask any hon. Gentleman whether he does not think that some consideration should be shown to Daly on that account. This is torture, and some compensation should be made; we suggest that his sentence of penal servitude should be shortened. It has been over and over again declared by Ministers from these Benches that it was only by outrage that the Irish people obtained any recognition of their rights, and if Irishmen join in these outrages they have a fine defence in the speeches of many Ministers in this House and elsewhere. We are told to bury the hatchet, to abandon old memories, but I should like to see some reciprocity; I should like to see you begin. You may sneer at the sympathy of the Irish people for these men. You do not understand the Irish people. We are a race distinct and apart from you. Though you have robbed us of the outward show of our nationhood, we are a distinct nation; and I tell you that if you sneer at the sympathies of our people, or stand up in your lofty superior way, as the right hon. Gentleman has done to-night, to despise the sympathy they extend to their countrymen, who have risked and suffered for them, who have laid down their lives, even though the project in which they have been engaged may have been mad and insensate projects, to better their country, I tell you you are going a bad way to secure that peace and harmony between this country and Ireland which you profess to desire.

<sup>*(10.2.)</sup> MR. C. DARLING (Deptford): Mr. Speaker, Sir, if it were possible to use an argument utterly maladroit and unfit to gain the sympathy of this House, I should say that it would be the use of such an argument as that which has been used by the hon. Member who has just sat down. To say that because the Irish are a separate race, with different views of treason, with different views of felony, with different views of right and wrong—[Cries of "No!"]—Yes—to say that when they commit a crime they should not be punished for it, when if it were committed by an Englishman he would be punished for it, is to use an argument which the English people do not understand. But there was another argument—the argument that we are bound to release people who have been guilty of outrage, of the making of bombs, of the firing of bombs, because years ago in England there were men who sympathised with Orsini; and that there were, or are still, in London, men who carry on the manufacture of bombs. I cannot understand or sympathise with that argument for a moment. That people sympathised with Orsini or others who they thought were oppressed. I can understand, and they got as much sympathy as they deserved. There were people in England who thought that the Emperor of the French, who certainly had not treated them badly, ought to have done something more for them; and those people, when they found an attack made by an Italian on the Emperor of the French, may have sympathised and gone on sympathising with men like Orsini. I do not know who they were. It certainly was not me, because I have no personal recollections of the doings of Orsini. I have only read of them. But if there were people who sympathised with him and his attempt, can it be assumed that because they did so we should sympathise with people who have done as bad as and worse than Orsini did. Now I should imagine that if there were anything at all in this appeal, which is made by hon. Members from Ireland, or by the hon. Member who had just sat down and who suggested that this was the best way to unite the people of England and Ireland, then there should have been more than one member of the Front Opposition Bench present to hear it. Where are those who, if this Government left office to-morrow, would come in and seek the release of these men. They are not here. (Cheers.) They take apparently the same view as Her Majesty's ministers, but they do not quite so boldly express it on this occasion. Yet they have done so. It has been said to-night that some of these men have undoubtedly been guilty; yet these men are to be released equally with the others—men who have been admittedly guilty of the worst of outrages—the use of dynamite in the prosecution of treasonable practices. It was said that they had been careful not to hurt any people—only buildings. I do not know that they were so careful; but whether they were or not, they have been convicted under a somewhat weak-minded Act of treasonable practices instead of treason. If they had been convicted of treason we should not have been subjected to the Debate to-night and that one of last year—

An hon. MEMBER : Much more merciful.

MR. DARLING : Well then I regret that course has not been adopted, if it would have been more merciful. It is said these men have been in prison for nine years. Well, many men in England, and Ireland too, have been imprisoned for nine, and for nine and twenty, years. Are they to be released? You cannot commit a worse offence I should imagine than treason.

An hon. MEMBER : Yes.

MR. DARLING : Well, not a worse offence than treason aided by dynamite. Some hon. Members seem to think that treason is a somewhat venial offence. To my mind it is the worst of offences, and the person who is guilty of it deserves the severest punishment. These people have been convicted of acts which amount to treason, and treason carried into effect by the most brutal and the most inhuman of methods. These people have been in gaol eight or nine years, and we are told that for them eight or nine years is sufficient, and more than sufficient.

Mr. C. Darling

Now, if we are to agree to that we must at the same time agree that eight or nine years is sufficient, or more than sufficient, for every conceivable offence. We ought, therefore, not only to let out these prisoners, but everybody who has served eight or nine years' penal servitude, because no one can be in prison at this moment for a worse offence than that of which those men were convicted, that is presuming them to be guilty. I cannot see, therefore, that there is any logical reason for letting those people out more than for letting out any other malefactors. I am told, however, that these men had no sordid motive or object; that they had a political object. It may be so; but it has long been conceded that treason is the highest crime known to the law. It was also said that we should let them out because it would be personally gratifying to certain persons. All I can say is that we should not let them out upon that score. I can well understand the solicitude of hon. Members of both the Irish Parties opposite. I can well imagine that a number of votes depend on the due and warm advocacy of the case of these prisoners, and full justice has been done to it. Everybody knows that they will not be released; but the speeches have been made, and their friends will be grateful and will show it in the proper way. The hon. Member said—suppose Egan, Larrigan, and O'Brien had escaped to America—happily they had not the chance of doing so—and we had asked the Americans to hand them back as guilty of murder, would the Americans have done it? Who knows? Perhaps they would. The hon. Member said they would not. Well, it might have depended on the weight of the Irish vote in the Presidential elections. It would not have depended on the abstract question of whether those men were guilty of murder. It would have been decided with a view to electioneering prospects and nothing else. At all events, I think it would. The hon. Member, who knows America better perhaps than I do, perhaps thinks the same thing, but does not like to say it. There is a distinction drawn between the case of some of the prisoners and that of others. It is said that Whitehead, Gallagher, and others were not so guilty as the rest, and should be released, and that Daly and Egan were improperly convicted and should be released. But this House has already considered the question. Those who have taken the trouble to read the evidence in the case of Daly have been good enough to give us on former occasions their opinions as to the guilt or innocence of this man Daly, who, we are now assured, is an innocent man. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) was present when this question was raised last year, and he then gave it as his opinion that Daly was guilty. He had looked through all the evidence. He gave the House the benefit of his opinion upon it, and he pointed out that all this story on which we are asked to believe that Daly was convicted by error was never alleged by Daly himself, but apparently was invented for him by someone of more inventive imagination than himself. About that story of an agent provocateur the right hon. Member for Derby used these words—

"But that is not all. Ever since that time, although he has had every opportunity of making that statement, he has never done so. The statement referred, not to an agent provocateur, but to an informer. It showed that he suspected there was an informer who had told the Government what sort of transactions he was engaged in."

Next comes the commonest of old excuses. Long before I had the honour of a seat in this House I was familiar with the excuses of prisoners at the bar who were found in possession of compromising articles. They invariably said that they had been given to them by a friend, who asked them to take care of them for a short time. I have on their behalf alleged that reason, sometimes with success and sometimes without it, but I never could hope to allege it with success to an audience half so intelligent as hon. Gentlemen on the Benches opposite. But besides the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, the hon. and learned Member for Haddingtonshire (Mr. Haldane) spoke last year in this debate. He spoke as a friend. He said he hoped that Government would release some of these prisoners, and the reason he hoped they would release more than one of these prisoners was that they were men highly regarded in Fenian circles who longed for their return. The hon. and learned Member for Haddingtonshire said—

"I think it is much to be regretted that much of the debate has been wide of the amendment which simply recommends a policy of clemency. Reasons have been urged which have gone for the most part to the righteousness of the conviction. On that part of the case I do not entertain much doubt. I listened carefully to the arguments advanced with a view to impugn the finding of the jury in the case of Daly and Egan, and it seemed to me that the answer of the Home Secretary was conclusive."

Now we have the same arguments again. The Home Secretary has satisfied the hon. and learned Member for Haddingtonshire that Daly is guilty. We are asked again to believe that Daly is the victim of some nefarious plot on the part of the police. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby does not believe it. The hon. and learned Member for Haddingtonshire does not believe it. I do not know who does believe it. Daly does not believe it. Daly has never said it. Never. He has been interviewed more than once. But is it ground for releasing him that he is what he has never said he is? At the best these men are traitors and deserve a traitor's fate. It is said that they have had enough, too much, when, after having been engaged in a plot to blow up and ruin not only the buildings, but perhaps also the people of this country, they have been in prison for nine years. There are persons who have been convicted of perjury, or some assault, or embezzlement, and sent to penal servitude, and all these people are to remain in the same gaol from which these men are to be liberated because in addition to being dynamitards, and liable to be prosecuted for having dynamite in their possession and dealing with it, they are traitors, and because they are entitled to claim a peculiar clemency from the nation. Has a case been made out? I do not think so any more than the Front Opposition Bench think so. At all events, a claim is advanced on grounds which make it impossible to grant it. It is advanced with regard to the worst of them. Those who have most carefully investigated the case including the present and the last Home Secretaries, and the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Haldane) have come to the conclusion that there was no miscarriage of justice, and that the verdicts of the jury were right. By those verdicts we must, I imagine, stand. This House cannot reverse them. It cannot reverse them in deference to the opinion that they were wrong, nor I imagine can it reverse them simply on the ground of clemency, nor because the hon. Member for Cork said there was no danger, as dynamite outrages have ceased. I see in that an additional reason for keeping them in. If you are wise, detain them where they are while dynamite outrages do not go on.

10.21. MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) : The hon. and learned Member for Deptford has stated that this Motion has been brought forward on this side in order to catch votes. If so, I wonder for what purpose his speech was made. He says we brought forward this Motion knowing it was hopeless, and that it was certain to be refused. If our Motion was brought forward with the object of gaining votes, at any rate, in its essence, our attitude is more respectable in suing for mercy and clemency for those men than is his speech, which was an unnecessary speech, refusal having already been given, and a speech only made for the purpose of attracting the votes of certain Conservatives in his own Constituency. The speech to which we have just listened almost makes a man understand a dynamitard. If there were anything calculated to drive a man into rebellion it is the notion that he was being ruled by 670 gentlemen like the hon. Member for Deptford. And when I reflect that it is by votes and recommendations and decisions of a number of gentlemen like the Member for Deptford that our country is ruled, and that speeches like his will be telegraphed to America, insulting, as they do, our nation in that country, and, not only our nation, but the President and Senate and Congress of the United States and its Ambassadors, I really wonder that you have not further crops of incendiaries in that Republic. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Deptford, fortunately for himself, was never Member for Dungarvan. He has no past to apologise for. I think I do remember a speech made for amnesty by the Member for Dungarvan. When we are asked here to explain how it is that there are masses of men in Ireland who sympathise with some of these men who are in prison, we can remember the great defence which was made for poor O'Donovan Rossa on the hustings of the old fishing village when it was declared that O'Donovan Rossa and Thomas Clarkson embodied the passion for liberty of the Irish race. I attribute the courtesy exhibited by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to an unconscious cerebration or some political transfusion which enabled him while still Home Secretary of this great Empire to remember the days when he addressed the humble fishermen at Dungarvan. The Home Secretary has made a speech which in its tone and temper differed widely from the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. But I am bound to say that I think it was lacking in two or three points. Of course we draw a wide distinction so far as our own view is concerned between the cases which have been brought forward and the cases of men as to whose trial no question has been raised ; and it must necessarily be admitted that their position stands on a different footing from that of others. But the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has stated that as regards Daly he had himself seen the Chief Constable of Birmingham. But he did not say anything on a point as to which I think we are entitled to an answer. If he expects to convince us, I ask him if he convinced the Chief Constable of Birmingham, and if he did not succeed, and he did not pretend that he did, in driving out of the mind of Mr. Farndale the haunting suspicion which lurked therein, what hope have you of driving out of our minds the notion that there was some unfair play ? I imagine the right hon. Gentleman having his conference with the Chief Constable and saying to him : "I will now lay before you all the documents in my possession in the Home Office, and having them before you I will ask you to withdraw and retract this unfortunate document you have sent." But the right hon. Gentleman with all the information at his disposal did not succeed in vacating Mr. Farndale's mind of the remarkable impressions which existed there, and so far as the Irish people are concerned, and I say so far as the English people are concerned, all we know is that the chief officer of the Birmingham police, charged with the duty of tracking down offenders has stated that the whole of this business so far as Daly was concerned was, and never could be anything but a plant and a trick. But the Home Secretary did one thing to-night which I conceive to be unfair. We know the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) conducted these prosecutions. We know further more his high character in this House and the fairness with which he has always addressed himself to this question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury did not state to the jury anything in connection with Daly and Breslin about dynamite shells being thrown from the gallery of this House. After there has been eight years' expiation of their offences, the Home Secretary draws out of his pocket a document, saying, "I have here a letter from Daly to Breslin with these terrible suggestions." If the right hon. Gentleman was in possession of that document, why did not the right hon. Member for Bury present it to the jury at the trial? Where did this letter come from? We have heard of the letters of a gentleman named Pigott, and when eight years afterwards a document of this kind is relied upon in this House, I say it must be tainted at the source, and the mere fact that it was not used by a gentleman like the right hon. Member for Bury in his grave duties as prosecutor in a grave case like this damns that document in the judgment of every honest man. We are entitled to say that the case against Daly is an extremely weak one, if the right hon. Gentleman is driven to fall back on a document not produced at the trial, and containing allegations so crushing as are now suggested. If it is in the handwriting of Daly, surely it would have been easy to have proved it. I think it was unfair and regrettable, rather, I think, due to a slip, that the Home Secretary trotted out the document before us to-night, for he has used it in regard to a man whose mouth is closed and his hands bound; and, under these circumstances, some Member of the Government should take the opportunity of clearing the letter away, or explaining why it was not used before. I read a letter in the Times the other day, in which an eminent English lawyer, after complimenting the right hon. Member for Bury on the conduct of the trials, said that whatever question existed in his mind with regard to Daly, there would be none with regard to Egan. John Daly must be a man of more than common mould, who, after all the tortures he underwent, the horrible dress, and the cheerless and inhospitable character of the place in which they were, when believing himself dying from doses of poison, had no thought but of his fellow-prisoner; all he wanted was to secure the liberation and redress of his fellow-prisoner. Two or three years ago the Report of the Prison Visitors was placed before the House, and in that were Daly's statements, reading which any man must have some feeling of doubt in regard to the case. Believing he was dying, he asked to be allowed to see Egan to ask his forgiveness for the great wrong he had done him; to say that he had no more share in his confidence than a child unborn, and never knew his political opinions. And then he gave further reasons to show the innocence of Egan. I think that even British justice might take facts of that kind into its ken; and that when a large body of Irish opinion comes to the House of Commons with a plea for these men, it should be met in a better spirit than was shown by the hon. Gentleman to-night. The right hon. Gentleman says he sees some chance of perhaps at some future time doing something in regard to the case. I ask the right hon. Member for Bury whether he, from his great forensic position, and as one of the most confidential supporters of the Government, does not think that now, after eight years of terrible slavery, something might not be done, at any rate, as regards Egan's case. With regard to him, the one you call the principal offender says, that he had no share or part in his offences. After these eight years it would not be unbecoming to the right hon. Member for Bury if he could see his way to intervene—aye, even to intercede, and do something to open still more the mind of the Home Secretary. I fully sympathise with the hon. Member for Waterford in regard to bringing forward anything in respect to prison treatment. We were to a certain extent enjoying the hospitality of the Home Secretary when we saw these men in their cells, and it would not be becoming in the hon. Member for Waterford or myself to say anything as to what we heard or saw of the prison treatment, but I may say that I think the entire treatment of prisoners of this class is not worthy of a great country. What advantage have you in treating your worst enemies, politically speaking, in the same way as you treat burglars and thieves? John Mitchell was convicted of treason felony and sentenced to the same term as Egan, in 1848, and it will be remembered that complaint was made that when he was going out to Bermuda on a man-of-war he messed with the officers, but a minute was sent out by the Government approving of his treatment. Is not the year 1892 more advanced in charity and civilization, even British civilization, than the year 1848? Yet in 1848, when this Act was brand new, passed in a panic, you allowed the Mitchells, the Martins, and others to be treated as gentlemen, and to sit side by side with officers holding Her Majesty's commission. When the First Lord of the Treasury was Chief Secretary for Ireland he had to give way on the question of prison treatment, and allow prisoners of a certain class to retain their own dress. Many of these men are being driven insane. This Blue Book deals with the case of the man Flanagan, and the report must make it obvious to every man that he was at that moment almost a lunatic. What have you done since that to relieve his distress? You have kept him quarrying and picking oakum. It is the duty of the officials to prevent malingering, but in such a case as this there should be presented year after year doctors' reports on the condition of the men. The report was made in March, 1890, and evidently the investigation took place in 1889; the kind of incoherent replies he gave to the visitors will be found on page 7. Several times he says :

"I have power to show great signs and wonders in the earth by shutting up the organs of my body."

I have called attention to this case for two or three years, but, as far as I can make out Flanagan is undergoing exactly the same treatment as he was then. We are entitled to say that the offences most of these men have committed have been due to a desire to carry out political changes by misconceived means; and you cannot be expected to look at their offences in the same way that we do; but we are entitled to say that, if they have been sentenced to penal servitude, they are not sentenced to be poisoned, or to insanity. We are entitled to ask that doctors' reports shall be made annually with regard to these men, who are more liable to harsh treatment than any others in Her Majesty's prisons. You may say this is an exceptional course. Exactly; these are exceptional cases. We are entitled to have reports during the time they are in custody, be that time long or short, and the House may expect to hear of them again and again. It was only the other day I received a statutory declaration from a man who was in constant political association with Daly up to the year of his arrest, and that states that Daly was constantly protesting his horror of the dynamite and similar movements. Where there is conflicting testimony I prefer to believe my own countrymen, the testimony of Daly's friends to that of his enemies, and we shall, in and out of season, support any movement to alleviate his lot, and to secure his speedy release from prison.

*(10.55.) SIR JOSEPH MCKENNA (Monaghan, S.): We are all familiar with the defences usually set up by the Home Secretary for the time being, when an allegation of a miscarriage of justice is made in this House. I shall refer to one case only. When that of Kilmartin, who was subsequently liberated, was originally raised in the time of a predecessor of the right hon. Gentleman, I ventured to give my firm opinion that he was innocent of the crime with which he was charged, and of which he had been found guilty. The case was nearly on all fours with that of Egan. It was shortly this : a man, who was dying in the United States, told the priest who attended him on the occasion that there was a man in prison named Kilmartin convicted of the attempt to murder a man in the West of Ireland, but that it was he, and not Kilmartin, who made the attempt, and that Kilmartin was innocent. The only difference in the two cases was that Daly, when he exonerated Egan, only believed himself to be dying ; whilst in Kilmartin's case the man who confessed did actually die. The priest to whom the statement was made by the dying man, not under the seal of the confessional, communicated with the friends of Kilmartin, and the matter was brought to the notice of the Home Secretary ; but it was not until the debate became personal that further inquiry was granted into the matter. It then reached the right hon. Gentleman's sensorium that it was a real miscarriage of justice. With regard to Daly, I know a great deal ; I also know a great deal of the opinions of the late Isaac Butt about him. They were great friends, but Butt was incensed in a certain way against Daly, whom, however, he believed to be as high-minded a man as he ever knew. Mr. Butt, no doubt, further said that Daly would, in one sense, be a curse if he joined the party, and he was glad that he had not joined us. This question involved in the cases of Daly and Egan should be treated in a different spirit to that shown by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. We know that special cases have to be treated in a special manner ; if the whole country is agitated, as we know it is, over the cases of these men, I think the best policy that the Government could now adopt would be to say that these men have been subjected to a large amount of punishment already, and that, having regard to all the circumstances, their cases would be taken into consideration with a view to the liberation of as many as they possibly could. The people of Ireland are susceptible of gratitude, and that, I should say, would be the best policy to pursue. I believe Daly to be quite innocent of the crime with which he was charged ; at all events, so far as the use of dynamite was concerned. I believe, also, there has been no answer given to the case made out by Mr. Farndale ; and unless the Government are prepared to answer it, they must rest under a degree of suspicion that they are holding back something that ought to be known.

(11.4.) MR. J. G. SWIFT MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) : I think it is very clear that a miscarriage of justice has occurred in various cases, and mainly in the case of Egan ; but hon. Gentlemen upon both sides of the House need not be surprised that a charge of miscarriage of justice has been made, for hon. Gentlemen should recollect that this is not the first time that justice has miscarried in England. I will mention one case, and I think it ought to be a warning to both sides of the House—I mean the case in Manchester, when O'Brien and Larkin were sentenced to death. Four men were sentenced to death, the Judge seeing no difference between the case of the fourth man and that of the other three. The reporters who had heard the evidence came to the conclusion that the fourth man was not guilty, and they addressed a strong remonstrance in reference to it, with the result that the case of the fourth man was re-considered, and he was reprieved. The fourth man was convicted not upon evidence, but from prejudice, and in the height of political passion, and I believe the same may be said of Daly, who undoubtedly was prejudiced from his former connection with Fenianism. Having regard to the circumstances under which Daly was convicted, I think a very strong case has been made out in his behalf, for it cannot be doubted that great prejudice existed against him at the time of his conviction. Having regard to the fact that a period of eight years has elapsed, and recollecting that the theory of the law is that punishment is only imposed as a preventative, I do not see why clemency should not be exercised towards these men. Hon. Gentlemen have spoken of the Fenian movement, but the Fenians were men who were capable of making great sacrifices, and even the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary himself at one time was not ashamed to avail himself of the influence of Fenianism. Does the right hon. Gentleman recollect Dungarvan? (Cheers.) He does; well, and this is how the Times, in a leader, on the 21st November, 1868, speaks of his return—

"Mr. Henry Matthews is returned for Dungarvan, and is ranked as a Liberal, but as his Liberalism is apparently the result of a cross between Toryism and Fenianism, and is not inconsistent with a general denunciation of all Liberal statesmen, his vote is not altogether certain. His opponent, Mr. Serjeant Barry, a Liberal, had, it appears, in the course of his duty as a barrister, committed the crime of holding a brief against a Fenian prisoner; and Mr. Matthews, who is, we believe, an Englishman, availed himself of the discontent of the disaffected portion of the constituency with this act to turn Mr. Serjeant Barry out of his seat." (Cheers.)

That appeared in a Times leader upon 21st November, 1868. I think, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman, having regard to old associations—(laughter)—might liberate these men; he might very well liberate Daly now. Recollect that Daly could very easily have escaped further punishment if he liked. He was visited in prison by Pigott and by Mr. Soames; and if he had yielded to the temptation to join with them in blackening the character of Irish Members, he might have been free and in as good a position as some of his prosecutors. He was tempted to commit perjury and to purchase his liberty at the expense of the characters of the Irish Members, for on the 28th March, 1888, the Secretary of State for the Home Department said—

"Richard Pigott got permission to visit John Daly at Chatham Prison on the 12th November, 1888; he paid the visit on the 3rd December, 1888, in the presence of Major Capel, the Deputy Governor. Daly had been previously visited on the 21st October by Mr. Soames."

I may say that Soames got permission to see Daly for the purposes of the Parnell Commission, and that Pigott got permission for the same purpose. The interview took place in secret, and the man who resisted such temptation and accepted in preference to go to penal servitude is not likely to be guilty of the foul offence of outrage. Revolutionists of that kind are men filled with great enthusiasm and are not likely to condescend to petty artifices. The House has heard with astonishment a statement made by the hon. Member for North-East Cork in reference to the organised perjury and conspiracy by which Daly was convicted. A letter was read from Mr. John Ellis Trench to the effect that the Government had a very narrow escape; the phrase used, I believe, was "We sail very close to the wind," and I should like to know if that was in reference to the bombs that had been placed in Egan's garden by some other person?

MR. MATTHEWS: Daly admitted that he put them there himself.

MR. MAC NEILL: Daly's statement was that he put them there to conceal them, and that they had been put by some trick into his possession.

MR. MATTHEWS: No, no; nothing of the sort. Daly simply said that he put them there himself.

MR. MAC NEILL: Well, I make the statement upon what information I have before me, and I understand that Daly distinctly told the jury so. Now, the head of the detective department at Birmingham, who could have no personal or political purpose to serve, has come to the conclusion that Daly was innocent, and when such a man comes to that conclusion, I ask how can a prisoner be kept in any longer? It is not likely that he who refuses to commit perjury would condescend to any subterfuge in reference to dynamite. The Times, and the Government which connected itself with the Times, thought that Daly was a terrible witness to produce at the Commission. I do not think that there is any reason whatever for keeping this man, who has already expiated any offence he may have committed, in prison any longer, and I hope that the clemency of the Crown will be exercised in regard to him. I hope and trust that the Government will see their way to meet the unanimous desire of the Irish people in this matter, a desire which is generally entertained. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman has had any experience of penal servitude, but everyone who has gone through a prison must know that penal servitude is worse than death, and I believe if hon. Members below the Gangway would put more pressure upon the Home Secretary this very reasonable appeal would be yielded to at once.

*MR. MARTIN FLAVIN (Cork) : Being a new Member, it is not my intention to occupy the time of the House until I acquire some experience, but, having listened carefully to the hon. Members who have preceded me, and to the Home Secretary, I feel bound, in the interests of humanity, if for no other reason, to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford. I should like to reply to one observation of the hon. Member for Deptford, who, I believe, is not now in the House. (An hon. MEMBER : Yes.) He has said that this action is taken for the purpose of obtaining votes. I, as a new Member, repudiate that. My action in this matter, and I hope the action of my brother Members, is actuated by higher motives than to gain votes. I have no sympathy whatever with dynamitards. I have no sympathy with crime of any kind ; but I have considerable sympathy, from what I have heard to-night, with the unfortunate men who have suffered so much in prison. The hon. and learned Member for Deptford spoke as if trial by jury were infallible. It is well-known that in many political cases in Ireland, chiefly in times of panic, innocent persons have been punished. It was only the other day I accidentally came across a newspaper account of a conviction of two men, which has been already referred to in this House—an account of a conviction in 1879 on a charge of burglary and attempt to murder. These men were released in 1888, when it was proved to demonstration that they were innocent. That being so, I hold that trial by jury is not, at all events, infallible. I referred to the fact that in times of political excitement, juries may be carried away by their feelings. The hon. and learned Member for Deptford, and I think the hon. Member for Donegal, referred to the case of Allen, Larkin, and O'Brien, and the hon. Member for Donegal said that there were four men found guilty of murder. The hon. Member for Deptford said that three were tried for murder. With all respect to the hon. Members, I believe I am correct in saying that I am as conversant with these events as they are. There were five men put upon their trial : three were convicted and executed ; the two others were liberated immediately after conviction. In that trial two were liberated and three were executed. I knew one of the three—O'Brien ; and if I believed him to be a murderer, I would not, as a Member of this House, refer to the fact that I was acquainted with him ; but I do so, not with shame, but with pride, for a finer specimen of an Irishman I never knew ; and although I may not be able to convince the House that that man was innocent of the crime for which he was executed, I am myself convinced of the fact. I myself regretted at the time that life was taken, but I do firmly believe that that life was taken not designedly, but through misadventure. Under these circumstances, I think it not at all unreasonable that this House should consent to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford, which is not for the release of these men, but that their case should be reconsidered, and if found desirable that they should be leniently treated. I have to thank the House for the kindness with which they have heard me.

(11.26.) MR. W. H. K. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.) : It has been said more than once in this Debate that a considerable feeling had been raised throughout the length and breadth of Ireland at the continued imprisonment of these men, Mr. Daly, Egan, and the other persons convicted. One hon. Member, the hon. Member for Deptford, said that if these men were Englishmen their cases would not be reconsidered. If they were Englishmen a very considerable amount of consideration would be given to their case. If there were 16 Englishmen in prison in this country whose case had by great demonstration been brought to the notice of the public, I am quite certain a great amount of consideration would be paid to the matter. Some of the largest and most influential gatherings that have taken place in Ireland during recent years have occurred during the last 12 months with the object of calling the attention of the House and of the Government to this important matter. This is not a question that has attracted the attention of one or two Members of Parliament ; it is a question which is forced upon the attention of the House by the people of Ireland, and it is a question which will continue to be agitated, listened to or not. Reference has been made to good feeling between the people of this country and those of Ireland. All I can say is that it is the opinion of hundreds of thousands of the people of Ireland the sooner that feeling is established the better; but it cannot be established as long as we have Members—such as the hon. Member for Deptford—sneering at men whom he knows are regarded with feelings of veneration by thousands of people, who are the hon. Member's fellow-subjects. He told us that Allen, Larkin, and O'Brien were murderers; he told us that we, the Irish people, were a peculiar people; that the Government of America, in the matter of extradition, was not influenced by right, by justice, or by law, but by the meanest possible object, that of catching the votes of the Irish people, and that for that reason, and that reason alone, they exercised their powers. A speech of more studied insult was never uttered in this House, and I say it is painful to think that when a speech of that kind is delivered, not a Gentleman upon these Benches, or upon the Front Opposition Benches, rises to protest against the insults that have been directed against their countrymen and us. This Government have but a few months of power remaining to them, and recent elections point pretty clearly to the fact that when next this question is brought before the House it will not be the Home Secretary of ex-Fenian sympathies who will have to reply on behalf of the Home Office. It is quite clear that from the right hon. Gentleman and his friends we have little to expect, but we may expect a good deal from his successor in office. It would allay agitation in Ireland and satisfy a strong demand made there, if some right hon. Gentleman from the Front Opposition Bench would give an assurance that when the present Opposition have the power the cases of these men shall be re-considered. I am not asking any man to guarantee a release, but that these cases shall be re-considered in view of the fact that most extraordinary facts have come to light bearing on some of these cases in the closest possible way. The present Government refuse to go so far as that, but I doubt if even the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) would refuse inquiry. I think we may call on him for some expression of his opinion. Yet I do not know why we should expect any special sympathy from him. These men are kept in prison because at one time they were members of the Fenian Organisation. It has not been proved that they committed any dynamite offence, and they were not tried for such an offence. The evidence given against them went back for almost 20 years, when they were members of the Fenian Brotherhood, and this excited a prejudice against them. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby takes every opportunity to sneer at a considerable section of the people of Ireland who have much respect and sympathy for the efforts made years ago by members of that Association to gain the ear of the world for the wrongs of Ireland before any attempt was made in this House to bring those wrongs forward. We do not desire Fenian Home Rule. Our request is that these cases may be re-considered and brought to proof; our desire is that this quarrel may be settled once for all, and that fairly. Let me tell the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby that he is not preparing the way for a mutual agreement by sneering at mention of the Fenian movement in Ireland, which made the Parliamentary movement here possible. Who paved the way for the movement of Mr. Parnell but the men of 20 years ago? But for the work of those men the Home Rule movement would not be now sufficiently advanced to enable the right hon. Gentleman to declare himself a Home Ruler. I say this in most perfect good faith, because I have but recently come across from our country, where I have attended public meetings and where I have spoken of these men. I tell the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Morley), who is looked upon with greater respect in Ireland than is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby—I tell him that some of those men have been most active, have done most to promote the cause of goodwill between the two countries upon the lines laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Gladstone). Some of these men are most eager to reach out their hands and help to bridge over the quarrel of centuries between kindred peoples. Yet some of these men have been insulted because they have not been able to carry elections, though they poll thousands. The mention of such men has raised a sneer from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby as being mere Fenians. Let us have no more talk of that kind. If we are going to come to terms, as I hope we may—if we are going to have a genuine treaty of real and lasting peace between England and Ireland, let it be with the whole of Ireland—not excluding a considerable section of the Irish people from that treaty with a sneer at them because they belonged to the movement of years ago, which now, apparently, is strongly condemned on both sides. Why should you be afraid of any inquiry? The Home Secretary seems to have any amount of information which has never seen the light of day. What objection is there to have this information subjected to impartial inquiry? If the truth is on his side, it will become manifest. All we ask is that the Government will at least inquire into the cases of these men now in prison. So moderate a request is it that I cannot understand why it is refused. We ask for inquiry at which evidence, not given, at the trial may be produced; for instance, the evidence of the Head Constable of Birmingham. His evidence was of the most startling character, but he had no opportunity of giving it at the trial of these men. Why not now take his sworn testimony? As the truth appears let the men be released or remain in prison, but do not irritate the people of Ireland by refusing the inquiry they so passionately demand.

Mr. W. H. K. Redmond

(11.40.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I do not propose to import into the few words I desire to say any controversial arguments. It seems to me the late Home Secretary and the present Home Secretary are in an equally difficult position. They are the representatives of justice in this House; their business is to administer the law; and if any appeal is to come before the Government on this matter, it seems to me it comes best from a private Member; and it is for this reason and feeling that it is well that something should be said in this Debate from this part of the House that I intervene for a few moments. I have always thought that a tribunal such as is a jury acting under the direction of a Judge and after full investigation on the spot is more competent to judge of a question of this kind than we are. It is not easy for us to review in heated debate in this House the verdict arrived at, and I shall assume, rightly or wrongly, that the verdict of the jury is treated—by some of us at least—as conclusive. But it seems to me the matter does not end there. These men have been in penal servitude for eight years, and some of us know what that means. (Laughter.) Some hon. Members seem to think it is a light matter to serve eight years in such torture, but it seems to me an adequate punishment for most offences. These men have served for a long period, and it does seem to me that, even on the admitted facts, there is a distinction in the positions as between Daly and Egan and the others. I am sure I do not wish to exaggerate, and I observe a response from the Home Secretary himself. I do think that the time has come when it may be well for the Government to consider whether the clemency of the Crown might be extended to some of these cases drawing some distinction. I should say it is not desirable, or in the interests of justice, that verdicts and sentences should be debated by such a tribunal as this. But there is an element which seems to distinguish these offences, even putting them at their worst, from ordinary criminal offences. We must remember this, that what Egan did—or for the matter of that, what Daly did—would be done by hundreds of men throughout the length and breadth of Ireland, men with whom most of us in other respects would be proud to associate. Reference has been made to a speech of mine. I adhere to it. I repeat it—every word. However wrong, however wicked, it is for men to commit these offences, these heinous crimes, yet still we must look at the circumstances, the motives; aye, and the passions, actuating the men at the time. They were, after all, at the time but the vehicles of a mass of political feeling, the intensity of which is best measured by the intensity and duration of the struggle maintained for Irish liberty. I do not argue that this justifies challenging the verdict of the jury or treating these as political crimes, but I argue there is a reason for extending the clemency of the Crown to the less guilty among these men. It may be well in these days when the Chief Secretary has entered upon a constructive policy towards Ireland, and is trying to inspire the Irish people with the belief that he, too, is earnest in the intention that at last justice shall be extended to that country—it might be worth while for the Government to consider whether clemency might not be extended to others beside Egan, but in any case to him. It does seem to me the time has come to consider, not necessarily the question of guilt or innocence, but whether eight long years of torture in penal servitude—and no more degrading punishment can be inflicted—is not a sufficient punishment to expiate a crime into which they were led in the tumult of political passion, and in which they had the support of many of their countrymen.

(11.49.) MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): These men were made Fenians by your English laws; and when there are so many professions made as to the interest this House takes in Irish affairs, I can only say that a stranger entering the Gallery of this House would be surprised to find that neither on the Front Government Bench, or on the Opposition Front Bench, is there a single friend of this oppressed and enslaved people. On the Front Opposition Bench are the men who committed these men to prison, and they are faced by the Government who keep them there. With all the professions of friendship for Ireland these Members of the House are too cowardly to raise a voice on behalf of these prisoners. Where is the Opposition who promise us all good things in the future? Where is the great, slashing voice of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby? Where is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle? Where are the leaders of the Opposition? The benches behind are packed with men who will not open their mouths. One exception there has been, and we thank the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. Would not capital punishment be better than this prolonged torture in prison? We have had all sorts of weapons used in the past against the life-blood of Ireland, and we have now a Home Secretary who, in the past, claimed our support with promises to be honest to our cause; but the Home Secretary is an English lawyer, with all the greed of office in his heart. He refuses an inquiry. He has the machinery in his hand, but he will not use it. Is he afraid of the evidence that might be forthcoming? (Interruption.) This is an Irish question, and it suits the persecutors of our race, from Deptford and elsewhere, to jeer at it, and others laugh. But we, with the sympathetic natures of our countrymen, with honest and cultivated good nature, cannot understand this refusal of a request for reconsideration by means of your own machinery. For their own purposes lawyers on either side unite to retain these men in prison. I have no faith in lawyers who, retaining the nourishing morsel, hand the shells to parties in a suit. On either side we have too many lawyers in this House. We are promised Home Rule by the Opposition but why have we not sympathy and support on this occasion? You split up our Party, and you live on our blood. But I know that others of my friends desire to speak, and I will not stand in their way.

(11.54.) MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I beg to move the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed:

"That the Debate be now adjourned."

(11.55.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am sorry that the hon. Member should take that course on this Amendment. The Debate on the Address has already occupied three days, and there remain at least two other Amendments which cannot be disposed of in a few hours. I should have thought that this discussion which has continued since half-past 6, might now be brought to a termination, to the satisfaction of the House generally. The facts have been fully brought out and discussed, and my right hon. Friend has certainly adequately represented the view of the Government.

(11.57.) MR. J. G. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I think the Leader of the House is mistaken. It is true a great many facts have been brought out, but it is equally true that nearly all the benches on the Government side have been empty during the night. There are further facts to be brought out, and I think, under the circumstances, the Debate should be allowed to continue to-morrow.

Debate adjourned till to-morrow.

MOTION.

FOREIGN GOODS (MARK OF ORIGIN) BILL.

On Motion of Colonel Howard Vincent, Bill for the placing of a Mark of Origin upon Foreign Goods, ordered to be brought in by Colonel Howard Vincent, Mr. Howorth, Mr. Byron Reed, Mr. Johnston, Sir John Colomb, Mr. Maclure, Colonel Bridgeman, Mr. Brookfield, and Mr. Baumann.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 130.]

VOLUNTEER FORCES (JURY EXEMPTION)

BILL.

On Motion of Colonel Howard Vincent, Bill for the Exemption of Efficient Volunteers from Jury Service, ordered to be brought in by Colonel Howard Vincent, Colonel Eyre, Colonel Brookfield, and Mr. Boord.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 131.]

LABOURERS' COTTAGES GARDENS BILL.

On Motion of Sir Edward Birkbeck, Bill to confer powers on Rural Sanitary Authorities with respect to providing Gardens for Labourers' Cottages, ordered to be brought in by Sir Edward Birkbeck, Mr. Jesse Collings, Colonel Eyre, Mr. Hobhouse, Sir Charles Hall, Viscount Ebrington, and Mr. Fellowes.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 132.]

SUMMARY JURISDICTION ACT (1879)

AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Cross, Bill to amend "The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Cross, Mr.

Coghill, Mr. Gully, Mr. John Kelly, Mr. Mattington, Mr. Talbot, and Sir Richard Temple.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 133.]

GROCERS' LICENCES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Leng, Bill to abolish Dealers' or Grocers' Certificates in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Leng, Mr. M'Lagan, Mr. Esslemont, and Mr. John Wilson (Govan).

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 134.]

PLACES OF WORSHIP (SITES) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. John Ellis, Bill to give further facilities for the acquisition of Sites for Places of Worship, ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Ellis, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Burt, Mr. Alexander M'Arthur, and Mr. Henry J. Wilton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 135.]

EIGHT HOURS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Cunningham Graham Bill to limit the hours of labour to Eight Hours per day in all trades and occupations, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Cunningham Graham and Mr. Conybeare.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 136.]

DEACONS (CHURCH OF ENGLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Sydney Gedge, Bill to amend the Law affecting Deacons in the Church of England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Sydney Gedge, Sir John Kennaway, Sir Richard Temple, Mr. Maclure, and Mr. MacInnes.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 137.]

RURAL LABOURERS' COTTAGES BILL.

On Motion of Lord Henry Bruce, Bill to provide improved Cottages for Rural Labourers, ordered to be brought in by Lord Henry Bruce, Mr. Jesse Collings, Sir Edward Birkbeck, Sir John Kennaway, and Mr. Gray.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 138.]

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (ACQUISITION OF LAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Knowles, Bill to facilitate the acquisition of Land by Local Authorities, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Knowles, Mr. Cozens-Hardy, and Mr. Powell.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 139.]

MILLBANK PRISON BILL.

On Motion of Sir John Gorst, Bill to transfer the site of Millbank Prison to the management of the Commissioners of Works, ordered to be brought in by Sir John Gorst and Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 140.]

More may be had if a proper inquiry is made. I do not think that such an inquiry would need to be very protracted, or very expensive; the whole of the evidence would be immediately upon the spot—a large Commission would not be necessary. What would be necessary would be that certain experts should be placed upon it who could bring out all the facts of the evidence and tabulate them in such a way that reasonable conclusions might be framed upon them. In the last 17 years which have elapsed since the appointment of the Noxious Gases Commission, science has done a great deal in the direction of mitigating evils of this class, and one hopeful sign which we had, even then, was that whenever the Legislature, acting judiciously, had put its foot down firmly and said "this thing should not be," it always happened that science found some way out of the difficulty which enabled the wishes of the legislature to be carried out without any serious injury to manufacture, and with enormous benefit to the rest of the population. The evil is great undoubtedly, but so also would be the effects of any sensible remedy which could be applied; and I think that at all events, before sitting down and saying that London fog is a thing that cannot be conquered and must be endured, we should at least take the step of seeing whether it is not within some control at our hands if we adopt the proper means and the proper expedients. There is one distinguished scientist, I think he is a Scotch Professor, who has devoted several years of his life to the special investigation of what the properties and constituents of London fog are, and he has come, I understand, to very definite conclusions upon the subject—conclusions which I have no doubt he would be prepared to submit to any Commission properly appointed. I cannot believe that any Bill proceeding from any private Member, however well he may be acquainted with the subject, can possibly deal with a question so far reaching in its immediate effect and in its future consequences; but I do venture to think (speaking far more in the interests of the poor and needy than in those of Members of your Lordships' House, or what may be called the more well-to-do classes of the community) that some effort should be made to grapple with this terrible nuisance. To Members of your Lordships' House, or to persons who are so situated that they can leave London if they find it disagreeable, it is possible to fly from the evil; but nine-tenths of the whole population within the Metropolitan area must stay, whether they like it or not. To many of them it means the cutting off of their daily bread, and that sometimes for days, though not, I am thankful to say, for weeks together; to many more (and particularly to women) it means the carrying on of their avocations under circumstances of the greatest personal peril, and the greatest risk to their lives and health. In all cases it means a steady sapping of the vital energies which, if not apparent at the time, is quite certain to make itself felt within a not very distant period. I say nothing of the enormous waste of fuel thus poured up into the air out of our chimneys, which ought to be consumed below and give out its heat; I say nothing of the enormous expense which is occasioned by the deterioration of furniture, of pictures, of every article of domestic economy and domestic luxury which comes within the influence of this all-pervading plague; I say nothing of the actual expense to which the community is put by the precautions which have to be taken on the recurrence of every fog, or of the enormously increased consumption of gas which takes place even when that fog lasts only a few hours, meaning to houses of business, and to the poorer classes, a very serious addition to their annual outgoings. It is on behalf of those who cannot plead for themselves in this matter that I hope Her Majesty's Government will be induced to institute a full and searching inquiry into the whole question, and that not until the results of the inquiry are before your Lordships' House and before the public, will they despair of being in one way or another able to deal with the matter which so largely affects the comfort and health and the lives of the whole of the population within the Metropolitan area. My Lords, I now venture to put to Her Majesty's Government the Question that stands in my name:—To ask Her Majesty's Government whether they are prepared to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the causes of the prevalence of fogs in London; to ascertain how far, and by what means, they are preventible; and to make such recommendation as, after inquiry, they may deem advisable.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I have been unable to discover to what Department of Her Majesty's Government the question of London fog belongs, and, having failed to ascertain the right man to answer my noble Friend, I am compelled to do it myself. I am told the London County Council are the people to answer, but I do not see them opposite, and therefore I am afraid I must undertake the duty on their behalf. My Lords, nobody, I think, will differ from my noble Friend in the invective which he has delivered against the London fog; I think he will carry the universal opinion of both Houses of Parliament and of all the inhabitants of the Metropolis with him in the strong feelings to which he has given expression. But, of course, there is a long distance between recognising the existence of an evil and believing that a remedy is easily to be found; and I think, before you go into the question of remedies for the London fog, you should ask yourselves precisely what it is that you hope to remedy. I apprehend that it would be much more accurate to say that what we can remedy is the colour of the fog; but I never heard of anybody who proposed a remedy for the London fog itself. The London fog comes, in the first place, from the Essex marshes, and, probably, beyond that, from the sea, and you might as well propose a remedy for the East wind, as propose a remedy for the London fog in its natural condition. That circumstance disposes of some of the arguments which, with considerable pathos and eloquence, my noble Friend advanced; because its power of interfering with the avocations of daily life is derived quite as much from its existence as a fog as from the particular colour which it assumes. The worst fog I ever saw was about four years ago, when you actually could not see your own boots when you were walking on the parade—it was absolutely white. A fog of that kind will go on as long as the Essex marshes and the North Sea exist. The question, of course, of the colour is another matter; that is, no doubt, one of the advantages which our advanced civilisation has acquired; and I quite agree with my noble Friend that there probably there are certain remedies. If you are willing to use a very drastic course of legislation, and if your administrative machinery is sufficiently vigorous to carry it out, you might make a considerable impression upon the colour of the fog. By far the most effectual remedy ever heard of was, I think, originally suggested by Professor Frankland, that everybody should be forbidden from using any other coal in London except anthracite coal. I do not know whether my noble Friend thinks he would ever get Parliament to pass such a measure as that, or whether he would get the English people to obey it if it were passed. But, of course, the immediate result of that would be enormously to increase the price of that coal, and, consequently, the price of living to the whole population; and he would likewise condemn the population to go for ever, so far as they remained in London, without ever seeing a fire with a flame in it; and I do not think that, for the sake of avoiding an occasional inconvenience, grave as it is, for a certain number of days in the winter, people would condemn themselves to a flameless fire all the winter through. That is a great difficulty which attaches to remedies of this kind. I believe that there is not very much to ascertain in respect either to the nature of the fog or the remedies for its colour which might be proposed. The difficulty is political—that you would require, on the part (I think my noble Friend told us), of the owners of 1,500,000 chimneys an amount of self-sacrifice which you do not get out of the people of a free country. You would require an extension of your inspectorial system which would frighten the most enthusiastic advocate of modern legislation. Conceive of an inspector going to every house in London and seeing that the grate was properly fitted in order not to emit smoke! The burden of itself would be worse than the London fog. Well then, my noble Friend says, but why not inquire into these matters, and that we should not sit down and say it is impossible until we have inquired. He was candid enough to tell us that a much simpler matter, namely, the prevention of chemical odours, was subjected to remedies proposed by a Commission, and that the result was, even in his eyes, not wholly satisfactory. There happened, what I imagine often does happen with a Royal Commission in this country: they make a laborious, ample, and perfect investigation, and a most voluminous and interesting Report (which nobody reads), and then an Act of Parliament, which is brought in with a great flourish of trumpets and which disappears in the sands of July; and finally, after two or three efforts to pass an effectual Act of Parliament, the character of everybody is satisfied by passing some Act of Parliament which should have professedly the same object, but which, as my noble Friend testified was the case in the present instance, turns out to be a wholly dead letter. I am afraid those are the results of attempting things which are beyond the power of a constitutional Government and Parliament to effect; and, therefore, I am loth to consent to undertake the responsibility of issuing a Commission. If a Government has to issue a Commission they have to find gentlemen to act upon that Commission; and I assure my noble Friend that that is no easy task. If you cannot hold out to them any prospect that some great public service will be the result of their devotion, you will not persuade the competent men, who are not very numerous, to undertake the duty of a Commission. You may issue a Commission with men who are not competent; but the result will be very unsatisfactory, even in the first instance. I should prefer to recommend to my noble Friend a simpler mechanism, which will be in his own hand to work, and which, I believe, will effect, quite as much as a Commission, the ascertainment of any facts which have to be ascertained. If he will move for a Committee of this House to investigate the question, Her Majesty's Government will gladly support that Motion. We will not undertake to find the members of that Committee, but that, no doubt, my noble Friend will do himself; he will be the Chairman of the Committee; he will be able to direct its investigations; and he will be able to reap that rich harvest of knowledge, of policy, and of public service which he foresees for anyone who is able to cope with this evil. I think it is rather a matter for the simpler machinery of that kind than for the efforts of a Royal Commission. I fear that if we applied the machinery of a Royal Commission to it we should raise hopes which would not be gratified; we should inspire fears which are not reasonable; and we should diminish the available number of competent men for other more promising fields of investigation to whom it is necessary for such purposes to appeal. I therefore am afraid that I cannot assent to the proposal of my noble Friend that there should be a Royal Commission, but I should be ready heartily to support the appointment of a Committee.

House adjourned at Five o'clock to Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 12th February, 1892.

The House met at 3 o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

ADVANCES UNDER THE LAND PURCHASE ACT, 1892.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): On behalf of my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Knox) I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the total amount of advances applied for under the Land Purchase Act of last year up to 1st January, 1892; what was the amount of such advances applied for in Ulster during the same period; and whether he is aware that a feeling of discontent ists among Ulster farmers at the difficulty of obtaining satisfactory arrangements for purchase under the Act? Perhaps at the same time the right hon. Gentleman can answer the question, of which I have given notice, on how many, and what, counties of Ulster applications for sale and purchase, under "The Land Purchase Act, 1891," were received up to the 31st of December, 1891, by the Irish Land Commission; how many landlords and how many tenants were concerned in these applications; what was the total amount applied for, and what the total, so far, mentioned; and what issues of stock, if any, have been made?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) : With reference to the first question, the Irish Land Commissioners report that the total amount of advances applied for under the "Purchase Act" of last year up to 1st January, 1892, is £9,584, of which amount applications to the amount of £18,764 were made in Ulster. The Government have no information as to the feeling of discontent mentioned in the question. I am afraid I have not the information to enable me to answer the question of the hon. Member for West Belfast.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) : Can the right hon. Gentleman say how many holdings does this amount cover?

MR. JACKSON : That was not included in the notice of the question, and, therefore, I have not got the information.

MR. SEXTON : Do I understand that the right hon. Gentleman cannot reply on any of the points raised in my question?

MR. JACKSON : I am unable to answer now. I have telegraphed for the information, but it has not reached me yet.

MR. SEXTON : I will repeat the question on Monday.

THE "GERMANIC" MAILED.

MR. LENG (Dundee) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will explain how it was that the mails (800 lbs) for New York, which were not matched by the s.s. Germanic on the 27th December, 1891, in consequence her breaking down, were not sent by the City of Paris, which left Queenstown on the same evening, but were kept instead till the sailing of the Bothnia on the 27th December; and whether he is aware that, in consequence of this detention, they were only delivered in New York on 6th January instead of 1st January, as they would have been if carried by the City of Paris?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.) : The mails in question could not be forwarded by the City of Paris because she had left Queenstown before the accident to the Germanic occurred. No doubt they would have arrived much sooner by the City of Paris than they did by the Bothnia.

WAR OFFICE CONTRACTS AND GOVERNMENT FACTORIES.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if his attention has been called to the serious complaints made that the Government Factories are absorbing an increasing quantity of work to the prejudice of private firms and the slackness of industrial employment, and if there has been any increase during the past year, or deviations from the undertaking previously given, that either the major or at least a very considerable share of Government work should be reserved for the private firms, who on the faith of such assurance laid out large sums?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle) : My attention has been called to complaints recently made by or on behalf of private firms as to the amount of work undertaken in the Ordnance Factories, but there is no ground for the apprehension that an increasing quantity of work is being assigned to the factories to the prejudice of the private trade. So far as the proportions of completed work can be estimated, the payments to the trade, which in 1888-9 were about 40 per cent. of the total, rose gradually until in 1891-2 they amounted to close on 50 per cent.; but as this computation debits the factories with the work done for them in the early stage of manufacture by the trade, the proportion earned by private firms was in reality much larger. The expansion of orders caused by the "Imperial Defence Act" and "Naval Defence Act" has now subsided, and some slackness is necessarily felt in the factories as well as by the private firms.

CAPTAIN BOWLES (Middlesex, Enfield): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, is it not a fact that a great many of the operatives at the Enfield Factory are now under notice of dismissal in consequence of orders having been given to private firms?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No; that is not in consequence of reductions made in the work done at the factory in favour of private firms; it arises from the general reduction in the orders for warlike stores.

SORTING CLERKS IN THE POST OFFICE, DUBLIN.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether there are several junior second class sorting clerks recommended by their superior officers for the appointment of first class sorting clerks (on account of a number of vacancies which are about to be filled up in the General Post Office, Dublin) over the heads of a number of their senior brother officers, who, by seniority, merit, and character, have a prior claim to the vacancies; and are the appointments to be made by selection or by seniority and merit?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: There are two vacancies in the first class of sorting clerks at Dublin: no recommendations have as yet been made respecting them. Promotion to the first class is by a rule of the Service governed by considerations of superior fitness.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I would beg the right hon. Gentleman to look into this matter personally, for there are grave suspicions that promotion in those cases goes by favouritism, and we shall watch this matter closely.

THE LIMERICK LUNATIC ASYLUM.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick). I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if any adequate reasons exist for the exclusion of the Mayor of Limerick from the list of Governors of the Limerick Lunatic Asylum; whether he is aware that it has been the invariable custom to appoint the Mayors of Limerick on this Board by right of their office; and whether such practice will be revived?

MR. JACKSON: I have made inquiry into the matter mentioned in the hon. Member's question, and I find it is the case that up to 1890 it had been the practice for the Lord Lieutenant in the exercise of his discretion to select the Mayor of a city or town as a Governor of the district lunatic asylum for his term of office. The Lord Lieutenant then introduced a new system with regard to the appointment of Governors, so as to give the several contributing bodies a direct voice in the nomination of their representatives. The name of the Mayor of Limerick was not included by the Corporation in their list of nominees for 1892, and therefore this gentleman was not selected.

MR. O'KEEFFE: The gentleman was not actually Mayor at the time the Corporation made their nominations; but it has been the custom to appoint the Mayor by right of his office.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): In reference to this matter, may I ask, are we to understand that in any case where a Town Council recommend the Mayor then he will be appointed by the Lord Lieutenant? I may mention that something of the same kind occurred at Wexford.

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member rather turns round on my answer. I said, the name of this gentleman not appearing on the list of the Corporation, he was not selected by the Lord Lieutenant; but I cannot go so far as to give a pledge that in the case where the Mayor is on the list he will be selected, though probably that would be so in the ordinary course.

SCHOOL BOOKS IN VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS.

MR. PAULTON (Durham, Bishop Auckland): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the managers of voluntary schools have power to make a charge for school books, and to demand quarterly payments in advance in respect thereof?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL (Sir N. HART-DYKE, Kent, Dartford): If the hon. Member will be good enough to give me the particulars of the case of which I presume he refers, I shall be in a better position to judge what is the state of the law in regard to it; but I do not think that a demand for a quarter's payment in advance could, in any circumstances, be sustained.

RETURN OF DEER FORESTS (SCOTLAND).

MR. FRASER MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the Deer Forests (Scotland) Return, lately distributed, is not in conformity to the order of this House on August 5th, 1891; and whether he will instruct that a corrected Return be prepared, cancelling that issue?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): My attention had not been specially called to this Return until I saw the question of the hon. Member. I have made inquiry as to the cause of the disconformity referred to, but have not as yet had time to receive a reply. I shall be glad to communicate the result of my inquiry to the hon. Member as soon as I receive it.

SALARIES OF ATTENDANTS IN IRISH LUNATIC ASYLUMS.

MR. W. CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that much dissatisfaction exists among the attendants at the Richmond District Lunatic Asylum in regard to the smallness of their pay and allowances; whether the attendants on the insane in Ireland are placed on a scale of wages and allowances very far below what exists in public asylums in England; and whether he will cause an independent inquiry to be made?

MR. JACKSON: I understand that it is the case that in 1889 certain of the male attendants at the Richmond District Asylum memorialized the Governors for an increase in their remuneration, but that the Governors declined to accede to their application.

The rates of remuneration paid to the attendants in Ireland are, I believe, lower than in England; but this is not limited to the case of asylums. The fixing of the scales of wages for the staffs of District Asylums in Ireland is a matter which rests wholly with the Governors in the first instance.

MR. W. CORBET: I shall be glad if the right hon. Gentleman will make further inquiry into this matter, for, as I understand, the Lord Lieutenant has the right to revise these salaries.

MR. JACKSON: I do not know whether the Lord Lieutenant has the right, but I think it would be a strong exercise of power to intervene between the Governors and their servants, seeing that the Government contribution towards the asylums is a specific sum, and the balance for the maintenance of the asylums must fall upon the rates. That being so, the Lord Lieutenant would be guided by the decision of the Governors, and would scarcely intervene to override their decision.

THE BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

SIR JOHN KINLOCH (Perth, E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if it is the intention of the Government to introduce this Session the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill?

SIR C. J. PEARSON: The Government are very desirous that this useful measure should pass into law, and they propose to introduce it in the form in which it left the Select Committee in 1888. The Bill is one in regard to which it is believed that Scotch opinion is unanimous; but it is evident that in the case of a Bill so long and so elaborate the opposition even of one or two Members would be fatal, and the Government cannot undertake to press it if it does not meet with general assent.

MESSRS. WATERLOW'S CONTRACT.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury on what date the latest contract was entered into by the Stationery Office with Messrs. Waterlow Brothers, and if the contract was entered into since 13th February, 1891, what steps have been taken to secure that a fair wage shall be paid by Messrs. Waterlow to those they employ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham): The 25th November, 1890.

MR. BUXTON: But may I ask whether it is not the fact that the contract was extended since February, 1891?

SIR JOHN GORST: Not that I am aware of.

THE ANGLO-SPANISH TARIFF.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the advisability of obtaining from the Spanish Government a special tariff considerably below the new minimum tariff, which for many classes of British products is practically prohibitive; and whether Her Majesty's Government is striving to obtain such a concession, or to arrange for a renewal of the present existing Anglo-Spanish tariff after the 30th June proximo, the date on which it expires, unless more favourable terms can be secured?

THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): Her Majesty's Government claim under the Convention of 26th April, 1886, to receive up to the 30th of June next "most-favoured nation" treatment, together with the special tariffs which at the former date had been conceded by Spain to France and Germany. The subject of commercial negotiations for replacing the existing convention by a new treaty is engaging the attention of the two Governments, and a communication on the subject is shortly expected from the Government of Spain.

THE REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE WEST HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS.

MR. FRASER MACINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Reports of the Committee of Experts in reference to the West Highlands and Islands requirements have been received and considered; and if he will be good enough to state when an announcement of the intentions of the Government may be expected?

M.: Sydney Buxton

SIR JOHN GORST: My right hon Friend has requested me to answer this question. The answer to the first paragraph of the question is in the affirmative. With reference to the other part of the question I am unable to answer it at present. The matter still under the consideration of the Secretary for Scotland.

STAMP DUTIES IN IRELAND.

MR. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the exemption documents connected with the administration of the Poor Laws in Ireland from liability to Stamp Duties applies to documents connected with the administration of the Sanitary and Labourers' Dwellings Acts; and, not, whether the exemption will be extended to them?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, S George's, Hanover Square): There is no provision in the Sanitary Acts or the Labourers' Dwellings Acts relating to Ireland which extends to documents connected with the administration either of these sets of Acts the existing exemption in favour of certain documents connected with the administration of the Poor Laws in Ireland. With respect to the extension of the exemption in the direction indicated, should be stated that in England there was formerly an exemption in favour of certain documents under the Public Health Act, 1848, and that exemption was repealed by the Public Health Act, 1872, and has never been enacted.

MR. CHANCE: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has answered the last part of my question, whether there is any intention to extend the exemption.

MR. GOSCHEN: No; there is such intention, as my answer, thought, conveyed.

THE PRISON COMMISSIONERS.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (M. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): With the permission of the House I wish to correct errors in the published report the answers I gave yesterday to the Member for Wolverhampton and the Member for Bethnal Green. Besides Mr. Ruggles-Brise, recently appointed, there are now two other Commissioners of Prisons. Each of these Commissioners has now been appointed Director of Convict Prisons. The only other Director of Convict Prisons is Mr. Wakeford, who retains his appointment for two years only. When he retires, the plan of an amalgamated Board of three, mentioned before the Royal Commission in 1887, will be completely carried out. Colonel Garsia, I may add, has been appointed Secretary both to the Prison Commissioners and to the Directors. Sir E. Du Cane remains Chairman of both Boards.

88. "EIDER" AND THE ST. CATHERINE'S LIGHTHOUSE.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if it is correct that the officers in the Eider, recently wrecked on the Isle of Wight coast, were unable to see the light of St. Catherine's Lighthouse; whether the electric light at St. Catherine's Point is less effective in fog than the Wigham triform group flashing gas light of Tory Island, off the north-west coast of Ireland; whether he will consider the advisability of supplementing the electric light at St. Catherine's by the vertical sky flashing light recommended by the Shipmasters' Society of London and others; and whether, meanwhile, the experiment for producing thrills in fog, recommended by Professor Tyndall in his letter to the Times on the 3rd instant, will be tried at St. Catherine's?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): In the deposition made before the Receiver of Wrecks by the master of the Eider, no mention is made of the light at St. Catherine's having been seen by the officers of the ship, which struck on Atherfield ledge in a thick fog about 3½ miles from the lighthouse. Upon the second and third paragraphs of the hon. Member's question I have been in communication with the Trinity House, who state that whether the Wigham light at Tory Island is more effective in fog, can only be estimated from the results of experiments at South Foreland (Parliamentary Paper C. 4551, 1885), which were conclusively in favour of the electric light. Experiments in sky flashing, so far as they have gone, have not been encouraging for the adoption of that system, and the Elder Brethren are in communication with the Shipmasters' Society on the subject. Professor Tyndall's letter of 3rd February was written under a misapprehension. Very powerful and perfect thrills in fog are sent from the illuminating apparatus at St. Catherine's, a sudden flash of over six million initial candle power being given for five seconds, followed by an equally sudden eclipse of 25 seconds.

PROPERTY ASSESSMENTS.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he would take steps to make the assessments of property, on which House Duty and Income Tax are collected, the same as that used (the rateable value) by the Local Authorities, so that the assessments for the Imperial and local taxation might be uniform?

MR. GOSCHEN: This could not be effected until a general valuation of the whole country is in force. Without such a measure no satisfactory rateable value could be fixed.

MR. MORTON: May I ask whether, in 1888 or 1889, the right hon. Gentleman did not give a pledge to carry out a reform of this sort?

MR. GOSCHEN: No. I did not pledge myself, but I very much regret that a very valuable Bill—as I thought—which was introduced did not pass into law.

MOTIONS.

BUILDING LANDS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Munro Ferguson, Bill to enable Local Authorities to acquire Building Lands in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Munro Ferguson, Mr. Haldane, and Mr. Leng.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 147.]

SMALL HOLDINGS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Jesse Collings, Bill for giving facilities for the creation of Small Holdings of Land, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jesse Collings, Mr. Robert Reid, Mr. Burt, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson, Mr. Broadhurst, Colonel Cotton-Jodrell, Mr. Cyril Flower, and Mr. Hobhouse.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 148.]

CORPORATE ASSOCIATIONS (PROPERTY)
BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Howell, Bill for the better securing their Property to Corporate Associations, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Howell, Mr. Beaufoy, Mr. Thomas Henry Bolton, Mr. Sydney Buxton, Mr. Causton, Mr. Cremer, Mr. Lawson, Mr. Montagu, Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. James Rowlands, and Mr. James Stuart.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 149.]

BANKRUPTCIES AND ARRANGEMENTS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Chance, Bill to amend the Law relating to Bankruptcies and Arrangements in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Chance, Mr. Sexton, and Mr. Murphy.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 150.]

OCCUPYING TENANTS' ENFRANCHISEMENT
BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Bartley, Bill to enable occupying tenants of houses and places of business to purchase the Fee Simple of their Holdings, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bartley, Mr. Maclean, and General Goldsworthy.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 151.]

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS' (SCOTLAND)
BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Shiress Will, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Qualification and Registration of Parliamentary Voters, and to Parliamentary Elections in Scotland; and for other purposes in relation thereto, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Shiress Will, Mr. Campbell - Bannerman, Mr. J. B. Balfour, Mr. Buchanan, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Donal Crawford, Dr. Farquharson, Mr. Hunter, and Mr. Leng.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 152.]

GUARDIANS OF THE POOR QUALIFICATION (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Sir William Plowden, Bill to do away with the property qualification of elected Guardians of the Poor, ordered to be brought in by Sir William Plowden, Mr. Philip Stanhope, and Mr. Winterbotham.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 153.]

HANDLOOM WEAVING (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Colonel Saunderson, Bill for the regulation of Handloom Weaving in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Colonel Saunderson, Colonel Waring, Mr. O'Neill, and Mr. Macartney.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 154.]

VOTERS' REGISTRATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Hobhouse, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Registration of Voters in England and Wales; and for other purposes connected therewith, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hobhouse, Viscount Ebrington, Mr. Lewis Fry, Mr. Story-Maskelyne, and Mr. John Bright.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 155.]

RIGHTS OF WAY (SCOTLAND) (NO. 2)

On Motion of Sir Charles Dalrymple enable County Councils in Scotland, o port by the Sheriff, to sue actions of E Way, ordered to be brought in by Sir Dalrymple, Mr. Stewart, and Mr. Campbell.

Bill presented, and read first time. [B

DWELLING HOUSES RE-LETTO (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Provand, Bill to the Law relating to the re-letting of D Houses in Scotland, ordered to be bro by Mr. Provand, Mr. Edmund Roberts Baird, Mr. Caldwell, and Dr. Cameron.

Bill presented, and read first time. [B

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SP
ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adj Debate on Main Question [9th J ary]—"That an humble Addr presented to Her Majesty, a loweth :—

Most Gracious Sovereign,

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful subje subjects, the Commons of the United K of Great Britain and Ireland, in Par assembled, beg leave to offer our thanks to Your Majesty for the g speech which Your Majesty has addre both Houses of Parliament:

We take this first opportunity of to Your Majesty our sincere condolence afflicting dispensation of Providence which Your Majesty and this Natio been visited, in the death of His Highness Prince Albert Victor, D Clarence and Avondale:

We assure Your Majesty of our h participation in the universal feel sympathy with Your Majesty and Majesty's family under this grievous a and in the deep sense entertained by all of your Majesty's subjects of the c which the country has sustained by t of a Prince who had won for hims general affection and regard of Your M subjects."—(Mr. Hermon Hodge.)

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to a words,—“And we humbly represent to Majesty that the time has come wh cases of all prisoners convicted und Treason Felony Act, who are, and hav for many years undergoing punishment offences arising out of insurrectionary movements connected with Ireland, may be tageously reconsidered with a view speedy release of these prisoners.”—(M Redmond.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

(3.58.) MR. J. G. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I desire shortly to state the grounds upon which I support the Amendment of my hon. Friend. There is an almost universal leisure on the part of the Irish people that these political prisoners should be now released. So many weighty arguments have been urged by hon. Friends near me, so many unanswerable reasons given why the cases of these prisoners should be legally reconsidered, that I do not intend to labour that part of our position. I will content myself with saying on this part of the subject that any Member who remained in the House, and listened to the arguments on the facts advanced, cannot fail to have been struck with the character of the evidence by which the conviction of these prisoners was secured. I do not think that an assembly of fair-minded, thinking men, can deny that the case does require reconsideration, after hearing the evidence of a responsible officer of the Crown who is still presiding over the peace of one of the most important cities in England, and after hearing of the manner in which Daly was entrapped—strangely enough, entrapped during the time the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby presided at the Home Department. I listened last night to a speech from the hon. Member for Deptford, who complained of the character and quality of the arguments which had been used, from this side of the House, by Irish Representatives in support of the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend. I take issue at once with the hon. and learned Gentleman. I protest against that complaint, and I say that those arguments, so far as they went, were conclusive evidence in favour of the release of these prisoners. But I confess that if the hon. and learned Gentleman, instead of making complaints against the character of these arguments, had contented himself with making a protest which I shall endeavour to make, against the falsity of the source to which those appeals were directed, I should not have found much cause of quarrel with the hon. and learned Gentleman. I listened with great care to those arguments, and with a certain amount of humiliation to the appeals which have been made, notably the fervent, and nobody will deny honest, appeal of the hon. Member for North-East Cork. That appeal was being made in this House to the chief Law Officers of the Crown—the chief Law Officer of the Party to whom the Irish people have been taught, and to whom I have been taught, to look neither for clemency nor mercy on behalf of the Irish people; and I could not help thinking while that appeal was being made that a desperate endeavour was lying beneath it to conceal the real source to which that appeal might have been directed with some degree of success. You have appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary of a Coercion Tory Government for bread for the Irish political prisoners, and the right hon. Gentleman has answered you, not by offering you the proverbial stone, but by presenting you with a bomb, in the form of a love-apple, nine years old. He has answered you by making new charges, after nine years, against these unfortunate prisoners, and when challenged he refuses to lay upon the Table of the House one tittle of evidence in support of these charges. The right hon. Gentleman has gone further. He has practically told you that the reason that these men were convicted, and had these severe and terrible sentences, was that in times gone by, when the right hon. Gentleman himself was young and, perhaps, foolish, they belonged to a certain Organisation to which—I do not believe the Home Secretary, although he will deny it in England, can deny it with any degree of force in Ireland—he owes the honour of a first seat in this House. I do not intend to make any special appeal to him on behalf of the prisoners, and I say that during the whole course of this discussion it must have been apparent that a delicate effort was being made to glide over the thin ice which conceals a conspiracy of silence, which I think ought to be unravelled on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, whom I conceive, and I assert and declare to be, the real gabler of these prisoners. The right hon. Gentleman, since the commencement of this discussion, instead of getting up in the House and giving us the benefit of his weighty advice upon the subject of moment to these poor prisoners and of importance to the Irish people, has been hovering in and out of the House undecided as to whether he shall not expose the weakness of his friends by remaining silent, or whether he shall expose it by getting up in his place as he did last year and giving another twist to the vice which is tearing the hearts and the souls out of these poor prisoners. I desire to carry the memory of our friends back to the time when these men were arrested and convicted upon this very evidence which was procured from the Irish police, and when these men received those long and terrible sentences. The right hon. Gentleman was then in power, and what did he do? He suspended the Explosives Act of 1883, which only admitted of his giving to these prisoners a penalty of 14 years' penal servitude, while he had them tried under another Act—I think the Treason Felony Act—in order that he might be able to give them 20 years, and in some of the cases, sentences for life. The hon. Member for Mayo, who speaks with profound authority upon all Irish questions, has told us very recently that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition had become aware of the wishes and of the aspirations of the Irish people; but that his ability to grant these wishes and these aspirations would entirely depend upon the unanimity of the Irish people and of their Representatives. Will the hon. Member for Mayo deny that we who represent Ireland are unanimous and without a dissentient voice on the subject of the release of the Irish political prisoners? and, if so, I challenge—I invite—the hon. Member for Mayo to get up in his place and make good that promise of future security which he has been making to the Irish people on behalf of the right hon. Gentleman and his friends. We are not here to barter away the interests of Ireland to any man, no matter how high his position, for flimsy promises. This is a matter of business. We want some earnest of your good intentions; and so long as I have a voice inside or outside this House, I shall advise my countrymen not to enter into any political confidence trick with the right hon. Gentleman or with anybody else, but to transact this political business in a sensible manner, and make the best terms they can, and submit these terms to their own countrymen. I have always looked upon a Tory Minister as an extremely foolish man. I could not help thinking last night that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary might, at least, without pressure from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, if he were wise, have gone one step further, and, at a time when a great sorrow, which has been shared in by the subjects of Her Majesty in this country and in Ireland, has fallen upon her, have advised Her Gracious Majesty, burdened down by her own sorrow, to relieve these poor convicts from what he must know, and does know, is the heaviest sorrow which can be inflicted upon poor suffering human beings. But as the right hon. Gentleman has not seen his way to do so, and as the right hon. Gentleman opposite has not seen his way to press him, I have only to content myself by declaring again that it is my profound conviction that the Irish people and their Representatives, whoever they may be, will never obtain real justice from any Party in this House until they are able to do what my lamented friend the late distinguished Member for Cork would have been able to do if you had allowed him to remain here to-day with his 86 men behind him—not to crave, not to appeal, as the hon. Member for North-East Cork has had to do, but to demand and compel, as we will have to compel any Party when they do it, to give over these political prisoners to the Irish people as a token of their good faith in this "Union of Hearts."

(4.20.) SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): The hon. Member who has just sat down seems to be under the impression that I have some disinclination to take part in this Debate. He is mistaken in that view; I have attended the greater part of this Debate with a desire to know whether there were anything new, either in fact or in arguments, to allege, as compared with

t had been stated in former Debates on this subject. I am sure the House feel that there has never been any on my part of taking that responsibility which properly belongs to me. I have been for many years a Member of this House, and I hope that charge does not fairly lie at my door, that I have not been ashamed to shirk in this case the burden of responsibility which has been laid upon me. I have paid careful attention to this Debate, and I think I have heard from the hon. and learned Member for Waterford the able and moderate speech that I heard last year. I have heard from the Secretary the same reply to that speech, that I heard last year also, I have not been able to discover in the course of this Debate any new allegations bearing upon the merits of the question. The hon. Member who has sat down said, probably for want of acquaintance with the proceedings of Law, that I suspended the action of the Explosives Act and brought the indictment under the Common Felony Act. If the hon. Gentleman were acquainted with the active proceedings of a Court of Law he must know that I had nothing whatever to do with one or the other, that I had no voice whatever in proceedings that should be taken against a prisoner. I am sure it is his want of acquaintance with the fact that he should have produced a charge as that against me. I have nothing whatever to do with the action of the indictment which was brought against these prisoners any more than he had himself. The Motion before the House is a general Motion for the safety of all dynamite offenders. But in the cases, I think, of two political offenders have been referred to—those the convicts Egan and Daly. As to the case of Egan, I have this to say: The Home Secretary has expressed his opinion that there are distinguishing circumstances in that case which might make it a proper subject for revision. All I say is that, if that be so, it is highly proper and highly fair that that should be taken into reconsideration with reference to political offenders whom long sentences have been passed. It is the duty of the Secretary of State carefully to inquire into any case in which any particular circumstances, not disclosed at the trial, come before him for consideration. With reference to long sentences passed upon any prisoners, without distinction, it is the practice that these cases are always brought under review after a certain period has elapsed; and during my time at the Home Office, I very greatly shortened the period at which the revision of long sentences should take place. These observations would refer to all criminal cases, quite apart from the case of political offences. As to the case of Daly, what is demanded, as I understand, is inquiry. I know of no inquiry so regular in a case that has been decided by a Judge and jury as the inquiry which is made by the Secretary of State on the allegations of any circumstances which, in the evidence brought forward at the trial, or outside that evidence, should supply the proper materials for the exercise of the prerogative of mercy of the Crown. But that inquiry has been made over and over again. It was made by myself, as it was my duty to make it. It was made by the present Home Secretary as inquiry is made by every Secretary of State in office when he has sufficient material to inquire into. It is quite idle, however, to complain of the materials brought before the Secretary of State not having been laid upon the Table of the House, because if that were done no such inquiry would be possible. The inquiry must necessarily be confidential. The inquiry must apply to every circumstance, however little, which bears either for or against the prisoners which might influence the decision or clemency of the Crown. That is the only inquiry which it is possible to make; and that inquiry, so far as Daly's case is concerned, has been made over and over again. Now, the Home Secretary has stated the result of his inquiry into that matter, and I quite concur, from my experience at the Home Office, in what he has stated. The allegation—no doubt a most serious allegation—that the bombs found upon Daly had been planted upon him by the police, has been inquired into by all the means which there are at the disposal of the Home Office; and I can only assert, in confirmation of what the Home Secretary said, that that charge is entirely unfounded. There is not a shadow of ground for that assertion. Besides that it is contradictory to the conduct and language of Daly himself. He had an opportunity at the trial of proving his own innocence, as every prisoner at his trial has. He never made a suggestion for one moment at the trial of a plot on the part of the police, nor certainly at any time that I have any cognisance of did he make any allegation to any person who visited him in the prison. Upon that point I must also confirm what the Home Secretary has said. I was convinced of his guilt by evidence that appeared to me as amply sufficient, that the bombs had been sent from America, and that they had been sent on the application of Daly himself. Therefore, upon the grounds put forward in this particular case, that there should be a revision of the sentence on account of a mistake, I, at least, must decline to admit the force of that argument. The case of Egan may be an open matter of consideration. The Home Secretary has all the material before him (which I have not) to enable him to form a judgment: He says he thinks there are grounds for dealing with that case in a manner different from other cases. I can only express my opinion that he will do right in giving them full consideration. Now as regards the case of Daly, I have stated fairly, and I hope sufficiently, what is my position. As to the general Motion, I have to ask myself first, separating the matter altogether from its political aspect, what is the character of the crime of these men?—what is his class of offence?—Is it one that in itself, apart from other considerations, commends itself to the leniency of the nation or the clemency of the Crown. That is the first question I ask. Now, what is the offence? In my opinion, it is the most heinous and grievous crime that can possibly be conceived. If I go over the whole category of crime I know none which is graver or more heinous than this. On account of the ease with which it can be committed, the terrible consequences that can ensue, the recklessness of the dangers which are created, the alarm and the suffering that are produced, these, in my opinion, are not equalled, certainly not surpassed, by any offences known in the calendar of crime. I have myself been a witness of the terrible sufferings of the victims of these outrages; innocent persons who will never recover from the consequences. A policeman in Westminster Hall, and the unfortunate travellers on the Metropolitan Railway when the bombs exploded there, were visited by me in the hospital. These are the victims of a crime with respect to which burglary or any other offence would seem to be comparatively venial. Therefore, I cannot look upon this crime as one to which any mitigating circumstances can attach, or which can or ought to be visited with leniency. That being so, at the same time I would ask the House to bear in mind that grievous as these crimes are, and punishable as they were with penal servitude, sentences of penal servitude are reviewed within a limited period. A sentence of 20 years is reviewed at a period that falls far short of the 20 years. They have always been so, although I have myself established a rule on which a revision takes place at a shorter period. The point we have now to consider is whether that review, whether the re-consideration in the case of these particular crimes should take place at a shorter period, and under more favourable circumstances, than in other cases. Now, I cannot, arrive at that conclusion from the character of the crime. Well, if not in the crime itself we are to look at the circumstances. What are the circumstances to be relied upon to take this class of crime, admittedly heinous in itself, out of the general rule which applies to all other prisoners. Because, mark you, in accepting a Resolution of this kind you come to a conclusion which is to say to all persons who are the subjects of the Queen, and who will be naturally influenced by the opinions of this House, that these crimes, for some reason or other, are to be dealt with in a more favourable manner than other crimes. Therefore we have a great responsibility. We must bear in mind that responsibility, and act upon it. If you are to say to the burglar and the garrotter, who have sentenced to penal servitude, are men who were sentenced special circumstances; and if you have been sentenced to 20 years' penal servitude, or penal servitude for life, you shall undergo your sentence, and these men will not." Sir, the burglar and the garrotter naturally ask why? and you as responsible Representatives of the people, be prepared to say why men are to be placed under a different category from the ordinary offenders. Because, Sir, if these who are sentenced to these offences are sentenced, while other men sentenced to 20 years' penal servitude are kept in prison, that would be a gross injustice, unless some sufficient reason can be adduced in favour of a distinction. Therefore, I bring before the House the responsibility involved in making these discriminating distinctions. Well, let us look what are the distinctions upon which these grave crimes are to be tried, and why they are to be treated in a different manner? The only reason I have heard alleged in this Debate—adduced with great force by the hon. Member who has just sat down—is that with great force and with some intelligence by the hon. Member for North Fermanagh—is, that these crimes are connected with Fenianism.

Sir William Harcourt

MR. W. REDMOND (North Fermanagh): I was very far from saying that these crimes were connected with Fenianism of the kind. What I said was this—that these men, instead of being convicted of dynamite offences, were convicted particularly and mainly because they were connected with the Fenian Organisation. The reason I gave was that these men were tried, many of them at any rate, to rate crimes by the tyranny exercised by successive English Governors in Ireland.

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT: That is exactly what I said and what I stood the hon. Member to say. If they were men of the Fenian organisation, and that they were convicted of Fenianism, and not of any other offence. They were undoubtedly indicted for dynamite and not for Fenianism, and the question is whether it was in consequence of the fact that they were guilty of treason-felony that they were indicted for dynamite. That is the only circumstance alleged in the Debate. There has been a great deal said about Fenianism, and I do not think the hon. Member for North Fermanagh will be of opinion that I do him any injustice when I say that he passed a glowing eulogium on Fenianism and the Fenians. I differ from him. I will not denounce his opinions, but he holds contrary opinions to myself on the subject of Fenianism. Sir, what I understand by Fenianism is this—that it is a secret association which professes to accomplish revolutionary objects by violence and outrage. (Cries of "No, no" from the Irish benches.) I am perfectly willing to hear the opinions of others on the subject, but that is my opinion, and I doubt very much whether persons calling themselves Fenians will object to my definition.

MR. W. REDMOND: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but will he allow me to point out that the Fenianism of these trials is that of 20 years ago, and that no man would more strongly repudiate the charge that they relied upon outrage of any kind than the men connected with these recent offences?

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT: That these outrages were connected with Fenianism is a matter upon which I have no doubt at all. The proof was absolutely complete; but I am willing to take the hon. Member's opinion that Fenianism does not rely upon outrage, but upon force.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): You said "outrage."

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT: I should like to know exactly what the "force" is. As arms of precision improve, so, no doubt, the methods of force may have advanced upon what they were in former times. I rely upon that, because I do not wish to enter upon any elaborate discussion upon the essence of Fenianism. I am really only endeavouring to express my own opinions. I understand I am desired to correct the phrase I employed, and therefore I will adopt the correction, and say that Fenianism is a secret association which professes to bring about revolutionary objects by force.

An hon. MEMBER : That is better.

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT : Sir, I have to ask myself whether the connection of crime with a doctrine of that kind is a mitigating circumstance, and I must confess that, thinking the matter over, I have arrived at the conclusion that it is not. The connection of crime with a doctrine of that kind is, I confess, not a mitigation but an aggravation, because the result is that it becomes not only a crime against an individual, but a crime against society. Therefore I cannot admit that that particular circumstance in itself constitutes any mitigation of the offence. Now, Sir, the hon. Member for North Fermanagh has been good enough to address himself a good deal to me. He passed a glowing eulogium upon what the Fenians had accomplished. He said they were, in fact, the authors of Home Rule, and that they had brought about the condition of things which has enabled me to adopt the principles of Home Rule. I am quite sure the hon. Member for North Fermanagh did not intend to misrepresent me in any way. But he is entirely mistaken. The connection of Fenianism with Home Rule was not that which induced me to accept Home Rule. It has always been my principal difficulty. And I venture to say I share that opinion with the great majority of the people of this country who are prepared to support Home Rule. The only difficulty which the people of Great Britain have had in adopting the principle of Home Rule is from the suspicion and the belief that it was in some way or other connected with Fenianism. The hon. Gentleman the Member for North Fermanagh attacked me for saying I was not in favour of Fenian Home Rule ; and I am sorry to find myself differing from him. I am not in favour of Fenian Home Rule, and I hope, and I do believe, that the great majority of the people of Ireland and of their Representatives are adverse to Fenianism and to Fenian Home Rule ; and I hope I express the opinions of the people of Great Britain when I say that it is because they believe that Home Rule is not connected with Fenianism, but that it is opposed to it, and that it will be an element in putting it down, that they are prepared to support the principle of Home Rule. Therefore, Sir, I desire to correct the impression under which the hon. Member for North Fermanagh seemed to be suffering when he reproached me for being against Fenian Home Rule.

DR. KENNY (Cork County, Southern Division) : Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me —

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT : The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity later. Sir, what we at least who have adopted the principle of Home Rule believe and hope—and we do believe and hope in that respect, that we are acting not only in conformity with the opinion of the great majority of the people of England, but of the great majority of the people of Ireland—is this, that the measure of self-government which we desire is one to be obtained by constitutional means and used in a constitutional way. That is the view that we have, and it must be our object. I hope it is your object in Ireland, as it is our object in Great Britain, to dissociate the notion of Irish self-government altogether from the notion of Fenianism, and the object that Fenians have at heart. I thought it necessary to say that, Sir, in consequence, not of the attack made upon me, but of the appeal which was made to me by the hon. Member for North Fermanagh. Therefore, Sir, in my opinion those who are sincerely favourable to Home Rule will do everything in their power to dissociate the conception of Irish self-government from the ideas and conceptions of the Fenians. For the reasons I have endeavoured frankly to state to the House I find myself unable to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. W. REDMOND : I desire, by way of personal explanation, to say I find no fault with the right hon. Gentleman for declaring against Fenian Home Rule ; but what we did find fault with him was for referring to some voters in the City of Cork as representatives of Fenian Home Rule and saying that Fenian Home Rule had received its death blow. These men who 20 years ago held opinions that were not sised in this House should not be subjected to sneers simply because their methods have been supplanted by the still more effectual methods of the late Mr. Parnell.

Sir William Harcourt

MR. TIMOTHY HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour Division): Sir, I think we have reason to be thankful to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby for the tone he has adopted. I am glad he has not been tempted into illying himself with a refusal to reconsider the case of these men. His one is more kindly and considerate than has been adopted on former occasions during these Debates. The last portion of his speech had reference to the question of Fenian Home Rule, and on that I would like to say that we have no objection to anything he has said, and that we will readily accept the definition of the plan and scope of Home Rule that he has laid down this evening. But what we do object to is this—that he used the expression “Parnell’s Fenian Home Rule,” and we take that to mean something which no Irishman would dare to repudiate. That observation applied to a plan specially defined, and to a man who, undoubtedly, by his life in this House, contributed more than any other man in this world to turn Fenianism into constitutional courses, and to turn the feelings of his countrymen, who had left their country with feelings of vengeance in their hearts, into constitutional courses. I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his statement, and I will say that our experience is that he has been distinguished for the careful consideration which he has given to the case of these prisoners. Sir, as regards the case of Egan, no new facts have been, or can be, presented. His case is the same as presented eight years ago. Last year the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary said that he was unable to draw any distinction between the cases of Daly and Egan, but I will ask the House to compare that statement with his definite promise last night that he would regard those cases as cases in which there was a material difference. I ask whether any additional facts have come to light since last year, or whether anything has occurred to influence him except the action taken by directing attention to the matter in this House. The right hon. Member for Derby and the Home Secretary, so far from weakening our case for inquiry, have strengthened it by the attitude they have taken up. At the trial, undoubtedly, a clear distinction was made between the two men in question, and the Judge evidently believed that it was the duty of the jury to draw a distinction between the two cases. The only evidence offered against Egan was that Daly lived in his house, and that letters had passed between them, although there was no evidence that they were on the subject of dynamite plots. Against that there was Daly’s declaration that he alone was responsible, and the same evidence might have convicted any person keeping a lodging house under the same circumstances. I maintain that were it not that Egan was an Irishman, and had been 10 years before in political sympathy with Daly’s opinions, the jury would never have found him guilty. When the jury returned, after a quarter of an hour’s absence, with a verdict of “guilty,” the Judge said—

“Those bombs were found in the possession of Daly. What I want to know is whether you find that Egan is a party to those bombs being prepared, and intended that a conspiracy should be carried out by the use of them?”

The Foreman said, “We are of opinion he was conspiring.” His Lordship seemed to be a very obstinate juror, and that conversation shows he thought the jury should not have returned such a verdict. The distinction between the cases of Daly and Egan was distinctly drawn there, and it was drawn further by the Judge in sentencing the two men. The right hon. Member for Derby as well as the Home Secretary have both complained of our endeavouring to give a political complexion to this question; but if anybody is to blame for these men being so regarded, it is those who are responsible for the prosecutions, and who arraigned them as political prisoners, as is shown by the terms of the indictment. The point of our argument is, that if you drag in the political question to make a conviction more easy, and expose these men to that disadvantage on their trial, you have no right now to deprive them of the advantage which follows a conviction for political offences. We deplore that any of our countrymen should have been led into the contemplation of violence, but we ask this House to consider whether the continuation of a policy of this kind would contribute to the better government of the Empire. Almost every agitation in Ireland has arisen upon such a question as we are discussing now. Requests for the amnesty of political prisoners have been allowed to rest by the Government of the day until they gathered force and weight, and so laid the foundation for fresh political agitations. Is it not a remarkable fact that the allegation with regard to Daly has not come from these benches or originated in Ireland, but that the statement that the bombs were planted upon him was made by the Chief Constable of Birmingham, Mr. Farndale, who could have no sympathy with our movement, and who was in charge of the Detective Department which was watching Daly? Daly was found in the possession of bombs, but the whole question is whether there is any truth in the allegation that they were planted upon him by the Irish police. It is clear that the police during seven months never lost sight of Daly, except during the one short period when he received the bombs, and it is a remarkable fact that they were ready at the railway station to receive him, and had an empty bag with them to take the bombs. Even if it had not been for the statement of Mr. Farndale, in that fact alone we have sufficient evidence to compel the conviction that, at all events, an inquiry should be instituted. It was said in the course of this debate by someone on the Treasury Bench that Farndale was not produced at the trial because he knew nothing about the case.

MR. MATTHEWS: I made an observation about the time, but I did not say Mr. Farndale knew nothing about the case, but that he gave no evidence about the circumstances.

MR. HARRINGTON: I maintain that he could have given evidence as to the circumstances, and that his evidence would have been of the utmost importance. I find from the report of the trial, that Daly commented upon the fact that Mr. Farndale had been kept out of the witness box. He referred to Mr. Farndale as the gentleman who pulled the wires, and asked why he was not put into the witness box so that they might find out how the wires had been pulled. Without going back upon the arguments which have been used, I wish to call attention to the time at which this trial took place. The prisoners complained of the newspaper comments made while the trial was in progress, and the newspaper I have here heads the report of the trial, day after day, with "Dynamite Plot." I was only a very young Member of this House when the right hon. Member for Derby proposed his Explosives Bill, and I think I am making no observation which will be offensive when I say that if at that time an allegation had been made against me, as an Irishman, of being connected with dynamite plots, I should have been very unwilling to entrust myself to a jury composed of gentlemen of the opinions held by the right hon. Gentleman at that time. I shall never forget the impression made upon me when the right hon. Gentleman proposed his Explosives Bill, and it was carried through its three stages in one night with all the solemnity and all the appearance of gravity, and I would almost say, of terror, as if the largest invading army in Europe had been at hand. I do not want to make a point against the right hon. Gentleman, but I think while those unfortunate explosions were taking place he would not have been a bit surprised to hear that some Irish Member was connected with them. Is it unreasonable that we should ask the House to reconsider the case of men tried at a time when the country was in this state? We believe that when the danger is past and the terror is gone, and when the exceptional means which were taken at the time to protect public buildings and the lives of the people have been effectual, a continuance of the imprisonment of these men becomes vindictive, and only gives cause for further agitation and disturbance in the future.

*(5.25.) MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY (Londonderry): I do not intend to keep the House very long in making the observations I wish to offer on this question. I listened with much interest and attention to the right hon. Member for Derby, and there was much he said which I thought moderate and fair, and on the whole sympathetic; but there were many passages in that speech with which I could not find myself in agreement. I think he was unfair—not, of course, consciously, but, at all events, historically—in the view he took of the Fenian movement and the general purposes of the Fenians. He said they meant revolution of some kind by outrage, and he seemed to think that there was some connection between the Fenians and dynamite; and I find that such an impression does prevail, and is honestly and sincerely entertained, by many fair-minded men. I want, therefore, to point out to the House that Fenianism and dynamite have absolutely nothing to do with each other. The Fenians were a revolutionary party, but they never had to do with outrage by dynamite or any crime of the kind. I am sorry the right hon. Member for Derby did not on this question consult the Home Secretary, for that right hon. Gentleman would have told him that he had at one time very much higher opinions of the leaders of the Fenian movement than he admits now. But a Member of this House does not need to consult anybody as to what the purposes of the Fenians were, for they made those purposes known in proclamations and in action. They professed themselves to be a body of men who despaired of obtaining a national Government for Ireland by anything but force. I am not praising their policy, or saying it was a wise or possible policy, but it was published to the world. I remember when the Fenian headquarters were opened in Union Square, in New York, that people went in and out as they would do to a public office; that reporters for the Press went in and out also, and that the proceedings were constantly published in all the American newspapers. The Fenians crossed into Canada to endeavour to strike a blow at English power there; they arose in arms in Ireland in several places, and they endeavoured to capture Chester Castle. All these were things which, you will say, were foolish and hopeless; but they had nothing to do with outrage or with crime of any kind beyond the crime, of course, of resisting the existing law. It is unfortunate that since there was an Act of Parliament passed in one night through the House against dynamite outrages, persons supposed to be guilty of such offences were not tried under that particular Act. It was rather doing an injustice to the poor old Treason Felony Act to arraign any dynamiters under its provisions. The Treason Felony Act was passed in 1848 to put down the Young Ireland movement, which was composed of men of undoubted honour, and no one of whom was ever charged by his bitterest opponents with the slightest sympathy with crime and outrage. What was the purpose of that Act? It was never intended to have reference to dynamite, for, at the time it was passed, dynamite outrage of any kind against individuals or communities was never dreamed of as a weapon of political warfare. These men were tried under this Act and convicted. It is now admitted that, in the case of Egan, a certain distinction ought to be made, and the hon. Member who spoke just before me made a good point when he said that nothing whatever new had been brought forward in the case of Egan, and if, therefore, the Government, out of its own moral consciousness, found something to be said for him, why should they not find that there was something to be said for Daly, in the sense of being in favour of further inquiry. It is no doubt a good rule of law that the Government should accept, as a rule, the verdict of a jury, but there are many cases in which the Crown has upset the verdict of a jury. There is the case mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Cork, of the men charged with the murder of a policeman at Manchester. There are some striking facts about this case which the House probably does not remember. There was a panic in the public mind at the time, and an attempt was made to rescue certain Fenian prisoners. In the course of that rescue a policeman was killed, and that was undoubtedly, in the legal sense, murder, as the attempt to rescue was against the law. Five men were brought to trial on the charge of murder, and exactly the same evidence of identification was given in the case of each man. There was no doubt as to the facts, and the only question was who were the men immediately concerned in the act. The same identification was given in each case, and the men were convicted, the learned Judge, I believe, expressing his approval of the conviction. In the case of one of the men, Thomas Maguire, the reporters of all sections of the Press present at the trial came to the conviction that he was not one of the men concerned in the offence, and they sent a memorial to that effect to the Government. An inquiry was made, and it was found that this man was a Marine, innocent of all sympathy with the Fenian movement, of unstained character, and a loyal servant of the Crown. He was immediately set at liberty. Another of the men, named Condon, was unquestionably mixed up with the Fenian movement, but the point was whether he was mixed up with this attempt. In his case the American Government intervened, and addressed some kind of remonstrance to Her Majesty's Government, and though nobody knew what the terms of it were, the impression got abroad that the American Minister was able to show that Condon could not possibly have been concerned in the attempt, or even near the doors of the prison van at the time. That man, too, was at once set at liberty. These cases show that the verdicts of juries are not always conclusive of the guilt of prisoners, especially when men's minds are stirred by political passion and panic. Let us remember at what time Daly and the other men were convicted under the Act. There was a perfect scare and panic all over the country, and I do not wonder at it. Men's minds were kept at a stretch and strain, and one's faith in human nature seemed almost exhausted, and you could not tell at what moment or in what place some yet more hideous development of crime might take place. It was at that time these men were tried. It was one of those periods in our history when that most fatal impulse was abroad, "Somebody must be brought to trial; somebody must be found guilty." Both Judges and juries are full of human nature, and is it not extremely likely that there was a sort of conviction beforehand that anybody tried on a dynamite charge was, at least, likely to be guilty; and did not this lead to longer sentences being passed than would have been inflicted in calmer moments? They were passed, no doubt, with the honest conviction that a harsher punishment was more likely to put down the crime; there was at that time in the minds of Judges and juries the one resolve to crush this conspiracy. Now we have come to calmer moments. That dynamite wave has spent its force. All that time it was found breaking out here, there, and everywhere; now that has passed, and everyone sees the utter folly as well as crime of trying to overthrow great political associations by the murder of a few innocent persons. Is it not now time, since these men have suffered terribly, when the right hon. Gentleman may fairly say that whatever they have been, they have suffered severely, and the interest of the whole community, as well as the common sympathies of human nature, will admit that they should at last be released from their bondage?

*(545.) MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I do not wish to add anything to what the right hon. Gentleman has just said; but, Sir, I do wish to enter my protest against the attempt which has been made by the Home Secretary, and also by the ex-Home Secretary, and of recalling to the House not the circumstances under which these men were convicted, but the outrages themselves, which attempt was made for the purpose of creating in this House and in the country a fresh feeling against these men, in order that their prison doors may remain locked. I protest against that, and say it is unworthy of men occupying the position which they occupy to appeal to prejudices of that kind. I wish, Sir, to say a few words on the case of Daly. The right hon. Gentleman states that after very careful inquiry he has come to the conclusion that Daly was properly convicted. There are, however, one or two circumstances in the case to which wish to draw attention. The Head constable at Birmingham stated to the Irish Committee, to exonerate him, when asked why he did not arrest the man who gave Daly the dynamite, that he believed Daly's conviction was due to a plant on Daly by the emissaries of the Irish police. The right hon. Gentleman says he has satisfied himself that there is no ground for that charge, and he said last Session that he came to that conclusion on documentary evidence. Why cannot produce that documentary evidence, let us see for ourselves whether it is satisfactory or not? Is that evidence letter of which we have now heard the first time as having been written by Daly to a man in America named Breslin? If it be so the House, I think, attach very little importance to it. I am reminded by my friend that Breslin is the very man from whom Pigott stated that he received letters which were proved to be forgeries. There is a point in the Daly case which really calls for further explanation on the right hon. Gentleman's part. He wishes us to believe that the police arrested Daly by accident. They had watched him night and day for seven months, and I never seen anything suspicious in his behaviour. Did they know who he was going to see when he started for Liverpool? They knew he received the telegram, and from whom he received it, and yet we are asked to believe that they lost him the moment he arrived in Liverpool, and for two days could not find him. Yet they never thought of going to the house of the man from whom the telegram came; but it was the owner of the house who gave information to the police as to the station at which he would leave Liverpool, at the time. The right hon. Gentleman says he has inquired fully into the matter. I do not think his information is quite so accurate as it ought to be. He told us for the first time last night that dynamite was sent by an American called Breslin, in America, to a man in Liverpool, and was handed by him to Daly. Someone in the House shouted out "Macdermott," and the right hon. Gentleman at once accepted the name.

Mr. H. MATTHEWS dissented.

MR. MAHONY: I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say it had been sent from Macdermott to Daly.

MR. H. MATTHEWS: I certainly did not say so.

MR. MAHONY: The dynamite was sent from Breslin to a man in Liverpool.

MR. H. MATTHEWS: I did not say that.

MR. MAHONY: The right hon. Gentleman did, I think, say that Daly had written to a man in America called Breslin?

MR. H. MATTHEWS: That I did say.

MR. MAHONY: And that Breslin sent dynamite which reached the possession of a man in Liverpool, and that from that man's possession it came into the possession of Daly?

MR. H. MATTHEWS: I said nothing about how it came into the possession of Daly.

MR. MAHONY: It is admitted that it came into the possession of Daly. Daly went into a certain house in Liverpool well known to the police, and the owner of which told the police where Daly was going from.

MR. H. MATTHEWS: All that is the hon. Member's, not mine.

MR. MAHONY: Does the right hon. Gentleman deny it? The whole case made for Daly is that he was asked by a friend to take a parcel and to put it away. Some of Daly's questions at the trial showed that he began to suspect that his friend had played him a trick, and our case is that Daly was not the man to turn on a friend unless he was sure that friend had treated him in a dastardly and cowardly fashion. He could not make out that case for himself, and so we are making it for him. The right hon. Gentleman denies that the cases of the 16 men were political, and says that they were cases of crimes of ordinary and very horrible character. He says that Daly is a fanatic. If he be, what made him a fanatic? What made O'Donovan Rossa sympathise with dynamite? It was the treatment of Ireland by the British Government, and his treatment in gaol after his conviction which made Rossa a dynamitard. You cannot treat men, even if they be Irishmen, as dogs without rousing the spirit of resistance and retaliation. An

hon. Member opposite said that treason was the worst of crimes. So it is, if Government be free; but if Government be oppressive, sordid, and corrupt, treason is not a crime, it is a virtue. I am old enough to remember the landing of Garibaldi, and no crowned head ever had such a reception in this country at the hands of the English people. And yet, was he not guilty of treason? Did he not sympathise with assassination? Why, Agesilao Milano was guilty of attempted assassination with his own hand, and yet Garibaldi's first act after he had accomplished the freedom of the two Sicilies was to grant a pension to this man. Yes, and I ask how did you receive Garibaldi who wrote about another man, who not only attempted assassination, but succeeded in assassination, the man who assassinated Rossi in the City of Rome—Rossi the Prime Minister of the Pope? This is how Garibaldi treated that assassination—

"The old world city being worthy on that day of ancient glory freed itself of a most dangerous satellite of tyranny, and bathed the marble steps of the Capitol in his blood. A Roman youth had found once more the steel of Marcus Brutus."

That man, Garibaldi, you received in this country with acclamation, and yet you raise up your hands in pious horror against men who dare to justify political movements, in which those connected with them never advocated, and never attempted, political assassination. (Cheers.) Yes, you are horrified at us for daring to speak in words of praise of men who have been guilty of treason; when it is a Greek, when it is a Bulgarian, when it is an Italian; aye, when it is anything but an Irishman, then these same men are not infamous, but are heroes. We have not justified the use of dynamite. We have deplored it. We have condemned it; but what we do say is this—that you cannot in honesty refuse to regard the motives which influenced these men. We have heard a good deal of the necessity for continuing the punishment of these men in order to prevent a recurrence of these offences. Is there any single Member in this House who believes in his heart that by keeping those men in gaol one single day longer you will do anything towards the prevention of the recurrence of these crimes? There is no danger of their revival. I say no danger; but if there were any danger, it would be caused by such things as the harsh treatment of these men in Portland Gaol, and the feeling started by such treatment as that. Cannot you look, even for once, when it does affect Ireland; cannot you look at the other side of the punishment. Cannot you look at the reclamation of the criminal? Cannot you acknowledge that these men were not guilty of a selfish crime; that they had nothing to gain for themselves by these acts, bad as they were—terrible as they were. They had nothing to gain for themselves. Their only motive was not a selfish motive, for all they sought to accomplish was to direct attention to the grievances of their country. It may be useless to appeal for them. The Gentlemen opposite do not admit that we have grievances of which we have a right to complain, but of which we intend to complain, until they are remedied; but Members sitting upon this side of the House do acknowledge that we have a right to complain; they do acknowledge that we have grievances which must still be remedied; still more do they acknowledge that some years ago these grievances were of a trying character. If you acknowledge that, surely you must acknowledge also your responsibility for those grievances, for it is only lately, only within the last few years, that you have been made to acknowledge that these grievances existed. There is not a Member in the House who can free himself from responsibility in the cause which led these men to commit these crimes. Cannot you let that responsibility actuate you in the direction of extending to these men the mercy of the Crown? That is all we ask. We ask you to say, not that these men have not been guilty of the crimes of the terrible character charged against them, but that the danger of the recurrence of those crimes is past; that these men have suffered sufficiently for their offences against society; that they have suffered terribly; that their motives were not selfish; and that their cases deserve re-consideration. Their motives were such as to prove that somewhere in their hearts there is good. I appeal to this House, I appeal especially to hon. Members upon these Benches, to direct their attention not to future punishment, but by an act of mercy to try to increase the good that is in these men; to give these men some chance, yes, some chance of making some reparation to their fellow-countrymen, some reparation for evils which, in a mistaken moment, by a mistaken judgment, they were led to commit.

*(6.10.) MR. HENRY JOHN ROBY (Eccles): I have listened attentively to the speeches that have been made upon this question, but I cannot pretend to have any acquaintance, more than the merest recollection of the matter, except what I have heard in the course of the Debate. I do not for one moment desire to separate myself from the remarks which have been made by many speakers as to the perfect fairness of the trial which took place, and the perfectly conscientious action of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Derry has very fully expressed the circumstances under which the trial took place, and I accept his statement of the circumstances as one of the grounds on which I am inclined to vote for this Motion. The admirable speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has, I think, pleased all parts of the House; but there was one portion of his speech which I feel I must separate myself from. He pointedly put the question towards the end of his speech—What is there in the offences that these men have committed that separates them from the ordinary class of prisoners who have been sentenced to long periods of imprisonment? The answer is in the words of the Amendment; it is an answer in very plain language, that it differed upon the ground of the political character of the offence of those—

"who have been for years undergoing punishment for offences arising out of insurrectionary movements connected with Ireland."

I cannot agree with the hon. Member for Deptford and others who consider that treason-felony or treason, in any form, the highest offence in morals. In law no doubt it is. Law and morals have different rules and principles. In law you have to regard the facility with which the offence may be committed, the great danger which may arise from it, the terror which it may inspire; but the motives of the persons actuated may be entirely different. The motive, in a question of morals, bears almost the whole weight of the burden, and I think the motive of persons engaged in insurrection should be weighed in different scales from the motives for common offences of persons who commit private crimes. I do not think that you ought to confine for the same period those persons who have been guilty of acts of brutality, and those persons who, through enthusiasm, or political folly, or sometimes from very high motives of self-devotion, have committed crimes and have brought themselves under the laws of their country. The political character of the offence does legitimately and rightly diminish the horror and the severe judgment we should pass upon such crimes. I believe there has been some little miscarriage of justice in the case of Egan, and I cannot free myself from some suspicion in regard to the case of Daly. I cannot believe, at least without knowledge of such other facts as may have been before the Home Secretary, that the head of the police in Birmingham would have made such a definite and distinct statement if there was really nothing in it. I do not, however, put my vote upon these grounds. I say first, in the case of political prisoners, such as Smith O'Brien, and others, the clemency of the Crown has been exercised, and I think there are now grounds for that clemency being extended to some of the prisoners now referred to. I do not mean by voting for the Amendment that I definitely ask for the speedy release of all of them; what I ask is that the Home Secretary shall consider the cases of all those prisoners, having regard to the fact that the movement was an insurrectionary movement, and that they have now endured a very long and severe sentence—nine years' penal servitude—which I think may be regarded, under present circumstances, as sufficient. I do not want to imply that the Home Secretary has not given full consideration, as he thought at the time, to these cases. But time is in some degree, in the case of penal servitude, the very essence of the question. It is now half a year since we refused, last August, to accept this Motion. Half a year is nothing ; and if by an act of mercy he can, without destroying respect for justice, do anything which will help to relieve misery in some degree and to soothe national difficulties, I appeal to him to do so.

(6.18.) MR. JOHN DILLON (East Mayo) : In dealing with the question before the House I shall confine myself to two points only. But, first of all, I wish to say a few words of a personal character in reference to the prisoner Daly, with whom I was at one time very intimately acquainted. It is many years ago since I knew John Daly. I say at once, and I am not ashamed to admit it, that in those days I was very intimately associated with the Fenian movement, and amongst others with whom I came in contact was Mr. John Daly. I travelled for weeks in his company. I was associated very closely with him in some political campaigns, and I am bound to say that I formed a very high opinion of John Daly. He was a man who, I believe, was an artizan, but he was an extremely exceptional and intelligent artizan, and at the time that I knew him he was certainly a most effective and powerful political advocate in the cause in which we were working. During these times we had talked over Irish matters; we differed in those days as I suppose he has differed from me in the years that have elapsed since then. He was then of the opinion that there was no hope for Irish liberty except in a recourse to arms. I did not share his views, and, of course, I always tried to impress upon my countryman that there was other hope than in an appeal to arms ; but in those confidential conversations, and there was not at that time any conceivable reason for his concealing his thoughts from me, he repudiated all form of crime except resistance in open arms. I bear that testimony to the political character of John Daly. At the time that I was associated with him his political opinions were thoroughly well formed, and I think, as I am just reminded, that he was then engaged in agitating, 20 years ago, for the amnesty of the political prisoners. They have long since been released from gaol, and many of them have been engaged in exercising their influence to strengthen the hands of Mr. Parnell, the late hon. Member for Cork, in substituting constitutional movements for the movements for connection with which they were convicted. I have listened to the Debate ; and from my knowledge of those days, I should be astonished, and very much pained, if the conviction were brought home to my mind, that John Daly had so changed his political principles as to join in such a conspiracy. The only thing I wish to say in reference to the observations that have fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, is that I do not see how it is expected—and I suppose that will be the object of Irish Members who join in this Debate—that we can increase the prospects of opening the prison doors of these men, as we all desire to do, by quarrelling with the Government. There were some observations in his speech to which I must take exception from my own knowledge of the Fenian Organisation. The right hon. Gentleman has, I think, some prejudice against them. The history of that movement was brought to the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman by other channels than those which we possess ; but I am perfectly sure, had it been brought to his knowledge by channels other than those he has been obliged to use, he would be the first man to see no injustice in the movement. The fact that John Daly and the other prisoners whose cases are now being considered, were supposed to have been connected with the old Fenian Organisation, and largely engaged in treasonable practices in the past, raised in his mind a presumption that they were likely to be connected with those dynamite outrages.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT : No; I argued that the crime was a grave one, but that I did not think, because it was a political offence, that it was a mitigating fact; but at the same time I carefully abstained from saying that it was an aggravation.

MR. DILLON : I can understand now what his point was ; but considering the state of excitement in which the English public mind was at the time, it is perfectly conceivable how, if it was proved to be a fact that John Daly was a member of the Fenian Organisation, it should be supposed that he was also engaged in treasonable practices, and that that would prejudice the minds of the jury against them. The newspapers were then full of dynamite outrages, and the jury would be more inclined to convict of dynamite outrage if it had been proved that the prisoner had been connected with the Fenian Organisation. To any person who knew Ireland the fact would have been apparent that if he had been an old Fenian he could not have been a dynamiter; for not one or two, but the whole body, without a single exception, set their face, from the beginning, against outrage and crime. So much was that the case that in Dublin it was reported by the police that as the Fenian Organisation spread, agrarian outrage decreased, and that that was one reason why they knew that the Organisation was extending. I bring that forward to show how people might have been influenced on the trial in connection with the Fenian Organisation, whereas the real question upon which they were tried was whether they were connected with the dynamite outrages. I take it that every Member of this House agrees that punishment should be preventative and not vindictive. If it can be proved that the release of these men would be no encouragement to crime of the same character, but that it would have an opposite effect—that it would have a soothing effect—upon the minds of people all over the world, and that it would have no tendency to reproduce those crimes, I think there is not a single Member in the House who would oppose the Motion. What has been the universal experience of those amnesties—the experience not of Ireland, but of all the world over? The experience in all countries, the experience of all mankind, has been that, after a movement which the State is bound to put down for its own protection, has been put down, and effectually crushed, the best means to defend the State against similar movements in the future is to exhibit a generous clemency to the men found guilty. And I venture to say that the past experience of Ireland fully bears this out. This process in which we are now engaged, of moving for the release of political prisoners, is a chronic process, unhappily, so far as Ireland is concerned; and I venture to say this here, that I think that those who have been responsible for the Government in Ireland in the past, and agreed to amnesty, will admit that the result of amnesty for Irish political prisoners has always been satisfactory. Of course, I feel bound to admit that it is the right, even the duty, of the State, although sometimes it may be very mistaken—it is the right and the duty of the Ministers of this country to punish offences of the nature of treason and treason felony, and still more if they are clearly proved offences of the character which are charged against these men. I say that in no country in the world has it been more clearly or fully proved that the proper way to put an end to these offences, and the only way to put an end to these offences, is not by savage and cruel punishments, but by controlling and cutting away the roots from which they spring. And if to-day we find that the crop, the unhappily perennial crop, of political prisoners in Ireland is beginning to fall off—and for a considerable time, thank goodness, we have had no trials for treason, or treason felony, and severe sentences of penal servitude passed in connection with Irish politics—the cause of that is not to be sought in passionate convictions and severe sentences passed on political prisoners in times of panic; it is to be sought in the fact that a new hope has sprung up in the minds of the Irish people; that we have been able to remove these views from the minds and hearts of our people, and induced them to look to this House and to constitutional methods for redress. And for my part I felt to-day that I should not remain silent without making this appeal to hon. Members on all sides of the House to do this crowning act of clemency; and if you grant it I believe that the effect of it all through the ages to come will be to decrease revolutions in Ireland and those political trials which in the past have been a disgrace to this country. And, Mr. Speaker, I do sincerely believe, if the request embodied in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford be granted and conceded, that not a single Member of this House will ever have the slightest reason to regret it.

*(6.35.) MR. HENRY JOSEPH WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I do not intend to trouble the House for any length of time with a review of the arguments which have been brought forward on one side or the other. But under the circumstances I do not wish to give a silent vote on this motion, and I desire to tell the House in one single sentence why I intend to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford. I attended the trial in Ireland of certain men put upon trial for their lives, and I heard much that was interesting and shocking to me as to how such proceedings were conducted. I shall never forget one sentence which was uttered by the distinguished Counsel representing the prisoners, The Mac Dermott, who, in speaking of the grievances of which they had to complain, said—

"You first drive men mad by your methods of misgovernment, and then you seek to hang them for being mad."

Now, it is because I believe that the methods of misgovernment by which Ireland has been oppressed for many a year has driven many Irishmen at least temporarily mad—because I think that these men in these cases under consideration have been sufficiently punished for this temporary madness—that I have not had, during this Debate, the slightest hesitation in making up my mind to vote for the Amendment.

(6.37.) DR. JOSEPH E. KENNY (Cork Co., S.): I am glad the hon. Member for East Mayo has interposed in this Debate, because he has been able to give, for the first time, a description of the character of Mr. Daly, and that the House might be able to judge whether he was a likely subject, from his personal experience of him, to develop into a dynamitard. I think the House—any fair judging man—who has heard the description of him, will come to the conclusion that he was not of the stuff of which dynamitards are made. The hon. Member for East Mayo has applied to me to appeal to Gentlemen who sit on these Benches around me not to say anything irritating to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. Well, Sir, I disclaim at once any desire of saying anything irritating to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. But there are some passages in the right hon. Member for Derby's speech to which I must take exception. In listening to that speech, the impression produced on one's mind would be that there was nothing, at all events in its mode, to which objection could be taken; but I think a little reflection will show that the purpose underneath it was not by any means so mild; and I take it from this fact, because the right hon. Gentleman, on a question like this, which is a question for taking a high and generous view of matters now passed into oblivion, and for endeavouring to put an end finally and for ever to a most disgraceful episode to this country—that in a debate of this kind the right hon. Gentleman should have let fall from him consciously or otherwise observations which, I am bound to say, are more or less graven on the episodes to which they refer. I have also exception to take to his definition of what Fenianism was or was meant to be, and I entirely object to his forming a new dictionary of what is meant by outrage. He has attempted in his speech to make out that it is an act of outrage to do acts of violence whenever these acts may be done in forwarding a revolutionary movement. I take exception to it, and I think he had no right to introduce it, and I take exception to his attempt to fasten on my dead leader, whom I shall always hold in honour, and whose death he and his friends contributed to bring about, that he should attribute to him a sentiment which was expressed in words of his own. He spoke of Fenian Home Rule and he spoke of it in his speech as Mr. Parnell's Home Rule, thereby intending to convey that the Home Rule Mr. Parnell had in his mind was Fenianism, while he knew as well as any man living that Mr. Parnell of all men was the least likely to adopt Fenianism as a shibboleth or cry, and that he above all men had weaned the minds of the Irish people from the paths of Fenianism, and shown them hem that there was an alternative by which they could gain all they hoped or, and for which they were prepared to suffer and die. He says it was not Fenianism convinced him of Home Rule, but I wrote to put this query to him—was it not Fenianism that had made possible the acceptance of the alternative Mr. Parnell had pointed out? Did not he take his choice, and did not his colleagues take their choice, and would not this country alternately take its choice between Home Rule, provided it was full and complete, and the other alternative of a constant recrudescence of Fenianism and such movements. From beginning to end of the arguments, I am bound to say that with the form of the Home Secretary's observations I have no fault to find; but I think he bitterly disappointed me that, in the eleventh hour of the existence of the Government, he could not take heart of grace and, for once at all events, seize the opportunity offered him for doing a gracious act. Instead of that, he has endeavoured to prove that the offence out of which the subject of our present Debate has grown was of a non-political character, and that the perpetrators of these outrages were not to be distinguished from ordinary criminals. My hon. Friend the Member for Derry City pointed out in very forcible language the gross abuse that was made of the Treason Felony Act in connection with these prosecutions. The right hon. Gentleman found himself under the necessity of undertaking to prove that there was no political element in this matter. Will he deny that misgovernment is fons et origo of the whole matter? Will he assert that in Ireland there ever would have been dynamite outrage, or anything approaching it, if the government of the country were what it ought to be; and will he deny—I know he cannot—that misgovernment, as he himself in former days fully acknowledged, was at the bottom of Irish Fenianism and similar movements? He cannot divest himself of some of the responsibility of having created to some extent the political crimes with which we are now concerned. The Member for Deptford said these men could have been tried for treason, as they ought to have been,

which he held to be the greatest of crimes. If they had been, we never would have had this Debate, for then they would have been executed. The moment he said these men ought to have been tried for high treason he gave away, though he did not intend it, his Leader, whom he was imitating in his speech. If they had been tried for treason, would anyone say that that was not a political offence? For the Treason Felony Act was brought in to produce on men's minds this very impression: that the political movement for the amelioration of the condition of the country was in itself a criminal movement; that is to say, in itself morally culpable, as well as culpable, in the eye of the law. And the Government of the day knew well the difficulty of getting capital convictions on charges of high treason, as the public opinion of all Europe was in favour of altering intolerable political conditions by a revolutionary movement. The Treason Felony Act was introduced for the purpose of getting rid of having political traitors, as they were called, tried and executed. I wish to say one word with regard to Daly. Undoubtedly, anyone who has read the Report, which the right hon. Gentleman considered at least a perfectly satisfactory Report—satisfactory and convincing to his mind, that these prisoners suffered no ill-treatment—cannot read that Report without coming to the conclusion, if they are fair-minded men, that, without breaking a single rule of prison government, these men have been subjected to a series of petty annoyances at the hands of petty officials, which constituted a persecution in itself. There is evidence in the whole Report of that, but I will take one item which I think the right hon. Gentleman, in fairness, ought to take into consideration. It is admitted, and no attempt has been made to deny it, that Daly was poisoned three times. I am not going to insinuate that that poisoning had any more culpability in it than carelessness. Knowing something of the subject, I laugh to scorn all the excuses given that that preparation which poisoned Daly had got undue strength. Anyone who knows anything about Government contracts would laugh at the idea of a drug being of undue strength, whatever it might be to be under strength. But if we take it in this way: Supposing Daly's sentence had expired, and the poisoning had occurred on the day of his discharge, he would have resumed his civil rights on that day. Would it not have been perfectly open to him to bring an action for damages for what he had suffered through this culpable negligence? The right hon. Gentleman knows it would; and I cannot but think that, in fairness to a man who has suffered so grievously as Daly, through this accidental poisoning, he ought to be moved through that element alone, in the consideration of Daly's case, to allow a large and immediate remission of his sentence. I hope the right hon. Gentleman may yet take that into consideration. He made, in my opinion, an exceedingly unfair allusion in a Debate of this kind to the letters addressed by Daly to Breslin. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, in speaking, further added that Daly never developed his theory at any period of the trial, as he could have done, that the bombs were planted on him by an agent of the police. Now, I find that at the very trial there is evidence that Daly had not invented the story. Daly commented in his speech on the fact that Mr. Farndale was not produced, clearly showing that he had in his mind that if Mr. Farndale were produced he would be able to put him such a series of questions as would trace the methods in which the bombs came into his possession. I was sorry to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby insinuating that this was an afterthought on the part of Daly. The right hon. Gentleman says he was perfectly satisfied as to the genuineness of the letter Daly addressed to Breslin. I ask him was he not perfectly satisfied of the genuineness of Richard Pigott's famous letter? The Times, his ally, was perfectly satisfied. I venture to say that if this Motion were granted, and an open inquiry were held, another friend of the right hon. Gentleman might be found as being the inventor, the writer, and the sender of the letter. I allude to his friend Mr. MacDermott, who has been of such inestimable service to his Government. Daly most vehemently denies that he ever addressed a letter to Breslin, and that he received any reply whatever from Breslin; and he asserts from the beginning that the bombs were planted on him by a man whom he thought at one time was his friend, but who, it was shown from subsequent events, was a traitor to him and a paid agent of the Irish Police. There was another man indicted and convicted on the same indictment as Daly and Egan—I refer to the man MacDonnell. He was convicted of treason-felony, and not convicted of connection with crime or outrage. Why was not MacDonnell, who was set at liberty, not put in prison? No; the political element was introduced into the case to rouse the passions of the jury and get a conviction; and getting a conviction on the political element the punishment was meted out on the dynamite. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman now to say whether he will not take into consideration these facts and release these men from their confinement, which has been of so cruel a character. If he releases those men who were actuated by no sordid, but by high and lofty, motives, he will do an act calculated better far to do credit to his Government and to bring about the pacification of Ireland, and to establish the English name in the eyes of the world, than if he were to introduce a thousand Local Government Bills.

(7.3.) MR. R. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange Division): Sir, I regret I find it impossible to go the length which the Amendment invites me. If the Amendment had merely proposed an investigation into the cases of the men who were found guilty, I should have been quite ready, under the circumstances, to support it, though, as a general rule, I deprecate the re-opening of criminal trials in the House of Commons. If the majority of the Representatives of the Irish people desired an investigation, I should not, in ordinary circumstances, feel disposed to vote against it. But the Amendment goes much further than that, and to vote for the Amendment one must commit oneself to this—that men rightly convicted rdynamite outrages should be released. o far as society is concerned, the time of which these men were convicted as the most serious that could be committed, and the question of their motives cannot in my view mitigate its gravity. It must be obvious that if society is to maintain its security, it is impossible to allow men to manufacture dynamite bombs without visiting their offence with the utmost severity of the law. There is, so far as the result is concerned, no difference between the men who are misguided and who act from patriotic motives and the men who are actuated by selfish brutality. Society cannot take that into account. Its first duty is to preserve the lives and limbs of its citizens, and nothing short of the severest penalty of the law would be adequate punishment for these dynamiters if they were guilty. Sir, the Amendment seems to me to come at an inopportune time. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down put my difficulty very well when he said that it was a question between Home Rule and a rerudescence of those outrages.

Dr. Joseph E. Kenny

DR. KENNY: I said nothing of the kind. What I said was that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby said that the choice of his Party lay between the continuance of Fenianism and the granting of Home Rule, which would for ever put an end to the necessity for Fenianism to exist at all.

MR. NEVILLE: I daresay I took the words down wrongly. What I understood the hon. Gentleman to say was that so long as the existing conditions between this country and Ireland subsisted you will have a rerudescence of these outrages. But supposing that by either Political Party a sufficient measure of self-government is accorded to Ireland—a measure they are disposed to accept—I think it would be expedient, if not necessary, that it should be accompanied by a full amnesty to all who are suffering for political or quasi-political offences, and I would give carte blanche to the Government to say who should be赦免ed. Under present conditions, I do not think it would be a safe course to take; but if I have the honour to be a Member of this House when a measure of self-government is passed that will be acceptable to the people of this country and Ireland, I shall be the first to wish to see all political prisoners amnestied.

*(7.10.) MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I must say, as one of those who worked to put in the hon. Gentleman for the Exchange Division of Liverpool, that he does not in this matter represent the feelings of his constituents. The hon. Gentleman was returned by Irish votes.

MR. NEVILLE: I should be the first to express my obligations to the Irish Party in the Exchange Division; but I cannot admit what the hon. Gentleman says, that my supporters were exclusively Irish.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: The hon. Member's supporters were mainly Irish, and it was they who worked hardest to return him to Parliament. I myself worked hard for the hon. Gentleman, and I will frankly tell him that as the hon. Gentleman has declined to vote for this Amendment, I shall again work hard in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, but this time it will be to relieve the hon. Gentleman of the responsibility of misrepresenting the Exchange Division. Sir, all we ask is the power of control of Irish affairs in our own country. The hon. Member said he would release these men when a Home Rule Bill was passed; but owing to the tortures to which these men are subjected, death will, I am afraid, have relieved many of them before that time arrives. If the hon. Member could not see his way to vote one way or the other on the Amendment now before the House, he might have had the good taste to have said nothing at all. As it is, I promise him when he goes down to Liverpool I will be there to meet him as I was there before. As to the prisoners, if they had been tried for high treason they would have been released before now. Our plea for special treatment for them arises from this—that they are the victims of a Government plot carried out under the control of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and paid for out of the Secret Service Fund. Jim MacDermott was brought over from America with British money, and he lived in this country in the best style until he got around him his circle of victims. He is now in the service of the Government, and, like all the other scoundrels of the last 20 years, he was in the service of the Times. Sir, at the very time the police were entrapping others they endeavoured to plant dynamite on me. A member of the Royal Irish Constabulary came to my office in Liverpool and asked if I had got the small box that had been sent to me. From where? I asked. He said, "You know; from New York." I asked how much there was to pay, and he said, "I do not know; go and see." I suspected it was a plot laid, and trap set, for me, and I said that if the box was addressed to me the Steamship Company would have delivered it and demanded payment. These are the kind of tactics to which the officers of the Royal Irish Constabulary are ready to lend themselves. Sir, the conviction in my mind, and in that of my colleagues, is that John Daly was incapable of lending himself to the use of dynamite. The Government seem to think that their Local Government Bill will pacify Ireland. They will find their mistake later on. The whole voice of the Irish Representatives demands the release of these men. It would be a graceful act, and would help to prevent the recurrence of bad feeling, if these unfortunate men were restored to their families. Before sitting down I should like to ask the Home Secretary what has become of a man named McKevitt, who was convicted at Liverpool, and whose name appeared in the previous, but not in the last, Return, presented to this House?

(7.30.) MR. SEXTON (West Belfast): I regret the speech of the hon. and learned Member for the Exchange Division, and I do not think it can have been well considered. He takes up an indefensible position—that of an Opportunist. His question has merits of its own, and ought to be considered by itself, and without relation to any other question. The hon. Gentleman would postpone the granting of an amnesty until the granting of Home Rule. Sir, the main justification for both is the promotion of harmony between the two peoples. Why not begin to promote that harmony now?

Mr. Patrick O'Brien

Why delay it because another measure will be introduced a few years hence? The hon. and learned Gentleman says this is not the proper time. I think it is. These criminal acts were the result of the passions which grew out of the agrarian struggle in Ireland, which was a struggle for life. The general features of that struggle were exaction, eviction, terrible suffering, terrible reprisals, and the emigration or banishment of a great number of people to America, where, no doubt, the passion that induced these acts was fed. Ever since 1885 Governments have been engaged in promoting a condition of things by which they hoped to put an end to the older system that engendered these acts of violence. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the Exchange Division, as a constitutional lawyer, and as a student of constitutional history, knows that it is in conformity with the practice of the whole civilised world to apply the principles of amnesty when the crimes which have grown out of a fierce political struggle have ceased. Sir, it is only by a political accident that the present Home Secretary is the Imperial administrator in whose hands lies the power of exercising the clemency of the Crown. He was first sent to this House because of his appeal to revolutionary passion. He was able to retain the seat he first obtained by just those appeals to revolutionary feeling to which the British critics of Irish affairs object; and if he had been able to hold the seat for Dungarvan in 1874, or to win it in 1876 or 1880, it is open to me to assume that the right hon. Gentleman might have been found on our side tonight. That he is not on our side arises not from the merits of the case, but from the chances of his political fortunes. Sir, I think our appeal may be addressed with particular force to an English Parliament. Remember the part you have played. The writings and the speeches of your public men have done much to stimulate political crime. Your sympathy with political struggles has been responsible in a great measure for the propagation of political crime in Europe. When the acts are committed against your own Parliament, the rights and duties of efence entitle you to regard it a different point of view; but I entitled to argue that you should der the political passion that gave o the criminal acts—at least, in natter of the amount of punish-

In granting an amnesty you of course, bound to consider the of public feeling, and I do not re that the state of public feeling england is adverse. I know that c feeling in Ireland is ardently in ur of an amnesty. Conventions , with the direct sanction and apal of the Bishops, been held all Ireland, attended by delegates ; at these great Conventions resolu have been passed, that in view of loubt of guilt in some cases, the ; and excitement in all, and the it to which punishment has proed, it would be desirable and wise xtend clemency to these men. fuse to attach much importance e letter mentioned in connection the prisoner Daly, and I say that whole tenor of his life showed that as averse to crimes of this descrip-

There are many circumstances h surround his case with an sphere of considerable doubt. right hon. Gentleman has been d again and again to say who gave bombs to Daly, and he has never ered the question, but has rather usly evaded the point. It is possible the bombs may have got Daly's possession without any y intention on his part, and the ernment are bound to state who the man who gave them to Daly der that we may judge whether or Daly may not have so taken them.

Police Superintendent, Farndale, t to have been examined at the , where it should have been ght out on what grounds he came e conclusion that the Irish police ed the bombs on Daly; and till know on what grounds he made startling statement, the question e guilt of John Daly will continue surrounded by suspicion. With rd to Egan, there is nothing in his which is not compatible with ence. You owe Egan something e than justice, for you owe him ement, and I submit that public ion will very speedily compel the release of Egan, and will eventually lead to the release of Daly. As to other cases, I say generally that these trials were held at a time of helpless panic. The reason of men was weakened by a political conflict, and it is saying nothing more against Englishmen than might be said against others, that at such a time verdicts of conviction were delivered upon evi-dence which would at any other time have been received with doubt, and sentences were passed which would have been deemed excessively severe. These Irish prisoners have suffered at least as much as ordinary convicts in the same time, and the nine years of their imprisonment have been equal to eighteen years under the ordinary law, and approaching that period of twenty years which, according to the usage of the English convict establishments, is equivalent to a sentence for life. The majesty and the power of the law have been amply vindicated, and the deterrent effect is complete; and, therefore, the point of punishment has now been reached where this prolongation may defeat your purpose. There are two options before you. By accepting this Amendment the majesty of the law will be vindicated, and you could promote the public interest by granting the amnesty asked for, and at the same time conciliating the feelings of twenty millions of Irish people who live under the flag of Great Britain or the flag of other countries. But the Government appear to adopt the option of enforcing to the full the sentence of the law, and keeping these fifteen wretched men in the horrors of penal servitude until they drive them into the lunatic asylum or lay their bodies in the grave. Such a policy is unworthy of a great nation, and is open to the imputation most repugnant to the natural feelings of Englishmen—that of vindictive cruelty; and I say that if an Irish Government under similar circumstances held fifteen wretched Englishmen in their power, they would be perfectly ready to adopt the course which I now recommend to you.

(7.45.) MR. J. NOLAN (Louth, North): Last evening it was said by an hon. Member that we on this side of the House knew something about penal servitude. I think that, in the interests of justice, it would not be a bad thing if some of us knew a little more about it, and I certainly believe that at least two of the speeches during this Debate would not have been made if it were a rule of this House that the Home Secretary, before attaining that position, should undergo say eight years or so of penal servitude. With regard to the speeches of the Home Secretary, I desire to direct attention to his remarkable statement that if there was any reason to suppose that a member of the English or Irish police had supplied the bombs to Daly, it would be so infamous an action that Daly should not be kept any longer in prison, and that the most ample apology would be made, while compensation would be given to him ; but I should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman whether he has any doubt upon that point, when the Chief Constable of one of the greatest cities in this country has announced his solemn conviction that those bombs had been planted upon Daly by the Irish police. If Mr. Farndale was guilty of bringing this charge improperly against the Irish Police, he should not keep the position he at present holds ; and it will be easy to bring a charge of conspiracy against the Irish police officers, and on the prima facie evidence of Mr. Farndale to arrive at the truth. The right hon. Member for Derby and the Home Secretary say they have made inquiries, but of whom ? There is a slang term in use to the effect that if you want to know anything you must "ask a policeman," and they have asked the police, against whom this charge was made, whether they were guilty or not ! Of course the police said they were not guilty ; and they professed to have a letter written to Daly which was accepted as conclusive evidence by the right hon. Gentleman at the time when Mr. Richard Pigott was in full bloom. In the interests of justice I unite my voice with the voices of those who have already spoken in this Debate, and those of the vast millions of our fellow - countrymen throughout the world, in asking that the cases of our imprisoned countrymen may be reviewed.

(7.53.) MR. ABRAHAM (Limerick, West) : I do not intend to stand

Mr. J. Nolan

between the House and the division for more than a few moments, but I wish to say that I had the pleasure of being the friend of Mr. John Daly, and I desire to join with my colleagues in the appeal they have made for his liberation, and for a reconsideration of the cases of those prisoners. It is idle to tell us that these men are not political prisoners, for it is the conviction of every section of the people of Ireland that they are, and we shall continue to bring that view before this House again and again until you are convinced not only of the justice of our demand, but also that in the interests of peace you should liberate these men. I wish to say that in the year 1886 John Daly was afflicted with a grievous disease, and I applied to the Home Secretary for a special inquiry into his case. I am glad to bear testimony to the courtesy received from the right hon. Gentleman on that occasion. As I sat by the bedside of John Daly, and when I believed he would never again stand upon his feet, John Daly, on what I looked upon as his deathbed, said that he had no sympathy with dynamiters, and that he was a victim of the police. That statement convinced me of his innocence, and I feel that I shall be false to my friendship with him if I do not state that in the presence of the Tory Party and of our Liberal friends above the Gangway. I believe in the innocence of that man, and when I see to what a wreck John Daly has been reduced by your prison treatment, I feel that he has been more than punished for the crime alleged against him.

(7.57.) MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick) : As I am a representative of Limerick, the city in which John Daly was born, in which for years he earned his bread by the exercise of an honourable trade, in which his character was well-known, and in which his sufferings are deeply regretted, I wish to say that the majority in that city are fully convinced of his innocence of the foul crime of which he was accused. He was a man who had held, before this, control over the working classes of the place, and he had been engaged, just before he fell into this terrible predicament, in advancing the constitutional agitation of that time ; while he was a prime mover in obtaining the election to this House of that illustrious Irishman, Isaac Butt. I do not desire to go into all the arguments of the case, but we do believe in his innocence, and the Amendment of the hon. Member for Waterford has the support of all the people in that part of Ireland which I have the honour to represent. If my hon. Friend has established his first principle, that the offence of which Daly was found guilty was a political offence, the necessity for the reconsideration of his case, or total amnesty, ought to follow as the immediate corollary. When the Home Secretary read the indictments against these men he merely directed the attention of the House to the dynamite charges, and yet he withdrew the case from the specific statute and extended the charge into one of treason-felony. Mark the injustice done to Daly by such legal chicanery. It has never been proved or insinuated that he did an act of violence to anybody or against any property; he was simply in possession of explosives, for which under the specific statute he was only liable to 14 years, but on the charge of treason-felony he was liable to penal servitude for life. The hon. Member for Waterford has proved his case conclusively, and I heartily join in the appeals that have been made for the reconsideration of the case. I do not think a more opportune moment will arise for the exercise of that mercy of which the Crown is the fountain. There is no hope for these men in this world, no rest for them except in the grave, and we ask you to grant our appeal, and the people of Ireland will recognise that their still exists in the hearts of Britons a true feeling of fair play and justice.

The House divided:—Ayes 97; Noes 168.—(Div. List, No. 1.)

(8.50.) MR. HENRY LABOUCHERE (Northampton): During the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle an observation fell from him to the effect that he thought it indecorous that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham should occupy a seat upon the Front Opposition Bench, and from that post of vantage make speeches against the Leader of the Opposition. I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman is not here, as I should like to know, but I suppose I shall find out, why he makes an observation like that, and why it elicits cheers from all parts of the House, when, as a matter of fact, an agreement was entered into at the commencement of the present Parliament, as I am credibly informed, between Lord Hartington and the leading Members of the Opposition that three seats should be reserved for the Liberal Unionists. I wish my right hon. Friend, or somebody on that bench, would make it clear to me whether that agreement was not entered into owing to the respect that we all felt for Lord Hartington, and whether, when Lord Hartington is removed to another House, the gentleman who is the Leader of the Liberal Unionist Party in this House and his supporters have a right to these seats. If that is so—if these seats have been conceded to them by some sort of arrangement, they are wise to occupy them. But I would have my right hon. Friend, the Member for Newcastle, seriously consider, after the cheers which his observations drew forth, whether they should not consider that that agreement was at an end, and whether they should not inform the Liberal Unionists that the three particular seats should no longer be reserved for them; that they must take their chance — though, of course, they might exercise their rights as Privy Councillors—and that if there were space available, they may sit down, but if there were not, let them seat themselves elsewhere. The Liberal Unionist Party is a curious Party, and the right hon. Gentleman a curious Party Leader. I understand that this Party entertains certain pious opinions in regard to Liberal Measures on the understanding that they are never to give effect to those pious opinions, because, strange to say, the duty that they owe to Liberalism is to maintain in power a Tory Government. Therefore I think they are a curious Party, and not only that, but that they have a curious Leader. The Liberal Unionist Party is chiefly composed of Whigs, as they used formerly to be called, but are now termed "Moderate Liberals," and it is curious that this section of Moderate Liberals should choose as their Leader a gentleman who passed as one of the strongest Radicals in this House. I read with interest the account of the meeting at which the election of the right hon. Gentleman as Leader of the Liberal Unionist Party took place. I find that the right hon. Gentleman not only does not agree with us, not only does not agree with the pious opinions of Gentlemen opposite, but that when he was elected Leader of this small Party he claimed the right not only to act as Leader, but also to act in his individual capacity when he differed from those whom he led. In that case, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will tell us, when he gets up to speak, whether he is speaking as a Liberal Unionist, or in antagonism to the views of his own little Party. I observe that the usual course in the Debate on the Address has been entirely reversed. I have had the pleasure of listening to a great many Debates upon Queen's Speeches, and, as a rule, Ministers always complained of the length of the discussion, and that the Debate was not kept within the four corners of the Queen's Speech. But what is done at the present time? We have had the Members of the Government getting up and bitterly complaining that there has not been a sufficient amount of discussion, not only on things in the Speech, but on things out of the Speech. If we were to follow the suggestions of hon. Members opposite I am certain the discussion would last two or three months. The First Lord of the Treasury was the first to suggest this Donnybrook Fair idea when he complained that the Member for Derby did not state his views and the views of his Party upon the question of Egypt. Now I look to the Address, and in the Address there is the mere announcement that one Khedive has died and that he has been succeeded by another; and the usual complimentary phrases are used in regard to succession; but yet the Leader of the House called upon the Member for Derby to state his views, not only upon Egypt, but upon many other matters, and then he turned round and complained bitterly of my right hon. Friend for daring in this House to call attention to a statement made by the Prime Minister upon a public platform in Exeter. The view of the right hon. Gentleman is that Lord Salisbury is a member of the House of Lords, and that if any ground for complaint is to be had he should be brought to account in the House of Lords, and that we have no right to protest. I consider myself there are a great many objections to a Prime Minister being a member of the House of Lords. Ministers are made and unmade in this House; Ministers owe their allegiance to this House, and the opinion is growing in the country that the Prime Minister of this country, the man who is responsible for the policy, and chooses the policy which he thinks the country should pursue, ought to be in this House. The objections to the Prime Minister being in the House of Lords would be considerably aggravated if the doctrine of the Leader of the House is to be accepted, that we in this House are not to venture to call in question any language used by the Prime Minister upon a public platform on public affairs. I do not complain of the First Lord of the Treasury defending Lord Salisbury; every consideration would suggest his doing so, and there is every reason why he should say "ditto" to everything said by the Prime Minister. For my part, I think the language complained of by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was most ill-advised. I think it was unstatesmanlike, and I think it was indecent, because it tried to perpetuate all those religious animosities which every statesman should try to put an end to, and which have been the curse of Ireland. When the Prime Minister made those charges against the Catholics of Ireland, I cannot help remembering that if the Catholics were to reply, the Catholics would get the better of him by the mere recital of facts, because the action of Protestant England towards the Catholics of Ireland year after year has been a disgrace to her escutcheon. I am glad my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby dissociated the Liberal Party from all connection with nguage used by Lord Salisbury. I do not say I am sorry that Lord Salisbury used such language. I am sorry when political opponents make a mistake; and I think this language shows to what contemptible agents the political Leader of the Government is reduced in order to gain the ill-feeling which has existed between this country and Egypt. Then we had another speech from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, who set the example of the First Lord of the Treasury. He favoured us with a speech upon Egypt. I am not bound to follow the right hon. Gentleman upon his speech, because I think all have plenty of opportunities, better opportunities than a general debate on the Address, to discuss the question of affairs in Egypt. But, at all events, I may say that I am glad that the hon. Gentleman did at last favourably his views on that subject. He said we were to remain there as long as we existed from foreign invasion. We know that there is always a danger of invasion from the southern frontier; and that danger from foreign invasion will perpetually exist; and if, therefore, we are to remain there until such time as foreign invasion has passed practically our occupation is to remain there for ever. [Mr. J. W. MACLURE (Wrexham): Hear, hear.] I have no doubt that is the view of many hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I congratulate the hon. Gentleman opposite for the honesty of his opinions. It has been asserted that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian was in favour of scuttling out of Egypt at a moment's notice, and words were cited out of a speech of the right hon. Gentleman's to which interpretation was given; but I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman meant that we should go out of Egypt without due consideration. What the right hon. Gentleman was anxious to convey, and what he intended, was that we should inaugurate some sort of negotiation with the Khedive and the Khedive with the intention of getting out as soon as possible. That is the Liberal Policy, whereas the policy of the Tories is that we should remain in Egypt as long as we could.

The distinction between the Tory Policy and the Liberal Policy in Egypt is this—the Tory Party desire to remain in Egypt as long as possible, the Liberal Party are anxious and willing at all times to remain in Egypt as short a time as possible. After this jingo blast about Egypt, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham goes on to complain that we had not started a Home Rule Debate on these Benches. If he had looked at the notice paper he would have seen that the hon. Member for West Belfast has put down an Amendment which will no doubt raise an interesting Debate with regard to the policy of the Government with reference to Home Rule and Local Government. But really it is astounding that the right hon. Gentleman should have renewed in this House a demand which he has made for the last six years consistently, and that the hon. Gentleman opposite should have read so little of the speeches out of this House, that he should have pleaded it as a new argument now against the Opposition. He said the Members of the Opposition should state what their Bill would be if they came into power. Well, I hope they will come into power on a day not very distant, and if the hon. Gentlemen are here they will hear the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Midlothian, state what it will be, and if they are not here they will have an opportunity of reading it in the newspapers the next morning. To whom do we owe allegiance? We owe allegiance to the Liberal party, and the Liberal party do not wish the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham to impose his will upon us. We do not want the right hon. Gentleman to tell us how we should conduct the business of Opposition. We will leave him to tell the Government how to carry on the business of the Government. We look to our constituencies; we look to the Liberal Party, and we find the other day that in Rossendale, where a vast number of people had been led astray in 1886, they had returned to the fold, and were perfectly satisfied with our way of presenting Home Rule to them, and they gave a very large majority to the gentleman who represented the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. There was one interesting fact which I gathered from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. It was that the right hon. Gentleman had a plan of his own to give a Legislative Assembly to Ireland; but what I heard for the first time was, that as his plan had been scoffed at on all sides, the right hon. Gentleman had come to the conclusion that in order to punish the Irish for his plan being scoffed at they were never to have, with the aid of the right hon. Gentleman, a Legislative Assembly in Ireland. A more modest observation, and an observation which shows more clearly that the right hon. Gentleman has been actuated by principle, and not by personal feeling, I never heard in this House. It has been often laid down that it is not necessary to protest against anything in the Queen's Speech to retain one's opinion with regard to it—that assent to the Queen's Speech binds no one to anything. While I agree, of course, to the first paragraph in the Queen's Speech, which refers to the death of the Duke of Clarence, I should have preferred that all the other paragraphs had been left out. This Parliament is in the sere and yellow leaf; it is suffering from the paralysis of old age; and it also suffers from the fact that not only is it a very old Parliament, but a very discredited Parliament, and there is no reason to doubt that it does not enjoy the confidence of the country. For my part, I only regard ourselves as walking and talking corpses, and I think the only fit place for us is the grave. Instead, therefore, of having a number of Bills mentioned which the Government will never carry, I should have preferred that there had been only one paragraph in the Address, stating that there would be a Vote on Account taken, and then an immediate Dissolution. I read an article in the Times on the first day of this Session, in which it said: "The atmosphere is heavy with the weight of a Dissolution." I should have thought that the only way to have the atmosphere cleared of the weight of a Dissolution was to have a Dissolution. The Times did not say this; but it must have occurred to everyone who agrees with the Times that the best way to clear the atmosphere was to have a Dissolution. The Duke of Devonshire, in 1880, asserted that Members cannot perform their duties with an election hanging over them. He said then that Ministers were bound to dissolve, that Parliament had lasted long enough; and Ministers then agreed with him, because very shortly afterwards Sir Stafford Northcote said they would dissolve, and a Dissolution took place in April. Lord Salisbury said in 1884 that a Minister has no right, even though he has a majority in Parliament, to impose his will on the country, and say, "so long as I have a majority in the House of Commons I will not dissolve." But when I say that there is a reasonable probability that Ministers have lost the confidence of the country I do not go far enough, because really, practically, the leaders of the Government have admitted themselves that they have lost the confidence of the country. I have read with interest a good many speeches that have been delivered by Ministers during the Recess, and I observed that the main staple of their speeches was explaining to their friends that even if beaten at the next General Election, yet they would not lose all hope. It seems to be accepted as a certainty that their political death will take place at the election. ("No!") The hon. Gentleman says no, but I prefer to take a reasonable deduction from the observations of the hon. Gentleman's own leaders rather than from the almost inarticulate observations of the hon. Gentleman. They consoled their followers by saying that after the Dissolution there would be some sort of resurrection, and that they might not lose all hopes of winning at some future time. Can the hon. Gentleman conceive the general of an army going into battle telling his soldiers that they were certain to be beaten on that day, but that he hoped on some future day to re-establish matters by another battle. My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle asked what assurance have we that this would be the last Session. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham told us this would be the last Session. The right hon. Gentleman, I observed, during his speech is-repetually speaking of "we," by which, no doubt, he meant Lord Salisbury and himself, a sort of Ego et rex us; but I should like to know whether he was speaking with authority in this matter. But I go further, and I say that I think we should not sit till the end of the Session. I think Easter would be a very good time for the Dissolution, and I ask the Government to consider it. I think they have already considered

It seems to me that they do not believe they are likely to pass much of the legislation which they have put in the Queen's Speech. I think their programme is something of an electioneering recital. We are told that a District Councils Bill would be brought in, but that it was by no means certain that they would have time to pass it. We know perfectly well what that means. Why, that Bill has been given up already. Then the Small Holdings Bill is promised. Why, Lord Salisbury has gone out of his way to sneer at his own Bill. Then we are told we are to have a Church Discipline Bill. Do Lord Salisbury and his Friends think that they will pass a Church Discipline Bill without the most strenuous opposition? We on our side of the House don't want to see the State interfering and giving powers to bishops over clergy, or to clergy over bishops. We want an absolute separation of Church and State, and I think that is the view we shall adopt when the Bill is brought into the House. But I don't think it will pass, or that it is likely to be discussed. And then we are told that we are to have an Irish Local Government Bill; and in reference to this Irish Local Government Bill I must call attention to the wonderful character of the Tory Party. It will be remembered that we had a sort of Liberal Parliament at Newcastle, where leaders and followers all agreed on the policy that ought to be pursued. The Tory Party allowed suit. They had a Tory Parliament in Birmingham. The first thing that happened was that a Gentleman on that side of the House representing the Government got up and moved a resolution in favour of Irish Local Government. What happened? With one voice these delegates of the Tories all over the country declared that they would have nothing whatever to do with the Bill. They protested against it, and a gentleman moved "the previous question." The feeling was so strong that the gentleman who brought the motion forward accepted "the previous question." If these are the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite I do not think the Government can be very serious in their statement of intention to bring in a Local Government Bill. One thing I am perfectly certain of, if they bring in the Bill it will be a most absolute and thorough sham. They tell us that the second reading is not to be moved till after Easter. I suppose they hope by that time to reconcile their recalcitrant followers to the Bill. The only way they can do that is by telling them that the Bill is a mere sop brought in because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham insists upon it, but that the Bill will mean nothing and give nothing in the shape of Local Government. I think I am right in saying that there is nothing in this programme to galvanise this moribund assembly into life. The fact is the country is absolutely sick of the present system of Government—supported by two Parties, but ending in this unilateral legislation. You bring in Bills labelled Liberal Bills. Why do you do that? In order that Liberal Unionists might support them, and then the Liberal features are cut out of them in order that you may get your Tory friends to vote for them. The Prime Minister has said that the measures of the Government may be considered by the Liberal Unionists as Liberal measures and by the Tories as Conservative measures. He might have just as well said that you are to consider a man black or white, as you please. I am perfectly certain that I am not only enunciating the views of hon. Members on this side of the House, but the views of hon. Members on both sides of the House when I say that neither Liberals nor Tories relish this sort of mulatto legislation. Let us do away with sham and humbug by bringing forward Bills which appear Liberal Bills to the Liberals and Tory Bills to the Tories. I, for my part, urge the General Election in the interests of all, and not alone in the interests of those who agree with my political views. No one can possibly say that this Government unquestionably possesses the confidence of the country. So far as we know, where the country has been consulted, the Ministers have certainly not received that amount of confidence which would ensure them the confidence of the country. If the country is with the present Unionist Government then, surely, an election would strengthen them. Just think! When they were opposed on these Benches after the election, then they could say: "You urged our appeal to the country. We have appealed to the country, and we have been sent here with a majority at our back." Why, they would be able to tramp upon us and treat us as microbes or any such pernicious organisms. On the other hand, if they had not a majority of the country, surely it is better in the interest of representative government that the Ministers here should be backed up by the country. Every one admits that the Government here ought to be a reflex of the majority of this House; but it is also true that the majority of this House should be a reflex of the majority outside this House. I do trust that the First Lord of the Treasury will rise above the mere wishes of perhaps some of his colleagues, to retain place and power and salary for a little time; that he will take a large patriotic view of his duties and responsibilities as the Leader of this House, that he will not waste time—a year—on mere electioneering discussions in this House, but will, as speedily as possible, propose a Vote on Account—and I am sure the House would offer no opposition to it—and come down to this House and say: "In view of its being doubtful that we have the confidence of the country, in view of the Resolution carried at the Conference of Birmingham followers against our policy, we will appeal to the country and abide by the issue."

(9.25.) MAJOR FREDERICK C. RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I regret that in the addresses of the Mover and Seconder of the Address in reply to the Queen's Speech no mention whatever was made of the Labour Question, and particularly to that part of the Labour

Mr. Henry Labouchere

Question which refers to the 30,000 or 40,000 able-bodied men who are discharged from the Army every year, and thrown upon the country without any employment whatever. I have referred to this subject before in this House, and received sympathetic support from hon. Gentleman on the opposite side of the House, below the Gangway. I think the justification of any remarks of this kind is accentuated by the Report, which will be in the hands of hon. Members shortly, and which has been published by the Inspector of Recruiting, by which it appears that during the year just past something like 4,600 had deserted, a larger number than in any year since 1887; and that it has been found still harder this year than last year to fill up the ranks of recruits. I think that a matter like this ought at any rate to temper the post-prandial speeches of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen, and I cannot help thinking that this is a phase of the Labour Question, which, considering that it affects thirty or forty thousand men annually, the Government might very well see cause to take up.

(9.27). MR. ALPHEUS C. MORTON (Peterborough): I agree with the right hon. Gentleman opposite who has just sat down that something ought to be done with regard to the Labour Question, not only with regard to that particular part of it he mentioned, but with regard to the Labour Question generally. I do not think I would have attempted to occupy the time of the House if it had not been for the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham yesterday. I do not wish to criticise that speech, but I gathered during the first two evenings of the Debate on the Address that it was the general intention that a Vote should be taken as soon as possible, because there would be other opportunities in which all these matters could be discussed.

The Members of the Opposition have been challenged to discuss the Queen's Speech by the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for West Birmingham. I do not know whether he was put up by the Government with the view of occupying the time of the House, and doing what is known as obstructing, for the purpose of getting the Government more time to bring in their Bills. I have no knowledge of that; but it may have been. It seems that the Government have no desire to bring in the Bills that they have given notice of. I entirely agree with the senior Member for Northampton that it would be wise for the Government to take a Vote on Account, and at once go to the country. I do not think they have courage to do that, but that is what would suit the Radical Party in the country I am certain. Everybody agrees in sympathising with Her Majesty and the Royal Family in the lamented death of the Duke of Clarence. But I think the Government were wrong in advising Her Majesty as they did in the matter of Court mourning. I do not myself, nor can anybody else, place the slightest value upon official mourning. If mourning is to be of any value it must be natural and done by the people without any order or command from the Government. Well, Sir, the consequence of this order for official mourning has been great distress to a large number of the people of this country. It has so disarranged a certain class of trade that a number of people have been driven into the workhouse. These unfortunate events may occur again, and I hope care will be taken that the poorest portion of the industrial classes is not allowed to suffer on account of what is called Court mourning. Now, Sir, as regards Egypt, no one in the Radical Party ever expressed a wish that in the course of 24 hours our troops should be removed from that country. What we have said is this—that the Government should come to terms with France, who have some interest in the matter, and to whom we have made promises. The people of France, in making that Canal, did more for Egypt and the world than any other country, and they may be fairly said to have a large interest there. If it is the intention of any other country permanently to occupy Egypt, France may be pardoned if she feels injured. Subject to a proper arrangement with Egypt itself, the general feeling of this country is that we should get rid of the trouble and expense of governing Egypt, and leave it to govern itself. As regards the Newfoundland Fisheries, the reason the Government are unable to settle this unfortunate question by compensation or otherwise is on account of the Egyptian difficulty. The moment you get rid of that difficulty you will be able to come to terms with France in regard to the fishery dispute. We are told in the Queen's Speech that the Government have come to some understanding with the United States for the settlement of the Behring Sea dispute by arbitration. I am very glad to hear that, and I hope the time will come when our Government may enter into negotiations with other countries for the settlement of all disputes that may hereafter arise by arbitration rather than by war. Sir, we are told that the Estimates have been prepared with a due regard to public economy. I hope the Government in that matter will carry out their promise better than they have hitherto done. In the second place, I hope they will be more prompt in the presentation of the Estimates. Last Session we had forced through this House in one night Estimates amounting to about £17,000,000 sterling. That is a scandal and a disgrace to any deliberative Assembly. The next point is as to the general principles affecting Local Government in Ireland. We have heard that the Conservative Party are opposed to Local Government in Ireland. Personally, I am very glad the Government should ask us to consider this Bill, because it shows that they have altered their policy altogether

According to Lord Salisbury, Ireland it was only after that that we were told we might consider whether we should give her Local Government. The Government now admit they were wrong, and they propose to allow the Irish people to manage their own local affairs. If the Bill is an honest Bill, we shall support it. I read the promise of the Government to be this—that they mean to go as far as the English Bill; but if they would go a step further and present a measure drawn upon the lines of the Scotch Bill, I would be glad. As regards the Small Holdings Bill, I am afraid it will be of no use whatever unless there is introduced the principle of compulsion. I am glad to notice that the advantages of assisted education are to be given to Ireland. I never could understand why Ireland was left behind England in that matter except that it is the traditional policy of the Tory Party to keep the people in ignorance. I notice the Solicitor General laughing, but the hon. and learned Gentleman knows as well as I do that the Tory Party is opposed to education; he knows that, if the Tory Party could have stopped them, there would have been no educational grants and no school books. Now, Sir, with regard to the Private Bills Procedure Bill, we have heard something of the same kind before, so far as Scotland is concerned, and Scotland would have nothing to do with the Bill. They said that any body appointed to dispose of Scotch Private Bills should be a representative body, and not a body selected by any Government. Therefore, if the Scotch Bill is on the same lines as that of last year, it will not be satisfactory to the people of Scotland. What the Scotch people want is Home Rule, and I am glad to see the Member for North Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) has introduced a Bill to give the Scotch people control of their own affairs. That will be better than anything the Government can do, and I therefore hope they will withdraw their Bill and support the measure introduced by the hon. Member for North Aberdeen. Sir, we are told the Government mean to introduce a Bill for the improvement of the Legislative Councils of India; but unless the Bill gave the people of India some popular representation on these Councils, it will be of no use whatever. The moment you get the people with you, you need not fear any interference from Russia or from any other Power. There ought to be no difficulty in giving the people of India a share of the government of their own country. I should like to see the Government taking a more active part about the opium and salt traffic. As regards the opium traffic, which we maintain for money-making purposes, it is a scandal and a disgrace to the people and the Government of this country. Professing, as we do, to be a religious people, with a large number of Bishops, and so on, we ought to be ashamed of the misery that we cause by the use of that opium drug simply to make money, and for no other purpose whatever. I confess I do not understand the next clause in the Queen's Speech, relating to the relief of public elementary schools from the pressure of local rates. That does not affect the Board schools. If I understand it at all, it is an attempt to relieve denominational schools at the expense of others, and will not be viewed with any favour by the Radical Party, unless you are prepared to give us that local control of these schools which we claimed last year, and which will have to be given as soon as the next General Election occurs. Sir, we are told that the Government propose to introduce a Bill for the improvement of the discipline of the Established Church. That is a small matter which the Government might well have left alone. I am glad to know, as a member of the Church of England, and a churchwarden, that this Church Discipline Bill is not required, and I ask the Government to drop it, and to take up the question of the amendment of the laws with regard to betting and gambling. It is admitted by everybody, by the ministers and clergy of the Church of England, and ministers of all denominations, to be a most pressing and important question, and I would urge the Government to make an honest and determined attempt to stop betting and gambling in this country; but, above all, we must take care that we do not give the moral sanction of this House to betting, by adjourning for the Derby Day. We ave been told something about a proposed arrangement with the Bank of England, which I suppose means £1 notes. So far as I can gather from business people, especially in the City of London, they are all against them. Abroad, every attempt to make cheap money has been a failure, and before they endeavour to introduce a

£1 note in this country, the Government should take care that the on a fide business interest of the City of London is with them rather than against them, as it is at the present moment. I was sorry that the subject of the management of the water supply of London was left out of the Queen's Speech. We are told that there is to be a Commission; but I do not understand that, for the County Council and the Corporation of London believe they will have the support of the Government if they introduce a Bill during the present Session. The effect of this announcement, as to the appointment of a Royal Commission, will be to put the matter off for two or three years. We ought now to be able, in the City of London, to have pure water at a fair price, and the time has arrived when we should demand a settlement of this question. As I said before, I should not have spoken in this Debate but for the challenge of the Member for West Birmingham, who should remember that we agreed with him in 1885 in the unauthorised programme which he then put forward. We agree with that programme still; but he has deserted it. I have no doubt he is considered to have made, last evening, an extremely clever speech; but that speech will not affect a vote in this House, nor in the country. It reminded me rather of those speeches I have heard in times gone by at the Cogers' Hall and other assemblies in Fleet Street, where the principal object of the speakers seemed to be to destroy each other rather than anything else. The Member for West Birmingham asks whether we have stood by our Radical principles; but we have done a great deal more than that. We have induced the right hon. Member for Midlothian to join us, and adopt our Radical programme. Therefore, we have decidedly gained by the loss of the Member for West Birmingham; because we have lost what turned out to be a treacherous and bad leader and got the very best in the United Kingdom. We have in the Newcastle programme, or the Radical programme, nearly everything which was mentioned in the unauthorised programme of 1885, and we have got Home Rule besides. The sooner we have a Dissolution the sooner we shall get Home Rule for England, Ireland, and Scotland, and everywhere else, because the Home Rule principle is spreading now, and is demanded in every village and parish in the country, while they are demanding it for London. As the Leader of the House has returned to his place, I would ask him to accept the proposal of the Senior Member for Northampton, to take a Vote on Account, and go to the country. If you will do so speedily, he will have no need to force upon his unwilling Party Local Government for Ireland, or any other Liberal reforms which he would propose in view of a General Election. I must object to the observations of the Prime Minister with regard to our fellow-countrymen, the Irish Catholics; and I notice that he did not use such language in 1885, when he was expecting to get the support of the Irish Catholic Party. The Prime Minister complained that the Irish Catholics were in favour of the American Revolutionary War, 120 years ago. But the City of London was equally opposed to that cruel and criminal war; and if the Prime Minister wishes to make complaint against anyone, he should make it against the citizens of London. I am not at all afraid of what will happen at the next election: and all I say to the Government in conclusion is that they should bring it about as soon as possible, for if the Tory Party have got any opinions they ought to have the courage to go to the country.

*(10.25.) SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University): I will not attempt to follow the hon. Member through all the questions dealt with in his speech; but with regard to the appointment of a Commission on the water question, as desired by the County Council of London, I must say we are grateful to Her Majesty's Government for having acceded to our request in that particular. The hon. Gentleman entirely mistakes the object and scope of that Commission. It is not with regard to the Water Companies of London, but to the question of water supply, and the need of obtaining it from a wider area, and we do not think Her Majesty's Government have intended in any way to postpone the settlement of the question. The London County Council and the Corporation will proceed with the Bill before this House, which we trust will receive the support of Her Majesty's Government. We are anxious to carry the Bill, because in that case when the Commissioners make their Report we shall be in a position to act upon its recommendations, whatever they may be. The hon. Member who has just spoken says that Home Rule was in the Newcastle programme. It is perfectly true; but what we want to know is, what is the Home Rule in that programme? and upon that point we find it impossible to obtain any information.

MR. MORTON: Allow me to explain distinctly. It is that the Irish people shall have the management of what this House determines to be Irish local affairs.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: That is not at all clear to my mind. What are their local affairs? I want to know why are the people of London not to have equally the control of their own affairs?—and if the hon. Gentleman says that there is to be equal Home Rule throughout the United Kingdom, and that London and other counties in England are to have the same powers for their local affairs, without interference from the people of Scotland or Ireland, then I say that it is not Home Rule at all, but that it is a system of government such as they have in the United States, or Switzerland, which is Federalism, and not Home Rule. We know what are the opinions of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway on Home Rule. What we wish to know are the opinions of hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway; but when they go to the country they whittle away their Home Rule until it becomes a mere matter of water and gas—especially gas.

MR. MADEN (Lancashire, Rossendale): The right hon. Member for the University of London is making a reference, I believe, to myself at Rossendale. He says that when they, the Opposition Party, go to the country, they whittle down their Home Rule scheme to gas, water, and electricity. I may say—("Order, order! ")

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity of replying to the hon. Baronet when he has concluded his speech.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: I did not mention Rossendale; but the cap must have fitted, for the hon. Member has applied to himself that which I was stating generally. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham appealed very strongly to the Member for Newcastle to give us his views, because, with all respect to the hon. Members who have just spoken, what we really want to know are the views of the right hon. Gentlemen who sit upon that Front Bench. Does Home Rule practically mean separation, or is it merely gas? I must say I was very much astonished at the answer given by the hon. Member for Newcastle, who said he was not in a position, "on the spur of the moment, to give a better description of his policy" than a quotation from a former speech which he read. But we do not ask for his views on the spur of the moment. This is a great question which has been under serious consideration for months and years past, and we do not want to have any momentary expression of opinion from him. We want to know what are his deliberate convictions, and upon that point we certainly have not got any satisfactory answer. It is natural we should ask that question, which has been also so ably pressed by the hon. Member for East Fife, who has a burning desire for Home Rule, which is only equalled by his desire

Sir John Lubbock

I know what Home Rule is. Surely, the right hon. Gentleman below me will give an answer to the hon. Member for Fife and to the country, and when we know what they mean by Home Rule we can give it our serious consideration. I should like also to say a word or two in reference to another great question which certainly ought not to be a matter of party politics, and that is the question of our policy in Egypt. The hon. Member for Newcastle said he had never expressed an opinion in favour of immediate evacuation. That may be true, Sir, if you use the word in reference to a very short time, but the right hon. Gentleman said he hoped that we should be able to carry out that policy before the end of the Session. That is to say, it was a question of a few months. The hon. Member for Midlothian and his colleagues are responsible for our foreign policy in Egypt, and if we were to go out so soon as that, we ought never to have gone there at all. Why did we send troops there and spend millions of English money if we were at once coming away again? No doubt our position in Egypt to a certain extent is one of danger, but I maintain that, looking at its geographical position, anarchy and misgovernment of Egypt is a greater danger than our occupation of it, and therefore we should not be in a hurry to evacuate the country. My right hon. Friend the Member for Derby made some rather severe remarks on the gracious Speech from the Throne in reference to the Bank of England, and blamed the Chancellor of the Exchequer because "he produced an essay in some commercial circle where it was little understood." I think the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer before the Chamber of Commerce was very lucid, and well understood by the members. There is no more fitting place to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer could go to lay his views before his fellow-countrymen on so important a subject, and I shall be expressing the views of the mercantile community when I say that we are obliged to him for coming there and explaining his views to us. We do not know exactly what course the Chancellor of the Exchequer has indicated in the Queen's Speech, but I presume that he does not intend to introduce any change in the currency of the country, as that would be a matter of such importance as to require a paragraph to itself in the Speech. The arrangements with the Bank of England, are of course, of importance also, but as several hon. Members have referred to measures they would have been pleased to see mentioned in the Speech, there is one subject I should have been glad to see in it myself. We hear a great deal about the hours of labour and an Eight Hours Bill; but there is a class of our fellow-citizens who are working twelve or fourteen hours a day, and I say this on the authority of the unanimous report of a Committee of this House specially appointed to go into the question. It reported that in many places small shopkeepers and shop assistants worked as much as eighty-four hours a week—that is fourteen hours a day. What makes it worse is that thousands and thousands of these persons are not strong men, but are young girls, and to have young girls standing for fourteen hours in a shop is perfectly ruinous to their health. Not long ago I presented a petition to this House, signed by the Presidents of the two great Medical Colleges, and more than half the leading medical men of London, calling attention to the great and sore injury done to the health of our young men and women by these long hours. I am happy to say this is no question of a struggle between class and class; the small shopkeepers are even more anxious than the shop assistants to see the hours shortened. What they ask is that the House shall give them the power to regulate the hours, which power they would have had in ancient times. Now, a minority, however small, can keep all the shops of a dis-strict open. If the Government had inserted in the Speech some reference to this question, they would have been supported by the shop-keeping community, and by the Trades Councils, which, not only in London, but in several of our other large cities, have passed unanimous resolutions, calling the attention of the House to the subject. In the case of the London County Council, though we have many divergences of opinion, a unanimous resolution has been passed praying the House to intervene in the question. This is a matter which is ripe for solution, and any Government which will take it up will be taking up a subject which will be extremely popular in the country, and will have the general support of the shop-keeping community. If they will not deal with the matter themselves, I would earnestly appeal to them to support our endeavours to arrive at a solution of the question, and to let our Bill be referred to a Select Committee, where the whole question may be thrashed out. Sir, if we were to pass a Bill of this kind in the last Session of this Parliament we should have done a great and good work, and shall have carried a Bill which would conduce to the health and happiness of thousands and thousands of our fellow countrymen and women.

(10.40.) MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I think, Sir, although the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby referred rather happily to the many measures mentioned in the Speech as a "catalogue of remanents," those of us who have read it carefully will be of opinion that there are amongst them measures which will require very careful consideration. I might enforce my remark by pointing out that no less than ten of the measures passed last Session were measures amending Acts which had been passed by the present Parliament. I noted that the Mover of the Address said that the Small Holdings Bill would raise the whole question of agricultural depression. But there is a reference in the Speech to another Bill which has not yet received any attention—that which says a Bill will be laid before the House for relieving public elementary schools from the present burden of the local rates. That is a Bill which will raise the whole question of the two classes of schools, voluntary and public elementary schools. Clearly in those two Bills we have matter for somewhat prolonged discussion. I may illustrate by needed that an ample bill of fare is provided in the Queen's Speech, it will be found in the last item of the twelve in the programme—the Employers' Liability Bill. I shall have the assent of some of the supporters of the Government when I say that the reason why a very satisfactory conclusion was not arrived at in regard to the Bill of 1886 was that we were hurried into Committee without a proper Second Reading Debate. Most of us in the Grand Committee felt that the Home Secretary was not aware of the numerous points which were raised by the Bill. On Wednesday the Home Secretary used the expression, the hon. Member for Nottingham was personally responsible for the defeat of that Bill. The hon. Member needs no defence of his action from me. He feels extremely keenly on this matter; he was Secretary of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Union Congress, and in every step he took he had full approbation of those whom he represented. But there were others in the Grand Committee who took the same course as he did in respect to the Bill, and I, for one, am willing to assume full responsibility in the matter. If the right hon. Gentleman is unhappily inclined to bring forward a Bill of the same character it will probably share the same fate. The point really is whether the Bill shall be compulsory or not, and I believe it is a fact that those mainly interested have distinctly made up their minds that it will be practically worthless unless it be compulsory, as an Act of Parliament should be binding upon all. We are told, as usual, in the Speech that the estimates for the Public Services for the ensuing year will be laid before us; they have been prepared with a due regard to financial economy. I am not concerned to deny the statement that economy of time has not always been displayed in Committee. We shall all agree that this discussion of Supply is often a most unsatisfactory character. A great deal of time is often spent on re or less microscopical points, which might have been saved for consideration of larger matters. What are the facts as to the manner in which the Estimates are brought forward? I will not weary the House in the figures which might be given on point; I will take those of 1891. The House sat 140 days, and I will refer to the Civil Service Estimates and the Revenue Estimates. They amounted to 28 millions sterling. There were Votes on Account of eight millions taken on the 17th March and the 25th May, leaving 20 millions to be dealt with in Committee of Supply. The first day the House referred to Committee of Supply was the 1st April, the 57th day of the Session; it the 28th and 29th May, the fourth day not being till the 16th June, and next the 9th July. Of the 20 millions only £1,200,000 was voted in April, May, and June, and in July ten millions was voted for Civil Service and eight millions for the Revenue Estimates. That is to say, that millions were voted in July, after the House had been sitting over a hundred days out of the hundred and forty. Therefore, out of each pound sterling the Committee voted of these Estimates one and threepence in April, May, and June, and eighteen and ninepence in July. On the last day of July the early hours of the first day of August ten millions were voted away. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that is a very satisfactory method of conducting the business of Supply. A Committee sat on the subject in 1888, and made a very interesting Report, which might command the attention of the House. I doubt some of the suggestions are more or less drastic reforms, and they have been rejected to from various parts of the House, but I hope we shall have the early opportunity of discussing this matter at length. I hope also that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give us some assurance that Supply will be brought forward early and at regular intervals, so that we may know where we are in this matter. The principal measure mentioned in the speech is undoubtedly the Bill for the extension of Irish Local Government. The Government stands in a peculiar position in regard to this measure. It is practically six years since the Government promised an Irish Local Government Bill. When we met after the General Election in 1886 we heard the then Chancellor of the Exchequer getting up on behalf of the Government, with their approval, and use this language—

"I now come to the third question—that of Irish Local Government—on which I can only say that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to devote the Recess, which we hope will be one of due length, to the careful consideration of the question of Local Government."

and he goes on to say—

"And I may remind the House that it is not altogether without guidance as to the mind of the Government on this question, as the Queen's Speech announced their intention to introduce a Bill for extending Local Government in England as well as Ireland."

He also said that simultaneity and similarity of treatment were, as far as possible, to be adopted in the development of a general and popular system of Local Self-Government in the four countries which make up the United Kingdom. Simultaneity has gone by the board, and we shall see how much of the similarity there is in these measures of the Government when we hear the explanation on the introduction of the Bill. I must say that, having regard to what I have called the attention of the House to, I was astonished to hear the First Lord of the Treasury use this language on Tuesday last when pressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, acting as Leader of the Opposition, on behalf of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. He said—

"He asks me whether the Irish Local Government Bill would be read a second time before Easter. It is impossible for me to give any absolute pledge upon that subject."

And then, having given other reasons, he goes on to say—

"I should then hope that rapid progress would be made with the Bill of my right hon. Friend dealing with small holdings, which will be introduced as soon as this Debate is over, and that when it is not necessarily completed, but as soon as it is in an advanced condition, I shall propose to give the Irish Local Government measure a Second Reading."

Surely a measure referred to in more than one Queen's Speech, and respecting which such pledges were given six years ago, should not take second place to a Small Holdings Bill which was only thought of the other day by the Government. (Cheers.) We are all aware that Irish Local Government is not Home Rule for Ireland (cheers); and I am speaking on behalf of my constituents when I assure hon. Members below the Gangway that nothing that has happened in Ireland within the last 12 months has in any way lessened our desire to do our part in securing for them a satisfactory measure of self-government (Cheers). We believe that it is only in that way that we can offer them some atonement for the wrongs of bygone years, wrongs inflicted upon their country by this country, and we hope and believe that now in a very short time the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian will have the opportunity of inducing the House to sanction a measure which will at length bring happiness and prosperity to Ireland. (Cheers.)

(11.5.) MR. J. G. SWIFT MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Before referring to the Motion which stands in my name, I wish to make one reference to the speech of Lord Salisbury at Exeter, which has been so frequently alluded to in the course of this Debate. I must say that Mr. Lecky does not bear out the noble Lord in his remarks, and that it is proved by historical records that the Roman Catholics of Ireland took no part in the American War of Independence. Mr. Froude, whom I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will accept as an authoritative historian, deals with the question in the same manner. According to these authorities, it would appear that England, in the great War of Independence, had no fiercer enemies to contend against than the great grandsons of the Presbyterians of Ulster. One cannot help thinking that the near approach of the General Election must have disturbed the historical recollections of the noble Lord, and that it was only these things which led him into the misstatements of matters that have been decided upon historical records. Having said so much upon a subject that has been referred to constantly in the course of the Debate, I will now proceed, with the permission of the House, to move the Amendment I have upon the Paper.

MR. SPEAKER: The Amendment which appears on the Paper contains a number of subjects it would not be proper to move upon an Address to the Queen's Speech. What I wish to point out to the hon. Member is that some portions of his Amendment are not relevant.

MR. MAC NEILL: So you have explained to me, Mr. Speaker; and I have therefore altered the Amendment so as to meet your wishes, and I beg to move, as an addition to the Address, the following paragraph:—

"And we humbly regret that Your Majesty's Speech from the Throne contains no proposals for redeeming the pledges so frequently given by various Governments that natives of Great Britain and natives of India should be placed on terms of equality in the matter of appointments in the Public Service, and in facilities in competing for such appointments."

I may say that I am glad that my Amendment has been pruned, because it would be impossible for me, in the time I have at my disposal—with the permission of the House—to refer to the various subjects that occur upon the Address, and to which I would wish to refer. My object is to call attention to the enormity of the various grievances under which these 280,000,000, under control of the British Government, exist. I should state that in this matter the promises of the last half-century have been deliberately broken; that they have been broken over and over again, and I would remind the House that it has been over and over again stated, both in this House and by those at the head of the Indian Government, that there should be no distinction made in the matter of appointments between natives of India and natives of Great Britain—that all should compete upon equal terms in the matter of those appointments. The Act of Parliament of 1833, in fact, states that no native of the territory of India, nor any natural-born subject, should, by reason only of his religion, &c., be disabled from holding any place in the Government of India. Fifty years after that Lord Salisbury talks about the "black man," and, forgetting the pledges that have been made to India, practically repudiates all the engagements that have been previously entered into. Indeed, I do not see the use of his political hypocrisy about the people of India knowing that they are being governed by a superior race," and in his regard I wish to call the attention of the House to a statement made by Lord Northbrook, who was speaking at Birmingham. He said—

"Let us never forget that it is our duty to govern India, not for our own profit and advantage, but for the benefit of the people of India."

This is the test which should apply to the Indian Question, and this simple test I place before the House with confidence, in the belief that it has not been met. How, I ask, has that duty, so specifically laid down in that sentence, been fulfilled by the English Government? How has it been carried out? Mr. Bright upon one occasion, expressing his opinions in language which was always expressive and to the point: Mr. Bright, long before he became a Liberal Unionist, said:—

"India has now become the pasture-ground for smart young English gentlemen." Every office, every emolument worth having in India is given to Englishmen, and notwithstanding all the promises; and all the Acts of Parliament, the natives are, by various simple processes, boycotted and cheated out of everything in their own land. I have spoken about promises made in regard to India, and I think these promises, and the way they have been fulfilled, show that there is "something rotten in the State of Denmark." There was a promise made on the 1st of January by Lord Lytton. Lord Lytton has gone, and I do not wish to say much about him, for there is always respect in the minds of hon. Members, and of the nation, for those who have passed away; but this I will say, that I believe there is no one who more threw himself into the arms of the official class than he did, and that he did it more than any other Indian Viceroy that we have known. He has assured us of the way in which the people are treated. There are other transactions to which, being of a personal nature, I do not wish to refer, but at all events we have it upon the most indisputable authority that—

"The natives of India, whatever their race or creed, have a recognised claim to share largely with their English subjects, according to their capacity, to the administration of affairs."

That was the public expression of opinion of Lord Lytton; but I should remind the House that the same opinion was expressed in private, as shown by the letter read from Lord Lytton by Mr. Bradlaugh in the Debate of 1888, Lord Lytton being then Ambassador in Paris, and in which he admitted that both the Indian Government and the English Government were unable to answer the charge of having broken the promises made. In fact, we have had to choose between prohibiting them and cheating them in regard to those appointments, and all the circumstances go to show that we have chosen the latter course. We simply pay no regard to the promises that have been made by successive Governments in regard to Indian appointments. In 1853 there was a Commission of Inquiry into the state of India; the question of public competition was brought up, and the present Lord Derby, then Lord Stanley, said it was simply absurd that native gentlemen should come over here and spend so many expensive years in trying to qualify for those appointments; that, in fact, it was as absurd and unfair to ask them to come to London and qualify as it would be to ask us to go to India and learn the language of Hindostan and to compete with them upon their own grounds. In 1860 there was at the India Office a departmental Civil Service inquiry, and in the Report that was issued from that inquiry the words of Lord Lytton are repeated; that we have really kept the promise to the ear and yet broken it to the faith. But that was not the only judgment from high officials. In 1869 the Duke of Argyll was Secretary of State for India, and he also confesses that in the matter of appointments the natives had not been given a fair chance ; that the promises which had been made to them had not been kept. I maintain that this is a very scandalous state of things, and that our Government in India savours too much of hypocrisy. Let us, I should say, tell the truth, and let us get rid of this hypocrisy by which we keep the natives of India out of appointments. In 1885 the number of the members of the Civil Service was 900, and only 9 were natives, it being shown that the returning from this country of candidates for appointment would tax any person other than those of independent means.

MR. CURZON : From what are you quoting ?

MR. MAC NEILL : I am quoting from a speech made in September, 1885, in Birmingham, John Bright being in the chair, and the remarks relate to the higher branches of the Civil Service in India. It appears from that that there are 2,357 appointments ; and that of all these offices, representing 282,000,000 of the Indian people, natives only held 188. It is, in fact, as difficult for natives to get an appointment in India as it has been for a Roman Catholic to get an appointment in Ireland ; they are, in fact, weeded out of the national life and systematically and cruelly ignored. In 1886 it was stated that in the Province of Madras there was only three natives employed, so that we have treated India as we have treated Ireland, and just in the same sense as if it were an exaggerated Ireland. Lord Salisbury has said in 1883 that the Indians knew perfectly well that they were "being governed by a superior race," but I maintain that they are being cheated by that superior race, and that we deprive them of the means of appointment because we think them an inferior race. The India Office has promised to give this matter consideration, and I would ask the House to consider that the result of our interference in India is that we find the poorest people in the world saddled with the most expensive Government. If we govern India upon the principle of benefitting those who have charge of it, then let us say so ; but, considering the enormous salaries we pay, and the fact that the Government of India is carried on for our own purposes, then let us make an end of the folly and hypocrisy of saying that we desire to give anything like preference to the appointment of natives. It would not have been necessary for me to move this Amendment if Mr. Bradlaugh had been here ; but officials have taken advantage of Mr. Bradlaugh's death, and I must say that since 1888 the Government of India has shown itself cruel and heartless in this matter. I wish to say that, wanting Mr. Bradlaugh, we, the Irish Members, shall bring forward the question ; and if we may not be able to remedy the grievances of the people of India, we will at least be able to ventilate their case before the English people. A deputation is coming over from India, and their voice, I can assure hon. Members opposite, will be heard at the approaching General Election.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question to add the words: "And we humbly regret that Your Majesty's Speech from the Throne contains no proposals for redeeming the pledges so frequently given by various Governments that natives of Great Britain and natives of India should be placed on terms of equality in the matter of appointments in the public service and in facilities in competing for such appointments."—(Mr. Mac Neill.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

*(11.30.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE for INDIA (Mr. G. N. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport) : The Amendment now moved by the hon. Member, whose courteous reference to myself I acknowledge, has assumed a very different form from that in which it first appeared on the Paper. In the form in which the notice appears on the Orders of the Day the Amendment commences by humbly representing to Her Majesty the views entertained by the hon. Member upon certain legislative proposals to be submitted to the House, and then goes on to complain of five alleged omissions from the

Mr. Mac Neill

eech from the Throne. The first use of complaint is the absence of any reference to the status of Civil servants India, the second has reference to the Opium Question; the third to the Salt Tax; the fourth to the advancement of Education, and the fifth to the development of the material and industrial sources of our Indian Empire. Well, when I read this catalogue of alleged omissions from the Queen's Speech drawn up by the hon. Member for South Bengal (Mr. Mac Neill), I confess I somewhat trembled to think what kind a document a Queen's Speech would be if drawn up by the hon. Member. Only it undoubtedly would be, whatever interest might be added to it by the fascinations of the hon. Member's pen. However, Sir, under your guidance the hon. Member has curtailed his Amendment, and has accordingly simplified my task, and imposed a less strain upon the time and attention of the House. It now falls to my duty to answer upon the particular point raised by the hon. Member, namely, the position of the Civil Service in India. The hon. Member complains that the Queen's Speech contains no proposals for redeeming pledges so frequently given by various Governments, that natives of Great Britain and natives of India should be placed on terms of equality in the matter of appointments in the Public Service. The hon. Gentleman commenced his speech by quoting the terms of the well-known Statute of William IV. He quoted those terms correctly, and the inference he drew as to the obligations they impose on the British Government is perfectly correct. When the hon. Member went on to say that the British Government had deliberately broken faith, and when in asking of the action of the British Government he used the word "hypocrite" and other severe epithets, there was compelled to meet him with an absolute contradiction. I hope I shall be able to show the House that the terms of the Proclamation of William have been endorsed and ratified by successive Governments. When the Queen took over the Government of India in 1858 her Proclamation in so doing contained an emphatic reiteration of the assurance, and ever since the Government of India has consistently and conscientiously made efforts to carry out that assurance. Since 1867 successive Viceroys have considered means for utilising more and more the services of Indian subjects of Her Majesty in the higher appointments, and those efforts culminated during the administration of the late Lord Lytton, and in the creation in 1879 of the statutory Civil Service.

MR. MAC NEILL: I remember that, but I have referred to the letter from Lord Lytton.

MR. CURZON: But I am referring to something more than a private letter. I am referring to rules passed by Lord Lytton under a Statute on the Statute Book. I say, in 1879 Lord Lytton was responsible for the creation of the statutory Civil Service, and, under that scheme, one-fifth of the annual appointments to the Civil Service of India was reserved for natives of India, and without the disagreeable penalty of which the hon. Member has so severely complained, namely, the necessity of coming to England for the purpose of examination. It is perfectly true that the Queen's Speech contains no proposals with reference to the status of European and Native Members of the Indian Civil Service; and the reason is this, that the proposals to which the hon. Member alludes have become, or are in course of becoming, accomplished facts. I am loth to accuse the hon. Member of ignorance, yet I am compelled to think that he must be unaware of the progress of recent events in India. The Public Service there is undergoing a process of complete re-organization. But the hon. Member has never so much as alluded to the Public Service Commission which, a few years ago, was appointed in India.

MR. MAC NEILL: Yes, I know. Four years ago.

MR. CURZON: It was composed of representative and influential men, 15 in number. It contained five Civil servants, one representative of non-official Europeans, one representative of the Eurasians, one of the Uncovenanted Civil Service, and six representative native gentlemen. If the hon. Member appears to doubt or dispute the representative character of this Commission, let me mention the names of some of these native gentlemen. The name of Sir Romesh Chunder Mitter, a Judge of the High Court, will be familiar to any one conversant with Indian affairs. He was a member of the Commission. The name of Raja Pertab Singh is well known, as is also that of Syad Ahmed Khan, the leader of the Mohammedan movement, and there was also an ex-Prime Minister of Baroda. This Commission appointed in 1886 carried on its investigations in India, and two years later a Blue Book was laid on the Table of this House, showing the steps proposed by the Secretary of State to carry out the policy in furtherance of which this Commission was appointed. And what were its proposals? This is a point the hon. Gentleman has entirely ignored, and if these matters were known to him I hardly think he could have made the speech he has just made. It is proposed to divide the Public Service as before into two branches, but both will be re-organised and rechristened. The first will be the existing Covenanted Civil Service, but under the new proposals this will be called the Imperial Service; it will be recruited by competition in England, and will be open, without distinction of race, to all natural-born subjects of Her Majesty. The second branch is to be called the Provincial Service, and will be recruited solely in India, and in each Province separately; on such terms as will attract local gentlemen possessing the necessary qualifications. Members of this Service will hold the higher appointments of the existing Uncovenanted Service, together with a certain number of appointments now reserved by law or practice to the Covenanted Service, which will be thrown open to the Provincial Service. And what is the character of the appointments alluded to? At this moment, Sessions judgeships and collectorships of districts are reserved to the Covenanted Civil Service, but under the scheme of re-organisation about a third of the Sessions judgeships, and a sixth of the collectorships of districts, as well as other appointments, will be thrown open to the Provincial Service, which will be recruited, as I have explained, in India itself. The whole object of the proposals is to open up to natives of India a larger share of the higher-class appointments than they are now eligible for, and many of which are now reserved to the Covenanted Service. The result will be that not only will many more native gentlemen attain to positions of distinction, but there will be two branches of the Service—one recruited in England, the other in India, both being subject to regulations as to status and pay, which will apply equally to the European and Native members of these Services. But the point upon which the hon. Member laid particular stress was the hardship, as he considered it, of holding examinations for the Indian Civil Service in England. But he did not suggest any alternative scheme.

MR. MAC NEILL: Oh, yes! The hon. Gentleman is perfectly well aware of the system of University examinations in various districts for various staff appointments, and similarly might examinations be held in different parts of India. I wish to simplify the hon. Gentleman. (Laughter.) I wish to simplify matters, and I may state that the International College last December passed a resolution in favour of simultaneous examinations being held, and that is the pith and gist of the whole matter.

MR. CURZON: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his desire to contribute towards my simplicity; he has equally contributed to my understanding. I think now I understand his point; he would have a system of simultaneous examinations in India. But is he aware that this point was discussed, analysed, examined, and reported upon by the Commission to which I have referred?

MR. MAC NEILL: I know that.

MR. CURZON: The Public Service Commission, the representative character of which I have explained, and which included native gentlemen of great position, unanimously decided against a system of simultaneous examinations in India. They reported that—

"An open competition in India for the Covenanted Civil Service would operate with inequality, excluding altogether some important classes of the community while giving undue advantage to others. The question is imply one as to the qualifications required, and the arrangements under which officers possessing such qualifications can best be secured. The object of the Government of India in recruiting in England a limited staff of officers, who, after a training in India, might be entrusted with the more executive and judicial charges, was (inter alia) to secure an administration conducted so far as possible on principles and by methods in harmony with modern civilization."

The hon. Member will find this in the Blue Book for 1888. I would also draw attention to the fact that three of the principal native members of the Commission, while they did not altogether share the apprehensions of their colleagues as to the probable results of simultaneous examinations in India and the United Kingdom, yet said that the scheme unanimously recommended by the Commission—

"was well calculated to secure for India the object they had in view, and was not open to the objections urged against simultaneous examinations in England and India."

I may further point out that the objection raised to the limit of age imposed on natives of India coming to England for examination has been removed, that limit having been raised from 19 to 23 years, which undoubtedly provides greater facilities to Natives to come over to compete. But on the general question I have still to meet the hon. Member. From his speech it might be inferred that the natives of India bear a small and wholly disproportionate part in the administration of their country. The hon. Member, with a rhetorical hyperbole derived from his native country, spoke of the natives of India being "boycotted" out of all employment, and then he proceeded to give figures to the House which it will fall to my lot to upset. I doubt if the House has any idea of the number of natives usefully occupying permanent posts in the Public Service of India. Facts and figures outweigh much declamation; and the exact proportion is as follows. I take, first, the Uncovenanted Civil Service, and here the hon. Gentleman was quite unconsciously guilty of an inversion of figures at which the House will be surprised. He told us on the authority of a speech which, I think, he said was an electioneering speech, that the proportion in the Uncovenanted Service of Europeans to the natives of India was, in 1885, Europeans 2,357 to natives 188.

MR. MAC NEILL: In the higher branches.

MR. CURZON: Now, I think the House will be surprised to know that the figures are just the other way about. The Report of the Public Service Commission shows that in the higher ranks of the executive and judicial branches of the Uncovenanted Civil Service—excluding the special departments—there were 2,588 officers, of whom 2,449 were natives of India, and only 35 were Europeans not domiciled in India at the time of appointment. It is also fair to say, in speaking of these officers, that it would be a mistake to suppose that they are engaged only in the humbler and less important official duties. That is not so at all. The work entrusted to them is of great importance; it is with them that the great mass of the people are brought into contact, and a large proportion of the disputes connected with revenue, magisterial, and civil matters, arising out of the ordinary relations of man with man have to be decided by these officers. Nearly the whole of the civil judicial business throughout India, including a great part of that in the Appellate Courts, is transacted by natives. Native Judges have jurisdiction in all civil suits over Europeans and natives alike, without distinction of nationality. The duties of the Executive branch are hardly less responsible and important. I now proceed to deal with the Covenanted Civil Service—if the hon. Member will give me his attention—and here, again, I am compelled to correct the figures which, on the authority of an electioneering speech, he has put before the House. The hon. Member said that in 1885 the proportion of Europeans to natives was 900 to 9. Let me give my figures. In January, 1888, the number of superior officers of the Indian Civil Administration was 964 Europeans to 59 Natives. Since 1874, notwithstanding the continually increasing demands for improved administration, the European members of that Service have been reduced by more than 22 per cent., and under the same system we may expect a reduction of another 12 per cent. Under the rules laid down by Lord Lytton's administration there is one statutory civilian for every five members of the Service. Now, I think the facts I have put before the House will show that when the hon. Gentleman says that natives are "boycotted" and "cheated" out of employment he is not justified in using language which he cannot support by facts. The facts are precisely opposite to his statement. The Government have consistently adhered to the proclamation of William IV., the terms of which the hon. Member read out; and if the hon. Member (whose interest in the subject no one can doubt) instead of making speeches here, were to go to India and acquaint himself with the actual situation, I doubt very much whether we should have any more of those accusations and allegations that we so often hear from him in this House. I might give other illustrations to show the policy of the Government of India in lending every encouragement to the natives of India to bear their share in the service of the country. Thirty years ago, when the Crown took over the Government, there was not a single native member of the Legislative Councils. There are now four in the Governor General's Council, five in Madras, five in Bombay, four in Bengal, and two in the North-West Provinces, 20 in all. In addition to these it will be my privilege before long to introduce a Bill dealing with the reorganisation and extension of the Councils by which the number of native members on them will be very considerably increased. Thirty years ago there was not a single Native Judge of the High Court. There are now three Native Judges in the High Court at Calcutta, one each in Madras, Bombay, and the North-West Provinces, or six in all. Colleges for the encouragement of engineering have been specially established in India, where every effort is made to attract natives into this important branch of the Public Service. I do not know that it is necessary to say much more in defence of our position. I might allude to the many natives of distinction who have filled high and honourable posts in Native States. I might allude to Municipalities and Local Boards where natives are playing a part, and are gaining experience in Local Government, which will fit them for higher positions. The hon. Gentleman complains of the absence of reference to these questions in the Queen's Speech, but I confess I think that had it been desirable to introduce further reference to Indian affairs, that reference instead of striking the note of promises as yet unredeemed, should rather have taken the line of congratulating Parliament upon the good results already accomplished. I hope these few considerations which I have laid before the House will have shown that the Government has a strong and convincing case, and may lead the hon. Gentleman to think there is no necessity for him to carry his Amendment to a Division.

*(11.55.) SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham) : Though I sympathise with everything that can be done for the advancement of the natives of India, I must say there are portions of the speech of the hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill) which require a strong answer in the few moments that remain for this debate. The natives of India may be equal to us intellectually, and of course before the Law, and in the Courts they are our equals, and in Christian humility we are not to assume superiority morally over them. But there are certain qualities in which they are not our equals, namely, courage and warlike resource, administrative energy and capacity in the field or in the Cabinet. No legislation, no theories that hon. Gentlemen opposite can advance, will make them equal to us in these respects. When you have to deal with a country like India you must have Englishmen in the front for the administration of affairs. They must have control of transport arrangements in time of war, and they must organise the operations for relief when danger of famine is apprehended. The organisation and administration of the great Departments must be in the hands of Englishmen—"The British"—well, British certainly, and the natives know that as well as we do. It is by the strong arm, the steady nerve, the cool head of British rulers, that our Indian Empire is sustained, and the vast British as well as native interests involved in that country are safeguarded.

Mr. Curzon

(11.59.) MR. MAC NEILL: With the permission of the House I will withdraw my Amendment, only saying that at an early date I shall endeavour to revert to this subject again.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question again proposed.

Debate further adjourned to Monday.

PUBLIC HOUSES (HOURS OF CLOSING)
(SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 92.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(11.59.) MR. C. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill, I need only say that it is the same Bill which has been before the House in a previous Session, and its object is to restore the Act passed some years ago to the state in which, as a Bill, it left this House, alterations being made in the House of Lords.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I can hardly agree with the hon. Member in the description he has given of this Bill as one that has been, so far as I know, before the House on a previous occasion in its present shape. I rather think there is a clause in it which has not appeared before —

MR. CAMERON: No, not a word.

SIR C. J. PEARSON: However that may be, this is a matter of great importance to the community in Scotland, for it is a proposal to alter what is regarded as a settlement of the question embodied in the Act of 1887 —

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Tuesday next.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ALLOTMENTS
BILL.—(No. 94.)

SECOND READING

Order for Second Reading read

(12.0.) DR. TANNER (Cork, Mid): This Bill, which I hope the House will now consent to read a second time, is in a small way, designed to afford some relief to the Irish labourer. It removes the restriction of half an acre upon allotments, extending it to an acre. Half an acre is not sufficient to assist a man who is out of continuous employment. Too frequently are Irish labourers reduced almost to a state of destitution, and only last year the late Chief Secretary had to introduce a measure to relieve the poorest classes from starvation. I hope this small measure will commend itself to the good feeling of the House, and will only add that I will give every opportunity for the discussion of Amendments in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(12.2.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I hope the House will agree to the Second Reading, and I only rise to draw the attention of the hon. Member to what I think is an error in drafting.

he has put before the House. The hon. Member said that in 1885 the proportion of Europeans to natives was 900 to 9. Let me give my figures. In January, 1888, the number of superior officers of the Indian Civil Administration was 964 Europeans to 59 Natives. Since 1874, notwithstanding the continually increasing demands for improved administration, the European members of that Service have been reduced by more than 22 per cent., and under the same system we may expect a reduction of another 12 per cent. Under the rules laid down by Lord Lytton's administration there is one statutory civilian for every five members of the Service. Now, I think the facts I have put before the House will show that when the hon. Gentleman says that natives are "boycotted" and "cheated" out of employment he is not justified in using language which he cannot support by facts. The facts are precisely opposite to his statement. The Government have consistently adhered to the proclamation of William IV., the terms of which the hon. Member read out; and if the hon. Member (whose interest in the subject no one can doubt) instead of making speeches here, were to go to India and acquaint himself with the actual situation, I doubt very much whether we should have any more of those accusations and allegations that we so often hear from him in this House. I might give other illustrations to show the policy of the Government of India in lending every encouragement to the natives of India to bear their share in the service of the country. Thirty years ago, when the Crown took over the Government, there was not a single native member of the Legislative Councils. There are now four in the Governor General's Council, five in Madras, five in Bombay, four in Bengal, and two in the North-West Provinces, 20 in all. In addition to these it will be my privilege before long to introduce a Bill dealing with the reorganisation and extension of the Councils by which the number of native members on them will be very considerably increased. Thirty years ago there was not a single Native Judge of the High Court. There are now three Native Judges in the High Court at Calcutta, one each in Madras, Bombay, and the North-West Provinces, or six in all. Colleges for the encouragement of engineering have been specially established in India, where every effort is made to attract natives into this important branch of the Public Service. I do not know that it is necessary to say much more in defence of our position. I might allude to the many natives of distinction who have filled high and honourable posts in Native States. I might allude to Municipalities and Local Boards where natives are playing a part, and are gaining experience in Local Government, which will fit them for higher positions. The hon. Gentleman complains of the absence of reference to these questions in the Queen's Speech, but I confess I think that had it been desirable to introduce further reference to Indian affairs, that reference instead of striking the note of promises as yet unredeemed, should rather have taken the line of congratulating Parliament upon the good results already accomplished. I hope these few considerations which I have laid before the House will have shown that the Government has a strong and convincing case, and may lead the hon. Gentleman to think there is no necessity for him to carry his Amendment to a Division.

*(11.55.) SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham) : Though I sympathise with everything that can be done for the advancement of the natives of India, I must say there are portions of the speech of the hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Mac Neill) which require a strong answer in the few moments that remain for this debate. The natives of India may be equal to us intellectually, and of course before the Law, and in the Courts they are our equals, and in Christian humility we are not to assume superiority morally over them. But there are certain qualities in which they are not our equals, namely, courage and warlike resource, administrative energy and capacity in the field or in the Cabinet. No legislation, no theories that hon. Gentlemen opposite can advance, will make them equal to us in these respects. When you have to deal with a country like India you must have Englishmen in the front for the administration of affairs. They must have control of transport arrangements in time of war, and they must organise the operations for relief when danger of famine is apprehended. The organisation and administration of the great Departments must be in the hands of Englishmen—"The British"—well, British certainly, and the natives know that as well as we do. It is by the strong arm, the steady nerve, the cool head of British rulers, that our Indian Empire is sustained, and the vast British as well as native interests involved in that country are safeguarded.

(11.59.) MR. MAC NEILL: With the permission of the House I will withdraw my Amendment, only saying that at an early date I shall endeavour to revert to this subject again.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question again proposed.

Debate further adjourned to Monday.

PUBLIC HOUSES (HOURS OF CLOSING)
(SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 92.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(11.59.) MR. C. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill, I need only say that it is the same Bill which has been before the House in a previous Session, and its object is to restore the Act passed some years ago to the state in which, as a Bill, it left this House, alterations being made in the House of Lords.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I can hardly agree with the hon. Member in the description he has given of this Bill as one that has been, so far as I know, before the House on a previous occasion in its present shape. I rather think there is a clause in it which has not appeared before —

MR. CAMERON: No, not a word.

SIR C. J. PEARSON: However that may be, this is a matter of great importance to the community in Scotland, for it is a proposal to alter what is regarded as a settlement of the question embodied in the Act of 1887 —

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Tuesday next.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ALLOTMENTS
BILL.—(No. 94.)

SECOND READING

Order for Second Reading read

(12.0.) DR. TANNER (Cork, Mid): This Bill, which I hope the House will now consent to read a second time, is in a small way, designed to afford some relief to the Irish labourer. It removes the restriction of half an acre upon allotments, extending it to an acre. Half an acre is not sufficient to assist a man who is out of continuous employment. Too frequently are Irish labourers reduced almost to a state of destitution, and only last year the late Chief Secretary had to introduce a measure to relieve the poorest classes from starvation. I hope this small measure will commend itself to the good feeling of the House, and will only add that I will give every opportunity for the discussion of Amendments in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(12.2.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I hope the House will agree to the Second Reading, and I only rise to draw the attention of the hon. Member to what I think is an error in drafting.

presented to him, having been chosen by election, if the Governor General should find that such a system can properly be established. I am bound to say that I and some of our friends would have preferred that the possibility of election being one of the modes of presenting these persons to be nominated by the Council was more explicitly recognised in the Bill than it is ; but, at the same time, I very well know the difficulties which there may be in carrying through a Bill of this kind. I regard it as essentially a tentative measure, and being so, I am quite willing to welcome it, although it opens the door, perhaps, in a very slight manner apparently on the face of it. What we really desire is that in this matter the Government of India should be able to exercise their own discretion on the spot as to the extent to which they may think it wise to advance in the direction that is desired. I do not think we are good judges here of the precise amount of concession that it would be advisable to make. I think if the Governor General of India should find that he is able to introduce, in some modified form, some system of election, it will be seen how it works ; and, if it works well, the Governor General will be able, with the approval of the Secretary of State, to give a further extension to the principle. Feeling, as I do, that great caution is desirable in dealing with this subject in India, I should not be disposed to criticise in any hostile spirit the Bill as it stands. On the contrary, I believe it may lay the foundation of very useful changes in the constitution of the Councils in India with regard to this subject. With regard to the rest of the Bill, it contains a variety of useful propositions, but if any remark is to be made upon them, I think it will be more convenient to make it in Committee. Lastly, my Lords, I would say that I welcome the expression by the noble Viscount of the intention of the Government to press forward this Bill ; and, although I have said already that I think it very important that it should be so pressed forward, I may be forgiven for again repeating on this occasion that I think it is almost dangerous to leave a subject of this kind hung up to be perpetually discussed by all manner of persons, and that having once all that, at all events, some amendment necessary with regard to the constituting these Legislative Councils is incumbent upon the Government and Parliament to pass the Bill that they may think expedient as speedily as possible into law.

*THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK : My Lords, I have very few remarks to add to what has fallen from my noble Friend beside me (the Earl of Kimberley). I agree with the belief which he expressed that this clause will be elastic enough to enable some measures to be taken by the Viceroy of India in Council, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State, to popularise in some way or other the selections for the different Legislative Councils in India. I should have preferred that my noble Friend should have used the term "representation" rather than "election," although I do not believe there is any real difference between the two ; for this reason : that I conceive, so far as I know, that India is a country quite unfit for any system of popular election by the formation of popular constituencies and the election of members by large constituencies ; whereas I believe there are municipal and other bodies in India who can be perfectly well trusted to recommend to the Viceroy representatives of those bodies, and that very possibly (I am far from presuming to express an opinion with any degree of positiveness as to the present condition of India) some such system of representation as that might be found quite in accordance with the present condition of India, and would satisfy a feeling—I believe a legitimate feeling—which has been very moderately and properly expressed by public bodies in India of late on that matter. And I think that one of the great merits of the Bill, as was noticed by the noble Earl, is that it is very elastic. We in this country do not pretend to lay down any hard-and-fast rules under which these bodies are to be appointed ; but it is left to those who know most about it, namely, the Governor General of India in Council, with the approval of the Secretary of State in Council : and we may hope, my Lords, that if this Bill (as I fervently desire myself it should) be passed during the present session, this question may be, so far as concerned, set at rest for a considerable number of years.

The Earl of Kimberley

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I only rise for the purpose of expressing my general assent to the language which has just been used by the noble Lord, and at the same time entering a caveat. I quite agree with him that the word "representation" better expresses the intention that we have and that the Governor General has, than the more narrow word "election," which may not necessarily be applicable; but I should be sorry that it should be believed that we look at that representation as necessarily confined, or even specially assigned, to municipal bodies. I do not in the least desire to narrow the language or the elasticity of the Bill, or to say a word to discourage the use of such bodies; but I do demur to the idea that they are necessarily the main representatives of Indian opinion—I do not think that was the intention of the noble Lord.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: It was not at all.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I fear that those words might be interpreted in that way. I think that we all desire to popularise these bodies, so as practically to bring them into harmony with the dominant sentiment of the Indian people; but we must be careful lest, by the application of occidental machinery, we bring into power not the strong, natural, vigorous, effective elements of Indian Society, but the more artificial and weakly elements which we ourselves have made and have brought into prominence. It would be a great evil if, in any system of Government which we gradually develop, the really strong portions of Indian society did not obtain that share in the government to which their natural position among their own people traditionally entitles them.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> (according to order) and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION AND THE COUNTY COUNCILS.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL COWPER: My Lords, I rise to call attention to the subject of which I have given notice. I do not think it will be necessary for me to waste your Lordships' time by enlarging upon the advantages of technical education or the want of it in this country. There is no doubt that many other countries, particularly Germany, are far in advance of us in this work, and that a great deal remains to be done in the matter in this country. I need not insist upon this if Her Majesty's Government are, as your Lordships are aware, perfectly in accordance with me in this feeling, for they have already given a grant to be applied, if the County Council see fit, for the purpose of promoting technical instruction, and, what is equally important, the House of Commons seems to be of the same opinion, because it was in deference to the feeling of that Assembly that this grant was made. I need not enter into the history of the way in which this grant was made. Your Lordships are aware that two years ago a certain sum of money, which had been set aside in the Customs and Excise duties for the purpose of buying up public houses, was, in deference to the expression of a strong wish in another place, when it was found that that was not a popular way of spending the money, given to the different County Councils to be applied as they thought fit, and it was strongly recommended that it should be applied towards the promotion of technical instruction. Of course, if they preferred it, the County Councils might apply it merely to the amelioration of their local rates. My Lords, the great majority of the County Councils throughout the country did elect to apply it, according to the recommendation of the Government, towards the encouragement of technical instruction, although they were under certain difficulties from not knowing whether it was to be treated as a windfall or as the first instalment of a regular allowance; because some hopes had been held out to them that if they did spend it in the way suggested, it would be given them again. In spite of this uncertainty, they set to work, and they have been, on the whole, I think, taking in most places very good measures to carry out the object for which it was given. This year again a somewhat smaller grant, but still a considerable grant, has been given in the same way, which has in many places induced the County Council to take it for granted that the allowance will be a per-presented to him, having been chosen by election, if the Governor General should find that such a system can properly be established. I am bound to say that I and some of our friends would have preferred that the possibility of election being one of the modes of presenting these persons to be nominated by the Council was more explicitly recognised in the Bill than it is; but, at the same time, I very well know the difficulties which there may be in carrying through a Bill of this kind. I regard it as essentially a tentative measure, and being so, I am quite willing to welcome it, although it opens the door, perhaps, in a very slight manner apparently on the face of it. What we really desire is that in this matter the Government of India should be able to exercise their own discretion on the spot as to the extent to which they may think it wise to advance in the direction that is desired. I do not think we are good judges here of the precise amount of concession that it would be advisable to make. I think if the Governor General of India should find that he is able to introduce, in some modified form, some system of election, it will be seen how it works; and, if it works well, the Governor General will be able, with the approval of the Secretary of State, to give a further extension to the principle. Feeling, as I do, that great caution is desirable in dealing with this subject in India, I should not be disposed to criticise in any hostile spirit the Bill as it stands. On the contrary, I believe it may lay the foundation of very useful changes in the constitution of the Councils in India with regard to this subject. With regard to the rest of the Bill, it contains a variety of useful propositions, but if any remark is to be made upon them, I think it will be more convenient to make it in Committee. Lastly, my Lords, I would say that I welcome the expression by the noble Viscount of the intention of the Government to press forward this Bill; and, although I have said already that I think it very important that it should be so pressed forward, I may be forgiven for again repeating on this occasion that I think it is almost dangerous to leave a subject of this kind hung up to be perpetually discussed by all manner of persons, and that having once allowed that, at all events, some amendment is necessary with regard to the mode of constituting these Legislative Councils, it is incumbent upon the Government and Parliament to pass the Bill that they may think expedient as speedily as possible into law.

*THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: My Lords, I have very few remarks to add to what has fallen from my noble Friend beside me (the Earl of Kimberley). I agree with the belief which he expressed that this clause will be elastic enough to enable some measures to be taken by the Viceroy of India in Council, with the concurrence of the Secretary of State, to popularise in some way or other the selections for the different Legislative Councils in India. I should have preferred that my noble Friend should have used the term "representation" rather than "election," although I do not believe there is any real difference between the two; for this reason: that I conceive, so far as I know, that India is a country quite unfit for any system of popular election by the formation of popular constituencies and the election of members by large constituencies; whereas I believe there are municipal and other bodies in India who can be perfectly well trusted to recommend to the Viceroy representatives of those bodies, and that very possibly (I am far from presuming to express an opinion with any degree of positiveness as to the present condition of India) some such system of representation as that might be found quite in accordance with the present condition of India, and would satisfy a feeling—I believe a legitimate feeling—which has been very moderately and properly expressed by public bodies in India of late on that matter. And I think that one of the great merits of the Bill, as was noticed by the noble Earl, is that it is very elastic. We in this country do not pretend to lay down any hard-and-fast rules under which these bodies are to be appointed; but it is left to those who know most about it, namely, the Governor General of India in Council, with the approval of the Secretary of State in Council: and we may hope, my Lords, that if this Bill (as I fervently desire myself it should) be passed during the present Session, this question may be, so far as legislation is concerned, set at rest for a very considerable number of years.

The Earl of Kimberley

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I only rise for the purpose of expressing my general assent to the language which has just been used by the noble Lord, and at the same time entering a caveat. I quite agree with him that the word "representation" better expresses the intention that we have had that the Governor General has, than the more narrow word "election," which may not necessarily be applicable; but I should be sorry that it should be believed that we look at that representation as necessarily confined, or even specially assigned, to municipal bodies. I do not in the least desire to narrow the language or the elasticity of the Bill, or to say a word to discourage the use of such bodies; but I do demur to the idea that they are necessarily the main representatives of Indian opinion—I do not think that was the intention of the noble Lord.

THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK: It was not at all.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I fear that those words might be interpreted in that way. I think that we all desire to popularise these bodies, so as practically to bring them into harmony with the dominant sentiment of the Indian people; but we must be careful lest, by the application of occidental machinery, we bring into power not the strong, natural, vigorous, effective elements of Indian Society, but the more artificial and weakly elements which we ourselves have made and have brought into prominence. It would be a great evil if, in any system of Government which we gradually develop, the really strong portions of Indian society did not obtain that share in the government to which their natural position among their own people traditionally entitles them.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to order) and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION AND THE COUNTY COUNCILS.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL COWPER: My Lords, I rise to call attention to the subject of which I have given notice. I do not think it will be necessary for me to waste your Lordships' time by enlarging upon the advantages of technical education or the want of it in this country. There is no doubt that many other countries, particularly Germany, are far in advance of us in this work, and that a great deal remains to be done in the matter in this country. I need not insist upon this if Her Majesty's Government are, as your Lordships are aware, perfectly in accordance with me in this feeling, for they have already given a grant to be applied, if the County Council see fit, for the purpose of promoting technical instruction. and, what is equally important, the House of Commons seems to be of the same opinion, because it was in deference to the feeling of that Assembly that this grant was made. I need not enter into the history of the way in which this grant was made. Your Lordships are aware that two years ago a certain sum of money, which had been set aside in the Customs and Excise duties for the purpose of buying up public houses, was, in deference to the expression of a strong wish in another place, when it was found that that was not a popular way of spending the money, given to the different County Councils to be applied as they thought fit, and it was strongly recommended that it should be applied towards the promotion of technical instruction. Of course, if they preferred it, the County Councils might apply it merely to the amelioration of their local rates. My Lords, the great majority of the County Councils throughout the country did elect to apply it, according to the recommendation of the Government, towards the encouragement of technical instruction, although they were under certain difficulties from not knowing whether it was to be treated as a windfall or as the first instalment of a regular allowance; because some hopes had been held out to them that if they did spend it in the way suggested, it would be given them again. In spite of this uncertainty, they set to work, and they have been, on the whole, I think, taking in most places very good measures to carry out the object for which it was given. This year again a somewhat smaller grant, but still a considerable grant, has been given in the same way, which has in many places induced the County Council to take it for granted that the allowance will be a permanent one, and they have in many places set to work to establish classes of different kinds, in the urban as well as the rural districts, for the sake of teaching every kind of different subject which can at all come within the scope of the Act ; and particularly in the rural districts they are doing very good work, besides, in affording interesting occupation to the young men in our country villages, which is a subject rather before the country now, so as to add a little interest to their life as well as to give them instruction. But, supposing that this grant is not going to be renewed, it would be a good thing that it should be known at once, otherwise mischief may be done ; because, if these classes are not to be continued, not only would disappointment be caused, but money would have been wasted in setting them going. And, besides this, there is a class of people who are qualifying themselves, in consequence of what they suppose is a growing demand, to be instructors in these different subjects, and are giving up their time and spending their money in so doing. It stands to reason that if, after all, there is no opening for them, they will be rather badly treated, for they have been encouraged to devote their money and time in this direction. My Lords, in most cases the County Councils are taking these steps on the assumption that this grant will be permanent ; under some circumstances they are still hesitating, in consequence of not knowing the intention of the Government in the matter, and are exposed to the charge of vacillation and doing nothing, from which I think it is fair that they should be relieved without any longer delay. In some places they have elected to treat the grant entirely as a windfall, and, as they have no reason to suppose that they will get more than last year and this year, the only thing to do, they say, is to divide the money as well as they can among existing institutions. In this way a great deal of money is being frittered away. For all these different reasons I think it is desirable that we should know whether we are to have a permanent grant or not. My Lords, I do not object myself to the Government having proceeded in a tentative manner, and I certainly am not one of those who complain of this thing being worked through the County

Earl Cowper

Councils. Now that we have established these bodies, and very good men throughout the country have been found to come forward and devote themselves to the work, it is time to think of giving them something more to do than merely to look after the roads, and trying to stop the cattle disease when it breaks out, and the joint management of the police, and so on. I think everything that gives them something to do is a good thing. I think also that the needs of different parts of the country are different one from another, and that by trusting the local authorities we are more likely to distribute this money in a way to suit the needs of each particular district, than if we were to organise a scheme at head-quarters and carry it out by the management of some central authority. And, whether the Government have done what we wish or not, we must also feel that they are the first Government who have taken the matter up at all and done anything for technical instruction. I think, my Lords, I may, with all due deference, ask the Government to remove our uncertainty, and I hope I may ask them also to make this grant permanent. It is not for me, of course, to say in what manner a permanent allowance is to be made, nor do I think that is a question for this House to enter into ; it is more a question for the other House to decide how the grant is to be made, and what its amount is to be. We have only to deal here with general principles. Before I sit down I will only allude to one other difficulty that the County Councils labour under in carrying out this matter. We are, of course, obliged to consult the South Kensington authorities—the Science and Art Department—with regard to what subjects may be taught. I am bound to say that this body has shown not only the utmost courtesy to everyone who has applied, and taken the utmost pains to tell them what they may do, but has also exercised, I think, a wide discretion in giving as free an interpretation as possible to the Act to enable it to work. There is one clause that stands very much in their way, and in the way of the County Councils too : that is the clause which forbids the teaching of any trade, occupation, or industry. My Lords, this hampers the Department very much. It is not too much to say that it is really only by going as near the wind as possible in evading the clause that the Act can be made to work at all. I do not know the history of it—whether it was put in for the sake of safeguarding any particular industry, or whether there was some particular interest which it was necessary to conciliate to get the Bill through the House. All I know is that the clause is a very difficult one, and causes a great deal of inconvenience. My Lords, technical instruction has been defined as instruction in those branches of art or science which may be definitely applied to some specific industry. Surely the best way to teach these branches is by applying them, that is to say by uniting practice with theory; otherwise, if this clause were acted upon strictly, we should be reduced to doing very little more than giving a series of lectures unaccompanied either by illustrations or experiments. I remember many years ago, when I was at Oxford, having to attend a certain number of lectures, and probably many of your Lordships, at the same period of your lives, had to do the same. I can only say that of the many benefits upon which I can look back from that great and venerable institution, I do not think anything I got from attending lectures can be numbered among them. I suppose one idea of this clause is that it should not interfere with private effort. That may be a good thing in itself—that might be a reason for leaving technical instruction to private effort altogether, as I believe some people wish to do; or it might be a reason for putting in safeguards. But really to divide the two by having all the practice taught by one set of people, and all the theory by another—the theory by the Government and the practice by private enterprise—is not a dividing of the thing which commends itself to my mind. I do not know whether this clause can be modified; I only mention it in passing to call attention to the subject. My real object in trespassing on your Lordships' time is to remove the uncertainty that at present prevails, and that the County Councils may know what they are about, by being informed whether, or not, they may really look forward to having a permanent annual Government grant.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTRY: My Lords, I should like to endorse what has fallen from the noble Earl as to the value that is put upon technical instruction in the counties. Having acted as Chairman of my County Council Committee upon this subject, I can say that it has excited a very great deal of interest, and that there appears to be every prospect of great usefulness to come from this grant in favour of technical instruction. I did not follow the noble Earl, if I understood him rightly, when he said that there was a recommendation, along with this grant, in favour of giving it to technical education. My recollection is that there was no recommendation from the Government upon this matter. But, my Lords, that makes the argument in favour of continuing the grant all the stronger; because, of their own initiative, the County Councils, or a large majority of them, have decided to devote this grant to technical instruction. I believe London is the chief exception. There can be no question, my Lords, of the great interest that has been excited in the whole country in this direction. The county with which I am associated, Huntingdonshire, is a strictly rural county, and we found the greatest difficulty in starting any subject which could be of use in a strictly agricultural rural district. But I may mention one. We have found that carpentering classes, which we had to apply to the Science and Art Department for permission to hold, have been most useful, and that during this winter in some villages very large numbers indeed of common labourers have attended these classes, and the work they have turned out is most creditable. My Lords, I would also allude to another point in supplementing what the noble Earl has said, namely, that a great many instructors were preparing themselves for teaching technical instruction throughout the country in the future. Not only is that so, but many colleges have been started for the purpose of agricultural education, and they are relying upon this grant, supplemented and assisted by donations from the County Councils towards them, for their maintenance. I do not know much about the Northern Colleges, but in connection with Cambridge there is a movement before the authorities to start a special agricultural college which is to be maintained entirely by a grant from the County Councils in the Eastern Counties of England. If this is not to be a permanent grant these institutions will suffer considerably—they will die a natural death after having just been started, and the loss to the country will be considerable. I am one of those who believe that a great deal of good is to be done in this branch of education. There is no doubt that when a scholar leaves the primary school there is a lapse in the way of anything providing any instruction which is useful to him; but the proof is certainly forthcoming that in these rural villages, if you can encourage the agricultural labourer to attend classes to teach him anything of a technical kind, he is willing to attend to receive that instruction; and I consider that in that way we shall do as much good as in any other in keeping the agricultural labourer on the soil. I only hope, with the noble Earl, that the Government will make a statement that the County Councils may know that this grant will be continued permanently.

*LORD NORTON: Before the Lord President replies I should be glad to say one word in support of what has fallen from the noble Earl opposite on this question. I think everybody who knows anything of the subject must feel it is high time that we should have information both as to how this Technical Instruction grant has been spent, and how it is intended to be dealt with in future. For my own part, I think a more vague and unconstitutional vote of public money was never made since Parliament first began. It was appropriated by the House of Commons for a totally different object, and diverted to this object, and, having been so diverted, it is sent broadcast over the country to large and small County Councils, without any very definite specification of the mode in which it was to be spent, except that it was to be upon technical instruction. So far was it from binding the action of the County Councils, that the Council which has the largest share (one quarter of the whole grant) has spent it upon something totally different; the grant being half a million, the London County Council, having £140,000 out of it, have spent it not on technical instruction, but simply in relief of the local rates of London. But, my Lords, bad as it is that money should be so diverted from its first appropriation and afterwards so irregularly spent, I think there is a still greater mischief lurking in this Treasury grant: that it is increasing the tendency of the present time to look to the Treasury for doing everything. In fact, it is the most symptom of the spirit of this country going down, that we are more and more encouraged by Parliament to subsist the public purse, and to look to the Treasury to do things which ought to be done by the voluntary spirit of the country, as they used to be, and be much better done. With regard to technical instruction, the youth of the country used to be apprenticed to trades by private endowments, or by employers, whose object it was to them. There are a great number of employers who have made noble provisions of this sort. But then came the Technical Instruction Act, which called this action on the part of the manufacturers. No man will do that which finds the country is willing to vote out of the public purse to do. That from whom I have learned most of this subject is Mr. Mather, the Member for North Lancashire. That man, engaged in engineering works at Salford and men in his employment, established his works two technical schools at all his younger workmen were taught; they were shown every new invention and it was the business of the foremen in the works, whenever anything new was done, to teach and show it to apprentices. When this Technical Instruction Act was passed, though it checked others, it did not check Mr. Mather; on the contrary, so intense was he upon the advancement of art in this country that he not only continued his noble work, which cost him thousands a year, but he supported the Technical Instruction Act, amended it greatly in the Committee, we know, if it had not been for the sake of the public money. It would have been a much worse Act than it is. But it was amended by him last week of the Session of 1889, came into this House and was carried through all its stages on the day of its origination. Mr. Mather still continues his work. I asked him how it was, in face of the very thing that he objects to most, namely, work of that sort thrown upon public money; and he said—"Because I saw that the Technical Instruction Act must be worked in the mode of a rate in aid of voluntary work and not in superseding voluntary work in the various localities of the country."

The Marquess of Huntly

And so it has been by the intelligent manufacturers of the North. But then I said—"Though that Act will enable a small rate in aid from local rates to subsidize voluntary action, yet you could not say this of the Treasury grant sent broadcast over the whole country; that at all events would supersede voluntary action." He said, "No, we have managed carefully to prevent that in Lancashire and Yorkshire; the manufacturers have combined together, and have organised a system of distributing the grant only in the way of aid to voluntary undertakings. In that way they have deprived this Treasury grant of the chief mischief to which it was likely to lead." What does this show? It shows me that a subsidy of this sort applies very differently to different parts of the country, just as the political franchise in an intelligent part of the country, like Lancashire and Yorkshire, is very differently used from what is the case in a simply rural district like Warwickshire or Wiltshire. In my own county, Warwickshire, I know when the sum of £9,000, the share of this Vote, came, they did not know what in the world to do with it; but they said "as it is a gift" (for they had already got in the country to look upon a Treasury grant as a gift from Heaven, and to forget entirely that it comes out of their own pockets, so far have they been demoralized by hanging upon the patronage of the Government)—"as it is a gift we had better take it and do something with it." In Lancashire and Yorkshire this Act has not done harm, because it has been so carefully treated as a subsidy to local undertakings; but I maintain that in a large part of the Kingdom the fatal tendency of such a largess as this must have a bad effect, from its not having been neutralized by specific appropriation and private organization, as has been done in Manchester. My Lords, I only say that I hope the Lord President will reply to the noble Earl opposite that the information shall be given us what the intentions of the Government are as to this Treasury grant in future; and I would add this—which I would move myself if necessary, but I cannot help hoping that the Lord President will say that he is perfectly willing to give it without a Motion—a Return of Parliament of the way in which the Treasury grant has been expended up to this time by every County Council throughout the Kingdom.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, it is not at all unnatural that the noble Earl opposite and others interested in the work of County Councils should wish to know upon what footing they stand with respect to this Treasury grant. And, in the first place, I would just say, with regard to what my noble Friend behind me has said, that I do not quite understand his argument, which is—that where this grant is properly used it does good, or, at all events, does no harm; but that in other places, where it is improperly used, it apparently, in his opinion, is doing a great deal of harm. But he has not pointed out the places in which it is properly used, nor, in fact, has he come to any conclusion apparently upon this subject, like the County Councils themselves; for the County Councils have, very naturally, been using the money in rather a tentative manner, endeavouring to ascertain what was most suitable to the populations around them, and the best mode of meeting the wants of those particular districts. For that reason in many parts of the country the money has been distributed to the Urban Sanitary Authority or other authorities who know the wants of their particular localities, but, of course, keeping an account of the expenditure of that money and the mode in which it is dealt with. My noble Friend behind me wants a Return of all that has been done by the County Councils. That would be most voluminous. But I can tell him where he may find it in abstract most efficiently set forth, and that is in these two small books, published by a Society of which the Duke of Devonshire is the head, A Record of Technical and Secondary Education. They published the first number in November last, and the second in January last. So far as they go they seem to me to contain a most complete account of what is being done by the Councils. But with regard to the general statement of what has been done I find that, out of 62 County Councils in England and Wales, 52 are applying the whole sum received, under the Local Taxation Act, to technical instruction, while nine are giving a part to it; so that that accounts really for all but one, and that one is the one which, as my noble Friend says, has received the largest sum—the County Council of London. Now, my Lords, there are some who would say that if you are to apply this sum specially to technical instruction (which is not quite the case at present, it is only giving the power to use it for technical instruction, and giving certainly a hint in the Act of Parliament that it should be so used), you must make it compulsory upon all County Councils to apply it in that way. But the time does not seem to me to have arrived for taking that step, because there has been shown such vigour and vitality on the part of County Councils that there is no need to put pressure upon them. With regard to the County Boroughs, I think it is very much the same. Out of the 63 County Boroughs, in every case, except Wolverhampton, the whole or nearly the whole amount has been so devoted. And, besides that, there is a very remarkable fact, which shows the zeal and energy that is going on in these different districts. For I find in a Return made by the same Society, which has taken trouble over the subject, that there are a great number of places (I need not enumerate them all, but I have a long list of them) which applied, not only the money they had so received, but rates that they have raised under the Technical Instruction Act, in order to further expedite the business they have in hand. My Lords, I am not going, at this stage of the business, to come to a definite conclusion as to how a system of technical instruction in these different districts would work; but this I would say: my noble Friend seems to be under the impression that a check has been put upon voluntary effort, in connection with this subject, by the grant which has been made by the Treasury. I believe it to be precisely the reverse. I believe it to be perfectly clear that there has been an enormous increase, both in the number of persons who apply themselves to this technical instruction, and in those who manage it. Look at what the effect has been in the Science and Art Schools, where we find we are put in the greatest possible difficulty by the enormous number of papers sent in for examination; 190,000 papers were sent in last year for examination in the Science and Art Department. It has become a business that it is almost impossible to manage. And, in consequence of that, the Science and Art Department, guarded as they are now by the County Councils having these funds at their disposal, have altered, by a Minute from May next, the lower-class education, on which considerable grants have been earned, and diverting them to a higher kind of education, so that the County Councils may not be working with them and paying double for the same thing; but that it may be divided: the Science and Art Department giving its attention, in the Science Department specially, to education which will bring people more forward and make them more fit for the occupations in which they are to be engaged. And upon this subject I would say one more word with respect to a point made by the noble Earl opposite who introduced this question, that the Act of Parliament prevented the teaching of trades. It was never meant that you should teach trades, and you could not do so effectually without interfering with the workshops. What the Act really means is this: That there is many a young man who may be in the workshop learning dexterity in the use of the materials so placed in his hand, but it is not the less important for him that he should attend the evening classes, as is done in certain parts of the kingdom, and learn the scientific use of those materials which are so put in his hands, and, not only to use them under the lecturer, but also by experiments to learn, in fact, that manual dexterity which begins as you see in the schools. We have enforced drawing in schools. But what is the reason for it? It is that the children learn manual dexterity. We are not going to make drawing masters, but to make persons begin their scientific education by means of using their scientific instruction dexterously with their hands as well as in their minds; very much as in Birmingham they have set up a sort of jewellery establishment, where they teach the scientific mode of dealing with jewels, but the people who come there are being employed in the workshops and learning manually. Many of your Lordships, I dare say, may have read an article by Lord Armstrong in, I think, the Nineteenth Century, which took the view very distinctly of rather dereciating technical instruction and the here scientific system, because, he said, the only way in which the workman can really learn his work is in the workshop. So it is all through, as I think my noble Friend opposite will find. For instance, in dairying it is very difficult to say, when you are teaching the manipulation of butter by a scientific lecture, that you are not teaching a trade. Still, it is only after a long-experience in the actual work of a dairy that an effective dairymaid is made; and yet the instruction she receives is a very good thing to begin with, that she may know the scientific principles upon which she has to work. So I hope in some of the schools where carpentering is taught in the general sense—that is to say, you make the boys draw the different things they are going to make, and they make them in wood, not for me, as they will afterwards have to make them in metal or otherwise probably, but to show that they have arrived at a scientific knowledge of the particular pursuit in which they are going to be engaged. They will be better workmen for working not only by rule of thumb, but by such scientific instructions as they will have received. I have looked through the different methods in which the County Councils have employed this money, and I am bound to say it strikes me that though in a great many instances, as they say themselves, it has been only a tentative process, they have gone very carefully to work, in order to ascertain how they may best discipline the young people of their counties. For instance, if you go to Bedfordshire you will find that a certain amount of the Vote has been devoted to technical instruction generally, but that also in certain districts it has been used for instruction in the straw work, which your Lordships know is one of the industries of that county, in which they learn the mode of manipulation; but it will take a long time before they will be actually workmen capable of bringing out the high class of produce for which that county is celebrated. I mention that as one instance. In other cases the County Councils have taken a different view; they have established colleges or scientific schools of different kinds, whether it be in horticulture, in bee-keeping, or other things, and they give scholarships from the elementary schools to these colleges. And, my Lords, when I look at what has been done by the County Councils, and the way in which they have engaged the funds which have been placed in their hands, I cannot help recalling what was said by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he was asked by Lord Hartington in the House of Commons—I think more than a year ago—what was to be done with this money. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said—

"I do not consider I am in a position to give any further or official assurance, but I may say that there are no suggestions before me for applying these grants to some other people, and I may add, as my personal opinion, that if the County Councils set themselves heartily to work, as in many instances they appear to be doing, to utilise the grant for important educational purposes, it would probably be difficult for any Minister to persuade Parliament to divert them, even if he desired himself to do so."

My Lords, now the County Councils have stepped so far in that it would be impossible; and I do not hesitate to say that, inasmuch as the grants are made under an Act of Parliament, it seems to me that you have a guarantee, so far as this Government is concerned, that it has not the smallest intention of repealing that Act of Parliament, or taking the money for any other purpose; and I am quite convinced, from the mode in which that money has been laid hold of and used, and the mode in which the County Councils are taking steps to use it with even greater advantage, that no Government will repeal that Act of Parliament with a view of taking it from them. Whether the time may come when they should think it necessary to insist upon its being used in that particular form is not before us at present, and I will not dwell upon it. I may, however, say this: I do hope that the County Council of London will not be altogether backward in applying some of this money for the purposes for which, no doubt, although Parliament did not assign it for that particular object, it practically gave a strong recommendation that it should be employed. Herein London, where there are schools of every description where scholarships might be given, or instruction might be had for payment, and where in every way these schools which exist, voluntary and other, can be made more of State in requiring the Governor General or the Governors of Madras and Bombay, or the Commander-in-Chief, to come home? Are those "public grounds" matters of grave consequence affecting India? If they are, surely the place for the Governor General and these high officers is in India; if they are matters connected with this country, surely we ought to have some explanation as to what kind of matters are of sufficient importance to justify the Secretary of State in requiring the Governor General or the Commander-in-Chief to come home. We all felt, my Lords, that Her Majesty's Jubilee was an occasion when it was quite justifiable, as a perfectly exceptional circumstance, to bring home to this country the Commander-in-Chief in Bombay, His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught. I do not think anybody could fairly quarrel with an exceptional Act of Parliament being passed in those circumstances. But, my Lords, in ordinary circumstances I cannot myself conceive that it would be right to summon the Commander-in-Chief in India home to this country. He is in a military position, perhaps the most responsible in the world, with dangers constantly occurring that cannot be expected. I must say, my Lords, that the whole policy expressed in this Bill—I will not go into details—appears to me to be open to very considerable doubt, and I trust, if your Lordships pass the Second Reading of this Bill, to which I should not myself be a consenting party, the Secretary of State will lay before the House some Papers showing that the matter has been considered, and, moreover, that he will consider whether there should not be some definition, even if this Bill goes forward, as to what the public grounds are to be on which, and some limit of time for which the Governor General may be required to come home by the Secretary of State. There is no limit whatever in the Bill. Absolutely the Governor General or the Commander-in-Chief may be sent for to come home by the Secretary of State, and may remain without any limit of time in this country. These are, I think, sufficient reasons to show your Lordships that this Bill requires further consideration. I will not dwell upon another matter; still, it is a matter of some importance. These officers are to come home from India on public grounds connected with this country. Who is to pay the expense? I presume the Secretary of State will move in the other House that all expenses connected with the visit shall be paid out of the Imperial Revenues, because it would be very unfair upon the Indian Revenues that the expense should come out of the finances of India. Not that it would be any very great sum, but as a matter of principle. These matters are being watched by the people of India, and care should be taken to do justice to all parties, and if the visits home are to be on English grounds, care should be taken in another place to put the whole of the expense upon the finances of this country, and not upon the finances of India. I myself, my Lords, am against increasing the facilities for people holding these high offices to vacate their appointments for a limited time. I think there is something to be said, if there is now any difficulty (I do not believe myself there is), in favour of enabling the Lieutenant Governors of Bengal, the North-West Provinces and the Punjab, to come home on sick leave. I apprehend that they can do so now under the present law. I believe that, on a medical certificate, those officers may come home on sick leave for a certain time, and I say that I think there is no objection to that; in point of fact, I think there is good reason for allowing it, because these officers are all officers belonging to the Indian Civil Service, and, therefore, it would be hard upon them, if their health broke down in those appointments, that they should not be allowed to come home on sick leave in the same way as they can if they fill the high appointments of Members of the Governor General's Council. But that argument does not apply, in my opinion, to the other officers mentioned here; it does not apply to the Governor General of India, to the Governors of Madras and Bombay, or to the Commander-in-Chief in India—it would not in any way interfere with his military position that he should have to give up his appointment—it does not apply to the Commanders-in-Chief of Madras and Bombay. My Lords, the reason why I object to any greater facilities being given for the vacation of these important offices is that, at present in India, the constant vacancies in offices, by reason of their solders going away on sick leave and otherwise, is a great public evil. It is (to use a familiar expression) a general case of "post;" one man goes away and another is acting for him, and a third is for the person transferred; so that all over India there is uncertainty as to who is really doing these important duties. And, I think, if you extend this system to officers filling these high appointments (and it would be extended if this Bill passes), you would be increasing an evil which is, even now, no means of minor importance.

The Earl of Northbrook

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, I shall not at all contest the criticisms which the noble Lord has used upon the wording of this Bill. My noble Friend thought it right to opt the wording taken in the Standing Committee, but I readily grant to the noble Lord that it will require a good deal of correction, and there are particular questions which I will readily leave as questions of detail to be debated at another stage of the Bill, if your Lordships think fit to give the Bill a Second reading. But on the general principle I cannot concur with the noble Lord. The state of the case is this: that when these Acts were passed originally, which are modifying now, it was impossible to get from India to England except by going round the Cape, and it took six or eight months to do so. At that time short leave was unknown. Gradually, as the means of communication increased, those parts of the Service of India which were not limited by Statute received the advantage (of which, perhaps, as the noble Lord says, they are too abundantly availed themselves) of privileged leave, and other forms of leave, which enabled them to come home from time to time. But the result of this is that statutory law is not in any way to diminish the game of "post," of which the noble Lord complains; it is to create an anomaly: that some of the posts at the head of the Service, which are held by the oldest men—by the men who have been most tried, by the men to whom leave on medical certificates may be most absolutely given—to them it is impossible, while it is freely granted to all the rest of the Service. I do not think the noble Lord is entitled to put such upon us. He has to show why we have to keep this strange anomaly standing quite by itself in the Service of the Queen, and which has grown up to its present proportions through the enormous alteration of the conditions of passage which have taken place. The noble Lord asks what evils there are. I decline to be committed to instances; it is impossible to give instances; instances would involve not only entering upon private affairs of individuals, but speaking of matters which properly ought not to be spoken of in public. But there are two inconveniences of the present system which are more or less grave. One of them is the impossibility of consultation; the other is that, owing to the difficulty of obtaining temporary leave, or medical leave, it is difficult to fill some of the offices mentioned in this Schedule. I do not mean to go into details; but nobody who has had anything to do with the filling of them will doubt the accuracy of what I say. I am quite ready to go into the question of limitations, if it is thought that limitations are necessary. If you cannot trust the Secretary of State in Council, I should not resist putting in any limitations which may be thought wise; but I think the time has come for departing from an arrangement which is evidently obsolete, and which is a hindrance, in more than one respect, to the proper carrying on of the Public Service. I speak feelingly from my own office when I say that consultation is of the essence of the Public Service, and one of the great advantages which the facilities of communication give to us now; and in the Foreign Office I know it is frequently used; I believe it is frequently used in the Colonial Office also, though I have no personal experience of that; but we are debarred from personal communication with the members of the Councils of the three Provinces by the state of the law. I do not wish to revert to old troubles; but my impression is that some points on which I had the misfortune to differ from the noble Lord very strongly, when we were in the respective offices of Secretary of State and Governor General, might have been entirely averted if it had been possible for me to send home for the persons principally concerned. I therefore think you are placing an unnecessary fetter and impediment on the usefulness of the Public Service. If you cannot trust those who have the administration of these duties to exercise powers so large as are contained in this Bill, well, offer to us limitations of them. I will not exclude the idea of them; but I do hope the House will consent to depart from a system which in itself is anomalous and unwise.

*THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, with respect to a portion of the Bill, I am not disposed to disagree with the noble Marquess opposite. For instance, with regard to the Governors General of Bengal, the North-West Provinces, and the Punjab, I do not think there is any necessity for a restriction bearing upon them more than upon any other member of the Indian Service. It may be necessary to give them the power to come home either for consultation or for leave. But I confess I do feel, with my noble Friend Lord Northbrook, grave doubt as to the applicability of this Bill, either to the Governor General of India or to the Commander-in-Chief. There is no doubt much force in what the noble Marquess has said as to the advantage of consultation with officers with whom you have to act; but here we have to consider, as in most other matters, the balance of advantages, and we have to consider whether the possibility of the Governor General being brought home to Europe, for the purpose of consultation with the Government here, might not bring about evils greater than any advantage that could be derived. Your Lordships must bear in mind that there is no officer serving under the Government, certainly not an Ambassador or Colonial Governor, whose responsibility can in any degree be compared with that of the Viceroy of India. The Viceroy stands, as it were, on a pinnacle, and his personal responsibility is very great. In this country, whatever Government may be in Office aims, I think, to send out the most distinguished and able man who can be selected for the post, and that because we consider that it is not merely an administrative post that can be carried on by any man with the assistance of others, even if he is not of very high character and ability, but that upon the personal character, and influence, and ability of the Viceroy depends, to a very great extent, the conduct of that vast machine—the Government of the Empire of India. I think that the temptation to send for the Viceroy in cases where serious difference arises between the Viceroy (himself probably a distinguished man) and the Government at home, would be very great. On both sides there would be a strong desire, probably by consultation, to avoid differences which on either side would be deplored, and it would be very difficult to resist an application on either side for the use of the power under this Bill. But it might be that serious danger might result, because in the Empire of India there might suddenly be some movement, internal or external, when the absence of the Viceroy and the occupation of his post by some temporary occupant might deprive the Government in India of that prompt action which, at such a time, is most essential. Therefore, while I do not deny the force of the argument put by the noble Marquess, I feel that on the other hand the disadvantages are very serious. And I think the same thing applies to the Commander-in-Chief. The Commander-in-Chief is a soldier of the highest eminence, and is a man upon whom the greatest responsibility rests; and if there were to be any serious frontier war—still more, any serious outbreak in India in the absence of the Commander-in-Chief—some great calamity might result. I say nothing as to the Governors of the Punjab or the North-West Provinces, or the Members of the Viceroy's Council, or even the Governors of Madras and Bombay; because, although I think the latter have not the same claim which the Governors of the Punjab and the North-West Provinces have to leave—being only officers employed, as it were, temporarily in India—I do not feel that the position of Governor of Madras and Bombay, in point of importance and responsibility, differs so much from that of the Governor of Bengal and the North-West Provinces and the Punjab that you can properly draw a distinction between them. I confine my objections, therefore, to the Governor General and the Commander-in-Chief. My Lords, I did not feel so strongly about the Bill last year; I had not had time to consult with others, and I felt a hesitation in throwing any obstacle in the way of the Bill. But, after the weighty observations of my noble Friend, who has himself been Viceroy, and whose opinions are certainly of value in the matter, I trust the

The Marquess of Salisbury

Government will give very careful consideration to the objections which he has raised.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

---

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 15th February, 1892.

---

QUESTIONS.

CROWN AGENTS FOR COLONIES.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Stockport): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies by whom are the Crown Agents for Colonies, or Agents for Crown Colonies, appointed, and who can remove them; have they any powers independently of any special powers which may be given to them from time to time by any Crown Colony for general or special purposes; and, if so, what are those powers; are Crown Colonies or any other Colonies compelled to make them their agents, or may such Colonies employ other agents in England; what is their remuneration, and by whom it is paid; who pays their staff; and do they pay any, and if so what, rent for the rooms which they and their staff use as offices in the Colonial Office?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Crown Agents are appointed and can be removed by the Secretary of State; but the question of removing them has never had to be considered. They act upon instructions from the Secretary of State or from the Colonial Governments on behalf of whom they act. Beyond this they have no powers, except what may be invested in them by Colonial enactments in particular cases. Crown Colonies are required to employ the Crown Agents, but Colonies having responsible Governments employ their own Agents. The remuneration of the Crown Agents and of their staff is determined by the Secretary of State, and is derived from the payments made by Colonial Governments for the business transacted by them on scales approved by him. The Crown Agents pay out of the receipts referred to the rent for the use of the rooms occupied by them in the offices in Downing Street, which has been fixed by Her Majesty's Government. On this subject I may refer my hon. Friend to the Parliamentary Paper [C. 3075] of 1881.

THE CASE OF THOMAS NUNN.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of Thomas Nunn, who, at the County of London (North) Sessions on Monday last, having been found guilty of attempting to commit a burglary, was sentenced to five years' penal servitude, and whether there was any sworn evidence before the Court to contradict the statement of the prisoner that since he last came out of prison (about four years ago) he had been "endeavouring to earn an honest living," and, if not, whether he will consider the advisability of materially mitigating the severity of the sentence?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have made inquiry into the facts of the case. The prisoner was found guilty at the County of London Sessions of attempted burglary, and, on a second indictment, of being in possession of a house breaking implement by night. No evidence was offered at the trial that since his discharge from prison he had been endeavouring to earn an honest living nor did he refer the police to anyone from whom information on this subject could be obtained. The prisoner had been convicted of larceny on four occasions between 1878 and 1883 and of assault in 1889. I am unable to advise any mitigation of the sentence.

THE PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND)
ACTS, 1885-1888.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what portion of the £10,000,000 sanctioned by the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Acts, 1885-1888, remained unappropriated on the coming into operation of "The Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891"?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. L. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): It appears from the Annual Report of the Irish Land Commissioners recently circulated, that up to the 21st August, 1891, they had received, after deducting cases refused, applications for £10,125,703, being £125,703 in excess of the grant of £10,000,000. Of the sum so applied for, they had sanctioned advances to the amount of £8,902,840, thus leaving a sum of £1,097,160 available for applications received which had not then been ruled. The Commissioners now add that further applications were subsequently lodged, with the result that on December 31st, 1891, the pending applications for advances under the Acts of 1885 and 1888 were for £361,584 in excess of the funds provided thereunder.

THE OFFICIAL REPORT OF PROCEEDINGS IN PARLIAMENT.

MR. J. ELLIS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury with whom the Government have entered into a contract for the reporting of debates and proceedings of the House; whether any opportunity was given to more than one firm to tender for the same; and, if so, whether he will state the names; and whether a copy of such contract will be laid upon the Table, and distributed?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham): The Government have given the contract for the reporting of Parliamentary Debates to Reuter's Telegram Company, Limited. Competition for the contract was invited by advertisements in the public Press. Sixteen tenders for the contract were received; but it would be unusual to publish the names of the unsuccessful tenderers. I will lay a copy of the contract on the Table.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether we are to understand that the contract is definite, or will the House have an opportunity of discussing the matter? I also wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether in the tenders it was specifically stated that advertisements might be taken or not by the contractor and put in at the end of the Reports; and whether, if that be not the case, if it was not stated that advertisements might be taken, whether Messrs. Reuter will have that right or not?

SIR JOHN GORST: The contract is definitely made; but as to the other questions I must have notice to enable me to answer them.

MR. J. ELLIS: May I ask when the contract will be laid on the Table?

SIR JOHN GORST: Immediately.

THE FOREST DEPARTMENT (INDIA).

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India have repeatedly supported the claims of the Covenanted Officers of the Forest Department to the same pension rules as their colleagues in the Department of Public Works and Telegraph Department; whether the Secretary of State has withheld his sanction to the concession asked for by them; whether the recruitment of the Forest Department is identical with that of the Public Works and Telegraph Departments by competitive examination and subsequent professional training at Cooper's Hill; and whether the Public Service Commission, locally appointed to inquire into the conditions of the Indian Services, has made the same recommendations as the Government of India?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): The statements made in the question are substantially correct; but I should explain that the Secretary of State has not refused his sanction, but is awaiting further information as to the proposals of the Government of India before coming to a decision.

THE CIVIL WAR IN CHILI—SHIPMENT OF SPECIE ON BOARD H.M.S. "ESPIEGLE."

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Berkshire, East): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is the fact that during the recent Civil War in Chili, Captain Clarke, of H.M.S. Espiegle, was induced by the Dictator Balmaceda to convey out of the country 336 bars of silver, valued at 936,824 dollars, which, under an Act of the Chilean Legislature, had been deposited in the Treasury at Santiago, upon an express trust to secure the redemption of the paper currency of the Republic; whether the bullion so conveyed was intended to be used by Balmaceda for the prosecution of the war and the maintenance of his usurped power; whether Balmaceda had previously applied to the Bank of Valparaiso and to the National Bank of Chili to purchase, and to the Commander of the United States sloop of war Baltimore to transport out of the country, this bullion, and whether he had met with a refusal from all of them upon the ground that the same was subject to a trust for the creditors of the Republic; what commission Captain Clarke received for his services, and whether he acted under any and what higher authority; whether the Admiralty Order, authorising the Commanders of British men of war to carry specie belonging to private firms or individuals in time of war, applies to such a case; and whether the action of Captain Clarke has been approved by Her Majesty's Government?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): It is true that Captain Clarke, of H.M.S. Espiegle, did convey certain specie from Chili to Montevideo. The silver in question was placed at the disposal of the President by an Act of the Chilian Congress. It was not the duty of Her Majesty's officers to inquire into the policy of the proceeding or into the constitutional questions which were in controversy in Chili. The legal title of the existing Chilian Government was universally recognised by Foreign Governments, and the shipment of specie by the Captain of H.M.S. Espiegle was regular, and in no sense inconsistent with the orders on the Station. There is litigation pending in regard to this question, which makes it undesirable to make any change in the regulations at present; but it is being considered whether any further regulation is not desirable in the case of specie to be conveyed at the instance of a public authority. Under the Orders in Council, the freight payable is 1 per cent. on the value of the specie conveyed, divided in the following proportions:—One quarter to the Admiral on the Station: one half to the Captain and Company of the vessel conveying the treasure; and one quarter to Greenwich Hospital. The Admiral and Captain Clarke have both asked leave to return any sums to which they are entitled. As to the other questions I have no information.

VOL. I.      [NEW SERIES.]

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: Perhaps the noble Lord can answer the last question but one?

LORD G. HAMILTON: No distinction is made.

MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN: I will take an opportunity of bringing up the whole question in discussion on the Navy Estimates.

GALLERY OF BRITISH PICTURES.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he can state what progress has been made in the negotiations with Mr. Henry Tate for the erection of a gallery for British pictures?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. R. D. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The Government are anxiously considering the matter referred to in the Question; but the allocation of the ground owned by the Government at South Kensington is a matter, as my hon. Friend will, no doubt, agree, not easy to settle to the full satisfaction of all the interests affected. If my hon. Friend will renew his Question—say a week hence—I hope to be able to give him some definite information.

DELIVERY OF MAIIS IN COUNTY WICKLOW.

MR. W. CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he has received an application from residents of the townlands of Knockadreath, Bolinass, Newfarm, and Anagowlawn, in the County of Wicklow, for a delivery of letters at least once a day in those places; and whether he will cause their request to be complied with?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I have received such an application; but inasmuch as the letters which would be affected number only 52 a week, producing a revenue of £5 15s. a year, I regret that it has not been thought proper to comply with it.

THE RESTORATION OF USIBEBU.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, with respect to the letter dated the 7th January, 1892, written by the direction of Lord Knutsford to the Secretary of the Aborigines near Egypt, if return to Egypt is considered unadvisable?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Since the hon. Member placed his Question upon the Paper, two Parliamentary Papers have been distributed, which will probably afford to the hon. Member all the information which he desires upon the subject.

SALE OF INDIAN AND COLONIAL STAMPS IN THE UNITED KINGDOM.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that in Sydney, Melbourne, and in other capitals of British Colonies, and in foreign countries, it is possible to buy stamps of the United Kingdom at a small enhancement of price; and whether he will provide similar facilities at the chief London and provincial post offices, and give instructions for the sale of stamps in use in British India and the various British Colonies and Possessions, so as to enable persons in this country to send stamps for replies, or to defray small purchases?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): It is not known if the post offices of British Colonies keep for sale stamps of the United Kingdom. It is not thought advisable to purchase and keep for sale in British post offices stamps of India and the Colonies; and the Post Office does all in its power to discourage remittances by postage stamps in letters, because of the temptation thus placed in the way of the sorters and postmen.

PRIVATE POST CARDS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he intends to permit the public to use their own postcards (with a halfpenny stamp attached to each), provided that such postcards (in size and in every other respect conform to the regulations; and whether he is aware that the cost of postage stamps (to the Government) amounts to only £16 per million, whereas postcards cost them £334 per million?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The question is now under consideration. As a matter of fact, the postcards cost in manufacture not £334, but £283.

Mr. Cunningham Graham

TECHNICAL AND SECONDARY EDUCATION IN THE METROPOLIS.

MR. LAFONE (Southwark, Bermondsey): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that the London County Council during the past year applied no part of the sum placed at their disposal from the Beer and Spirit Duties to the purposes of technical and secondary education in the Metropolis; and whether this departure from the practice followed by all the County Councils in England and Wales is in conformity with the provisions of the Customs and Excise Act, 1891, by which large sums were placed at the disposal of the County Council; and, if not, whether it is his intention to take any steps to enforce compliance with the Act?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am aware of the fact mentioned in the first part of the hon. Member's Question. The course taken by the London County Council is not out of conformity with the Customs and Excise Act, 1890, which permits, but does not require, the application of the money derived from the Beer and Spirit Duties to technical and secondary education.

DRAINAGE OF THE BARROW AND THE BANN.

MR. LEAHY (Kildare, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that much distress and injury to property has been caused by the flooding of the River Barrow during the present season; and whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill this Session for the drainage of the river?

MR. JACKSON: I must remind the hon. Member that a Bill dealing with the matter mentioned cannot be introduced unless preliminary notices are served upon the owners and occupiers concerned. In two or three successive years the present Government undertook the cost and trouble of carrying out the necessary preliminaries, with a view to legislating for the improvement of certain rivers of Ireland in a comprehensive manner, and which included the case of the river mentioned. These attempts, however, failed to obtain the approval of hon. Members and of the House.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's County, Ossory) : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that last year the present Leader of the House distinctly gave me to understand that if there was a strong desire on the part of the locality in favour of the measure it would be reintroduced ? I would also ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is aware that a great amount of illness has arisen from the unsatisfactory condition of the river at Portarlington ?

MR. JACKSON : I am not aware of the undertaking to which the hon. Member refers. If the inhabitants of the district are very anxious to have the Bill reintroduced and legislation passed, that emphasises the regret we feel that opposition to the Bill was so strong that we could not carry it through on a former occasion.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.) : Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will answer the question, of which I have given him private notice, whether there is an intention to re-introduce the Bann Drainage Bill ?

MR. JACKSON : I understand the necessary notices have been given, and it is intended to re-introduce the Bill, which we hope will meet with general acceptance.

THE GREEN STREET COURT-HOUSE, DUBLIN.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the observations of the Lord Chief Justice in opening the City and County Dublin Commission of Oyer and Terminer on Tuesday last, to the effect that "If the responsibility for the Court-house was conjoint, the disgrace equally belonged to the Corporation and the Government. To-day it was impossible to move or breathe in the Court. The place was pervaded by a mephitic atmosphere. If he did not find before the next Commission that some practical move was taken to remedy the state of things, he would summon a meeting of the Common Law Judges, and take counsel with his brethren as to whether they could not go elsewhere"; and whether, in view of the universal and long-continued complaints as to the state of Green Street Court-house, the Government intend to take any steps to secure a building in which the law can be administered without danger to the health of those concerned ?

MR. JACKSON : The unsatisfactory condition of Green Street Court-house in Dublin has for a considerable time engaged the attention of the Irish Government. So far back as 1883 an arrangement was come to whereby the Government agreed to provide £13,500, the Corporation of Dublin £18,000, and the Grand Jury of the County of Dublin £9,000, the total estimated cost being £40,500. The matter, however, subsequently fell through owing to the Corporation having declined to proceed. The responsibility in the matter, therefore, wholly rests with the Corporation. Should the Corporation now agree, and the Grand Jury be willing to contribute to the extent they formerly agreed, I shall be glad to bring the matter before the Treasury for a renewal of the proposed Government grant of £13,500.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) : May I ask why a contribution is expected from the Corporation, who cannot even appoint a Court-keeper ? What have the Corporation to do with Green-street Court-house ?

MR. JACKSON : I believe the whole responsibility of providing a Court-house rests with the Corporation.

MR. T. M. HEALY : But will the Corporation have any power in relation to the Court-house ?

MR. JACKSON : Perhaps the hon. Member will give notice of his question.

THE GRANT TO IRISH EDUCATION.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he would disclose his scheme for the distribution of the £200,000 Irish education money, and for the £100,000 left from last year immediately on the conclusion of the Address ; and, if not, then on what date ?

MR. JACKSON : The distribution of the £200,000 Irish education money will be dealt with in the Bill about to be introduced ; and I hope to be in a position at an early date to make proposals with regard to the allocation of the £100,000 for the current year.

COLONEL NOLAN : Will the right hon. Gentleman give us some information as to the probable determination ?

MR. JACKSON : It is not in my power to determine, but it is the intention to introduce a proposal at an early date.

THE ALBERT UNIVERSITY.

MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether there is any truth in the reports that the Charter for the Albert University is being re-considered and modified; and when the said Charter will be laid upon the Table of this House?

THE VICE PRESIDENT (Sir W. HART-DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The Draft Charter has not passed out of the hands of the Privy Council, but it is practically settled, and will be laid on the Table during the week.

THE TRAINING OF THE 5TH BATTALION ROYAL IRISH RIFLES.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to a statement that the 5th Battalion Royal Irish Rifles are to be removed for their training, this year, from Downpatrick to Holywood; and if he will give careful consideration to the excellent accommodation available in Downpatrick, where they have always assembled, in order that they may continue to have their quarters in that town?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The lease of the present range at Downpatrick is about to expire. If, however, the same range or another suitable range can be obtained on a yearly agreement, the 5th Battalion Royal Irish Rifles will be trained at Downpatrick this year.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON ARMY SERVICE.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK-ALLAN (Durham, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will lay upon the Table the Report and Recommendations of the Committee on the Terms of Service in the Army, presided over by Lord Wantage, also the evidence taken before that Committee; and, if so, on what date he expects to be able to do so; and will this be in sufficient time to allow these Papers to be considered by the House previous to the introduction of the Army Estimates this year?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I have now received all portions of the Report of Lord Wantage's Committee, and I propose to lay it on the Table. The proofs are being corrected, and I hope there will not be much delay in presenting it. I have not received a complete copy of the evidence, and until I do I cannot definitely decide about presenting it, although I should wish to do so.

DOORKEEPERS, MESSENGERS, AND PORTERS IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Circular Letter recently addressed to the Heads of Public Departments by the Comptroller and Auditor General, asking for a Return of the names of all "officers" over 60 years of age serving in such Departments, applies also to doorkeepers, messengers, and porters; and, if not, whether there is any age fixed for the compulsory retirement of such persons?

SIR JOHN GORST: The Circular in question applies only to those persons who come within the definition contained in Clause 1 of the Order in Council of August 15, 1890. No Order in Council has been passed fixing a date for the compulsory retirement of any person not included in the definition.

WORKHOUSE LABOUR.

MR. ALFRED THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board if his attention has been called to the case of Charles Smith, who on or about 24th January was prosecuted by the authorities of the Strand Union for refusing to complete his task of oakum picking, although he was suffering from very bad varicose veins and ulceration of the legs and an injured thumb, which was dismissed by Sir John Bridge, saying that it was disgraceful that a man in his condition should be brought before the Court; also to the case of Martha Davis, who about the same date was similarly charged by the Wandsworth Union when wholly unfit for the work, which was dismissed by the Magistrate, saying that Martha Davis had been charged with the same offence a day or two before, and that it appeared to have been brought out of spite; and commenting on the practice of the workhouse authorities in bringing the same charges, day after day, in the hope of securing a conviction; and if he would state to the House what he Local Government Board propose to do in the matter?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): The attention of the Local Government Board has been drawn to the case of Charles Smith, and they are in communication with the Guardians of the Strand Union as to the facts. One of the Inspectors of the Board has in the meantime seen the master of the workhouse, and has cautioned him as to his taking unfit cases before the Magistrate. The Board are informed that the case referred to is the first which has been taken by the master of the workhouse before a Magistrate where the Magistrate has not been satisfied that the offence charged has been proved. As regards the case of Martha Davis also, the Board are in communication with the Guardians with the view of obtaining further information as to the facts. With regard to the woman being brought before the Magistrate a second time, I may observe that from the reports which the Board have already received, it appears that when she was before the Magistrate on the first occasion, the case was dismissed because the certificate of the medical officer only stated that she was capable of work in the infirmary, and not that she was equal to the work of washing. The medical officer then gave a certificate that she was capable of doing any laundry work, including washing, and it was under these circumstances that she was brought before the Magistrate the second time. The medical man who examined the woman by direction of the Magistrate came to a different conclusion from that of the medical officer.

ARMENIAN PRISONERS.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the statement in the Daily News of the 12th instant, from an Armenian correspondent, that the Prison Returns for the Armenian Provinces of Van, Erzeroum, and Moosh show that there are at present something like 700 Armenians awaiting trial in prison as political prisoners; and, should he not possess any information on the subject, will he give instructions for information to be obtained from the proper quarters; and, in the event of the allegations proving correct, will Her Majesty's Government draw the attention of the Porte to the facts, as the British Government have undertaken special obligations vis-à-vis of the Armenian nation?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: No information bearing out the statement referred to has been received at the Foreign Office. Her Majesty's Representative at Constantinople will be asked whether there is any foundation for such a report. Papers with Reports from Her Majesty's Consular Officers on the affairs of Asia Minor will be presented to Parliament.

THE CONVICT JAMES M'KEVITT.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether James M'Kevitt, who was convicted at Liverpool in July 1881 for causing a dynamite explosion, is still in prison; what was his sentence; and what prison is he at present confined in?

MR. MATTHEWS: James M'Kevitt is at present undergoing a sentence of 15 years' penal servitude in Chatham prison.

IRISH EDUCATION.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has given instructions for the printing of the Return on Irish Education which he laid upon the Table on Wednesday last, and if it can be circulated before his Bill to improve national education in Ireland is introduced?

MR. JACKSON: Sir, I gave instructions last week for the printing of this Return, and for its circulation at the earliest possible moment. I have done everything in my power to hasten it. It is rather a long Return.

CROFTER EMIGRATION.

MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helen's): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Government intend to send any crofter families as colonists to Western Canada this Spring; if so, how many; to what settlement, Saltcoats, Killarney, or elsewhere; and on what date will they sail; what is the amount of funds available for such purpose at present; and from what sources is it derived; have the powers of the recently constituted Colonisation Board been in any way extended as to the raising or utilisation of funds for colonisation purposes generally; and do the Government intend to take any action on the lines recommended in the Report of the Colonisation Committee of last year?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): In reply to the first two paragraphs of this question, I have to inform my hon. Friend that the Government have no intention of sending any crofter families to Canada this Spring, there being at present no funds available for the promotion of further colonisation from Scotland. The recently constituted Board have no extended power of raising funds, but as regards utilisation of funds, their powers are extended so as to include Ireland. It is intended, shortly, to ask the House to vote a sum of money to enable the Board to carry out colonisation from Scotland on the lines recommended by the Select Committee last year.

IRISH LAND PURCHASE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland from how many, and what, counties of Ireland applications for sale and purchase, under "The Land Purchase Act, 1891," were received up to the 31st of December, 1891, by the Irish Land Commission; how many landlords and how many tenants were concerned in these applications; what was the total amount applied for, and what the total, so far, sanctioned; and what issues of stock, if any, have been made?

MR. JACKSON: The Land Commissioners report that applications under the Land Purchase Act of 1891 were received up to December 31st from 22 counties, as follows:—Ulster.—County Antrim—number of applicants—i.e., tenants—2; two estates; total amount applied for £899. Cavan—number of applicants, 6; two estates; total amount applied for, £5,226. Donegal—number of applicants, 2; one estate; total amount applied for, £825. Down—number of applicants, 1; one estate; total amount applied for, £500. Fermanagh—number of applicants, 2;

Mr. Seton-Karr

one estate; total amount applied for, £734. Londonderry—number of applicants, 5; four estates; total amount applied for, £3,063. Tyrone—number of applicants, 24; two estates; total amount applied for, £7,517. Total—42 applications; 13 estates; amount applied for, £18,764. Leinster.—Kildare—number of applicants, 18; one estate; amount applied for, £6,260. Kilkenny—number of applicants, 4; two estates; amount applied for £4,230. King's County—number of applicants, 1; one estate; amount applied for, £400. Longford—number of applicants, 1; one estate; amount applied for, £220. Meath—number of applicants, 3; two estates; amount applied for, £1,942. Wexford—number of applicants, 1; one estate; amount applied for, £1,955. Wicklow—number of applicants, 1; one estate; amount applied for, £656. Total—29 applicants; nine estates; amount applied for, £15,703. Munster.—Cork—number of applicants, 6; four estates; amount applied for, £6,074. Kerry—number of applicants, 63; three estates; amount applied for, £25,998. Limerick—number of applicants, 15; four estates; total amount applied for, £4,153. Tipperary—number of applicants, 4; two estates; total amount applied for, £2,371. Waterford—number of applicants, 3; three estates; total amount applied for, £2,920. Total—91 applicants; 16 estates; amount applied for, £41,516. Connaught.—Galway—number of applicants, 2; one estate; total amount applied for, £600. Roscommon—number of applicants, 2; two estates; total amount applied for, £372. Sligo—number of applicants, 9; two estates; total amount applied for, £2,629. Total—13 applicants; five estates; amount applied for, £3,601. Totals for Ireland—175 applications; 43 estates; total amount applied for, £79,584. For the information of the House, I may add that, taking the Return up to January 31st, the total application amounts to £130,000. No cases were sanctioned within the period specified, and no stock has been issued.

IRISH RAILWAYS.

MR. COLLERY (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if his attention has been called to the abandoned state of the works on the Collooney and Claremorris Railway; if the delay is caused by some technical disagreement between them and the Treasury; and whether, in view of the responsibility entered into (on the faith of promises made by the Government) by the counties of Sligo and Mayo, he will use his influence to bring the matter to a speedy conclusion, so that the works may be resumed and much-needed employment given in a poor and congested district, as well as to arrest the further decay of the existing works?

SIR JOHN GORST: My right hon. Friend has asked me to answer this question. The matter in dispute between the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company and the Board of Works is now the subject of negotiation. No effort will be spared to bring about a settlement at the earliest possible moment.

LADY SUB-COMMISSIONERS.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Lady Sub-Commissioners have been appointed by the Royal Commission on Labour now sitting to inquire into the conditions under which female labour is carried on in the country; and, if so, whether the Lady Sub-Commissioners will inquire first into the circumstances of female labour in the Metropolis or in the provinces?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am asked by my right hon. Friend to answer this question. One of the Commissioners of the Royal Commission on Labour has recommended the appointment of Lady Sub-Commissioners to inquire into the conditions of employment of women in certain industries. The application is now before the Treasury, and is under the consideration of that body.

ARMY VETERANS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the grant in aid of the survivors of the Crimean and Indian Mutiny campaigns, alluded to last Session, would be available for their widows?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid this could not be done, as soldiers' pensions are never in any case whatever continued to their widows.

MAJOR RASCH: I beg to ask the

Secretary of State for War whether he would consider the possibility of granting some pension to old soldiers over 50 years of age who have served 12 years with the colours?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Any grant of deferred pensions would require great consideration, as the amount involved is very large; and the system would be directly contrary to the principles of short service and a reserve. I have already announced a limited grant of pensions to men who served in campaigns before 1860; and I am now considering whether it is possible to reduce the period of service which qualifies for such pensions.

THE CHILTERN HUNDREDS.

MR. T. M. HEALY (North Longford): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the precedents upon which he acted in granting a Member of this House the Chiltern Hundreds while the House was not sitting?

MR. GOSCHEN: The dates of the grants, together with the names of the hon. Members during the last ten years, are as follows:—Mr. Sullivan, 3rd February, 1882; Sir Charles Russell, 6th February, 1882; Mr. Finigan, 15th September, 1882; Mr. Cowan, 19th October, 1882; Mr. Bisset, 16th November, 1883; Mr. Holmes, 24th January, 1884; Mr. Cohen, 7th February, 1888; Mr. Lacaita, 7th February, 1888.

BRUSHMAKERS' STRIKE IN SHEFFIELD.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in connection with the strike of the Sheffield division of the United Society of Brushmakers, an application has been made to the managers of the Macclesfield Industrial Schools by certain employers for the services of lads from the schools to take the place of those on strike; and, if so, whether he will give instructions that no such application be acceded to, inasmuch as the Industrial School is a State-aided institution?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Managers of the Macclesfield Industrial Schools that no application has been made to them by employers for the services of lads from the schools to take the place of the Protection Society, in which it was stated that his Lordship had recently intimated, not for the first time, that he was not prepared to entertain the restoration of Usibebu to the Ndwandwe district, whether he has now any intention of restoring Usibebu or of allowing him to return to that district; and if, before restoring him or allowing him to return, sufficient notice will be given to afford an opportunity of the subject being discussed in Parliament; and whether the exclusion of Usibebu will extend to the exclusion of men who have in the past acted solely under his orders, such as Zuya, Somfula, and others?

BARON H. DE WORMS: In reply to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's Question, I have to say that the Secretary of State has not changed his intention with regard to Usibebu since the date of the letter of the 7th of January, to which the hon. Member refers. The answer to the second paragraph of the Question is in the negative.

MR. COBB: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that early in July, 1887, Lord Knutsford, then a Member of this House, assured the House that there was no intention of restoring Usibebu to the district?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I do not think I can add anything to the answer I have given. The Secretary of State is not aware of any change of policy. I have answered that since the date of the letter referred to no change has taken place in the policy.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM IN RUSSIA.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of the Prime Minister has been called to the treatment by the Russian Government of the members of a very numerous Nonconformist sect in that country called the "Stundists," the integrity and morality of whose lives are generally admitted; whether he is aware that, under the existing Russian law, it is a crime punishable by penal servitude for a Stundist to be found reading the New Testament or praying in company with his co-religionists; whether he is aware that thousands of men and women have recently, for these offences, and for refusing to conform to the orthodox religion, been, at the instigation of the prelates and clergy of the Orthodox Church, transported without trial to Siberia, deprived of their children, ruined by heavy fines, flogged, and treated in some respects more harshly than the most depraved criminals; and whether, in the interests of religious freedom, Her Majesty's Government, either alone or in conjunction with the Governments of civilised European nations, will, without delay, remonstrate with the Russian Government upon the course which they are taking?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): According to the Novoe Vremya, the main features of the law relating to "Stundists" are the prohibition to build chapels or schools, to hold prayer meetings or assemblies, or to lease mills, manufactories, or public houses. Her Majesty's Government have no information beyond that published in the Novoe Vremya. Her Majesty's Government do not propose to address remonstrances to the Russian Government on the subject of the administration of the laws affecting religious sects in cases where the persons affected are not British subjects.

GRANTS TO HOSPITALS IN DUBLIN AND BELFAST.

CAPTAIN McCALMONT (Antrim, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in consideration of the fact that a sum of close upon £16,000 is voted annually by Parliament for the maintenance of hospitals in Dublin, he will be prepared to recommend that an annual grant should also be made to similar institutions in Belfast, which are at present of necessity supported entirely by voluntary contributions?

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware of any proposal to make grants from public money to the hospitals in Belfast or in other cities in the United Kingdom, nor even if such a proposal were made do I think that it would meet the approval of the House.

THE ARTILLERY RANGES, MAPLIN SANDS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treas-

Mr. Cobb

try whether, in view of the Act of Victoria 25 & 26, c. 36, and in view of the fact that it has been decided by the Court of Appeal, and confirmed by the House of Lords, that certain persons are possessed of a title to portions of the Laplin Sands, which are now in the possession of the Secretary of State for War by virtue of the above Act, it is intended without further delay to proceed to arbitration as to the amount to be paid to them, or to have the amount assessed by a jury according to the provisions of the Artillery Ranges Act, 1862; and whether he can inform the House what is the amount of the legal costs and expenses incurred by the Government in consequence of this litigation?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN Gorst, Chatham): Efforts are still being made to settle by agreement the payment to be made for the ranges in question. The costs paid by the Crown to the defendants amount to £8,071 15s. 7d., and the expenditure by the Crown to £6,740.

CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the case of Joseph and Eliza Armistead, people in good circumstances, who on the 7th January last were convicted at the Wandsworth Police Court of ill-treating and neglecting an illegitimate child of the male prisoner seven years of age, when it was proved that for months, from time to time, the child was locked up in the garret or in the coal cellar, unable to get out for the common necessaries and wants of humanity, reeking in filth and dirt, without any bed, and fed on dry bread and cold potatoes, and with regard to which the Magistrate, Mr. Montagu Williams, spoke of the case as one of the grossest possible cruelty, and an outrage upon humanity, and said that, except for the action of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, the child might still have been dragging out its miserable existence; whether he is also aware that on the same day, at the Woolwich Police Court, at the instance of the same Society, Alice Moir was convicted of cruelly beating with a hearth brush and a poker, and generally ill-treating, her two step-daughters, aged 10 and 3½ years, and the Magistrate, Mr. Kennedy, said that it was almost impossible to speak calmly of the prisoner's conduct; whether his attention had been drawn to the fact, that in the first case the full penalty of three months' imprisonment with hard labour was inflicted, and in the second case three months and one month for the two offences; whether he is aware that about the same time Fanny Gane, a girl who was convicted of strangling her newly-born illegitimate child, was sentenced to, and is now undergoing, penal servitude for life; and whether he will communicate with Stipendiary and other Magistrates in different parts of the country, or take any other steps, with a view of amending the law in such a way as to make the punishment more severe in cases of gross cruelty to children, and less severe in cases such as Fanny Gane's?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The statements in the first four paragraphs of the question are substantially correct. Eliza Armistead and Alice Moir were convicted summarily, and the Magistrates in each case imposed the maximum penalty which the law allows. Fanny Gane was sentenced to death. This sentence was commuted to penal servitude for life, and according to the usual course in cases of infanticide it will be further considerably reduced; but the ultimate reduction granted is not usually announced until sufficient time has elapsed to judge of the conduct of the prisoner and of the effect of prison discipline on her mind. The manner in which cases of infanticide are at present dealt with does not err on the side of severity.

MR. COBB: Yes, Sir; but may I ask, is it contemplated to make the punishment more severe in cases of gross cruelty to children?

MR. MATTHEWS: No; I do not propose to ask the House to amend the Act passed in 1889.

ARABI PASHA.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if Her Majesty's Government would take into consideration the removal of Arabi Pasha to Cyprus, or some better climate and attention to a question has a right to be attacked, and to have his word and good faith impugned by a Gentleman speaking from official information.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. GEORGE CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): I certainly had not the other evening any intention of being in the least discourteous to the hon. Gentleman, still less of imputing culpable negligence to him in any form that could be considered offensive by himself. I am glad he has called my attention to his fact, and that he has given me his authority for the figures he used. The other night the only authority he gave when I asked him was the electioneering speeches delivered by two gentlemen in 1885.

MR. MAC NEILL: I did not quote the electioneering speeches for that statement, but for a statement that out of 900 Uncovenanted Service appointments only nine were held by natives.

MR. CURZON: I am sorry to have imperfectly understood the hon. Gentleman, but he will now understand my reason for regarding with suspicion his authority the other night. I am glad the figures he quoted came from the Blue Book, and I am obliged to him for making the explanation he has now done.

MR. MAC NEILL: Mr. Speaker which is correct now?

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

---

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Main Question [9th February]—"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as followeth:—

Most Gracious Sovereign,

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the gracious speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament:

We take this first opportunity of offering to Your Majesty our sincere condolence in the afflicting dispensation of Providence with which Your Majesty and this Nation have been visited, in the death of His Royal Highness Prince Albert Victor, Duke of Clarence and Avondale:

Mr. Swift Mac Neill

We assure Your Majesty of our heartfelt participation in the universal feeling of sympathy with Your Majesty and Your Majesty's family under this grievous affliction and in the deep sense entertained by all classes of your Majesty's subjects of the calamity which the country has sustained by the loss of a Prince who had won for himself the general affection and regard of Your Majesty's subjects."—(Mr. Hermon Hodge.)

Main Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

(4.23.) MR. SEXTON (West Belfast), in rising to move as an Amendment to the Address, at end, to add,—

"We deem it our duty to acquaint your Majesty that a decisive majority of the Irish people, and of their representatives in this House, are convinced of the inability of the Imperial Parliament to legislate for Ireland as her distinctive interests require, and that this conviction has been intensified by the manifest failure of the Land Purchase Act of 1890 to afford an acceptable basis for the extension of the class of occupying proprietors in Ireland," said: at the advanced stage which the Debate on the Address has reached I think it needful to refer to one passage in the Speech from the Throne, and even this reference I should not have been compelled to make if it had not appeared to me that there is a serious discord and an air of contradiction between the passage in question and some recent speeches of the Principal Minister of the Crown. Sir, we are told in the Royal Speech that proposals will be laid before us for applying to Ireland the general principles affecting Local Government already adopted in Great Britain. Now, the fundamental principle of the scheme of Local Government adopted in Great Britain is that the majority have the right to rule; that the majority of the electors shall dictate the composition of the Local Governing Bodies, and that the majority of the Local Governing Bodies shall dictate the course of the administration of their affairs. I must say I can discover no satisfactory accord between that declaration in the Speech from the Throne and the observations affecting Ireland in the speech of Lord Salisbury at Exeter, a speech which has already been referred to in this Debate. I confess I thought it rather hard that the First Lord of the Treasury, who has otherwise quite enough to do, should have to defend an orator so erratic and unruly as the Prime Minister. However, Sir, I am bound to say, in justice to the First Lord, that he associated himself as little as possible with the speech of the Prime Minister. He began by saying he had not read it. That did no credit to his powers of defence—at any rate, it was not a brilliant defence. For my own part, I should have been inclined to take no notice of any language that Lord Salisbury might apply to Ireland. We have had some experience of him. It is not so long ago since he compared the Irish people to Hottentots; he said that we were addicted to crime; he said that the only way of dealing with us was by firm and resolute government, and now we understand from actual experience what is meant by that famous phrase. Sir, it means the suppression for ever of the ordinary rights of the community and of the rights and privileges granted by the British Constitution. It means, as to administration, that every official is to be encouraged to attack the rights of the people, that if he is challenged at law he will be defended out of the public purse; that his own word will be taken as final in the matter of guilt or innocence; and that all demands for investigation are to be spurned. These being the acts of Lord Salisbury, why should we be surprised at his language? Sir, I shall be content to leave to the electors of this country, whose opportunity will shortly come, the question whether the language of insult towards the creed of vast multitudes of the people of this realm befitted the Prime Minister of Great Britain. It strikes me that the language of Lord Salisbury at Exeter was something more than mere general declamation. I know that Lord Salisbury is a scoffer by nature, that he is a bigot by calculation, and that he will not consent to bridle his tongue when his party so desire. He will denounce the religion of the Roman Catholic to-day and court their votes to-morrow, according as it suits his purpose. When I read the language of Lord Salisbury at Exeter I asked, What is his present and immediate object? What is the meaning of this elaborate attempt to exalt the minority and insult and degrade in public estimation the majority of the Irish people? Sir, the conclusion at which I arrived was that the Prime Minister was endeavouring to influence the course of public opinion in respect to the Local Government Bill. Lord Salisbury has turned history upside down, has inverted his facts to suit his purposes. So far from it being true that the Catholics of Ireland exhibited an attitude of hostility towards the Government of England (which well deserved it), their great historical fault has been in, regard to the Government of this country, that they have been too patient, too submissive. If they have made progress, and if they are likely to make more, it is due to the fact that they have had much suffering, and they have learned much in the past. The Irish Catholics of the present day are men of keener judgment than their forefathers, and of more penetrating insight into political affairs. They are more stern and persistent, and it is with these qualifications that Lord Salisbury and all concerned will have to take account in their future transactions affecting Ireland. How was it Lord Salisbury described the majority of the Irish people? The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, who was very careful and guarded in his speech the other day, treated the speech of the Prime Minister as if he had only said that the rich in Ireland were the few, and that the poor were the many. But the Prime Minister said a great deal more. He said the majority contained all that is backward and unprosperous, and all that is opposed to civilisation and enlightenment. Now, what does the minority contain? It contains the Irish landlords. When you remember what they have been and what they have done, what great powers they have misused, what splendid opportunities they have wasted for promoting civilisation and enlightenment, how they have squandered their substance, how they have been the plague of Ireland and the disgrace of this Empire, do I go too far, in the view of any impartial mind, when I say that the landlords of Ireland have shown themselves to be the most backward and the most unprogressive body of men not only in Ireland, but in Europe? Its idea of enlightenment is to perpetuate sectarian rancour by keeping alive the passions of a religious quarrel that ended two centuries ago. It contains all those whose idea of civilisation is to resist—not, not to resist, to threaten to resist

—the grant by the Imperial Parliament and the Crown of a free Constitution to Ireland. If the majority in Ireland contain an element that is rather backward and unprosperous, to what is that due? It is due to the fact that you have, for generations, deliberately exploited their country in the interests of an intruded class, in the interests of a class to whom you gave legal power over the means of the livelihood of the people, and who use that power without stint and ruth to strip the people bare and keep them in a state of abject poverty. The true cause of the backwardness of Ireland was stated in an earlier and a wiser speech of Lord Salisbury, when he said that it was due, not to the Celtic race, to the Catholic Creed, nor to the democratic sentiment of Ireland, but to the fact that the British Government existed in Ireland, and that an alien rule had cast a blight upon the life of the people. Those of the Irish majority who have been able to make their way outside the sphere of British rule to any other country in the world, where the chance of fair play existed, or even inside the sphere of British rule, but outside the circle of Irish maladministration, have shown that they are as able to prosper as well as any other men, and that they are fully alive to, and not opposed to, civilisation and enlightenment. The backwardness of Ireland, so far as it exists, is due solely to her poverty. Her poverty is directly due to the necessary effect of your agrarian policy, and you cannot attempt, in regard to this question of Local Government, to make this wrongdoing in the past, and in the present, a justification for committing further injustice. The First Lord of the Treasury was more guarded in his own opinion than the Prime Minister, but his observations equally challenged notice. I am at a loss to understand why he brought in the question of Ulster. He spoke of Ulster as if it were a political unit. But it is nothing of the kind. The other three provinces of Ireland are political units, but Ulster is not a political unit, and, what is more, it never will be. Ulster is represented in this House by 33 Members, of whom 16 are adherents of the Government and 17 are Nationalists. It is true the four Eastern Counties have a majority of Protestants, but the five Western

Mr. Sexton

Counties contain a heavy majority, which is Catholic, Celtic, and Nationalist. Why, therefore, the First Lord of the Treasury should have brought in Ulster, in view of the facts I have stated, which can lead to no inference unfavourable to our view of Home Rule and Local Government, is more than I can attempt to explain. But the First Lord of the Treasury has evolved out of his own reflection another delusion which may be corrected by a very little inquiry. He stated in his speech the other night, that the line of division of political opinion in Ireland corresponds with the line of demarcation between backwardness and progress—very ingenious, truly, and very convenient for the Government, no doubt; but I submit that the contrary is the case. If the right hon. Gentleman meant to refer to education, I can tell him that the Irish Catholics, class for class, are now as well educated as Protestants, and they have proved themselves well able to hold their own in every form of contest and competition, and in every walk of life. They are as well educated as the rank which resorts to the University, or as the children of the peasant who resort to the National School. Did the right hon. Gentleman intend to speak of wealth? Again, I say the landlords of Ireland, their connections and dependents, are the marrow and substance of the minority. But many of them are in a condition of insolvency. Most of them have nothing to spare, and the few amongst them that can be called men of wealth have no more claim to be counted than is justified by what they draw from Ireland, which they spend, together with their lives, in England or in some other country. Let not the right hon. Gentleman forget that eleven years ago the Irish tenant acquired by law the legal proprietorship of the soil. I have no doubt that if a precise valuation could be made of the assets of every Irishman in Ireland, and his debts deducted from it, it would be found that, poor as the people undoubtedly are—poverty, however, is a relative term, and better than insolvency—the majority of them now hold in their hands the greater part of the real, actual, and genuine value and capital of the country. If the right hon. Gentleman choose to get a Return from the London Insurance Companies, and from other persons who have loaned ney on Irish land which has not been paid, and that were laid on the Table, would be seen that the money lent to the Irish landlords, and not repaid, shabbily amounts to very nearly the fee-simple value, at the present moment, of the entire soil of Ireland. So much for the theory of the right hon. Gentleman—at the line of political division of opinion corresponds to the line of demarcation between backwardness and progress. I would respectfully invite him, especially in these matters of practical isolation where precision is so important, not to found himself upon baseless theory notoriously at variance with the facts. If these two Ministers, the Prime Minister and the First Lord the Treasury, intended by their speech, and by their attack on the majority of the Irish people and their elaborate praises of the minority, to convey that the proposals to be made before us in regard to Ireland would allow the majority to rule, their way of expressing that view is so exceedingly indirect that I may be pardoned for entertaining some doubt upon that intent. If, on the other hand, the Prime Minister and the First Lord meant that they will not apply to Ireland the rule as they apply to England—that the minority in Ireland is to be fortified or protected, and that the majority is to be balanced and checked—then it would have been more frank to have advised the sovereign not to tell the House that proposals would be made on the same general principles already adopted in Great Britain, but that the principles adopted here are opposed to those they tend to apply to Ireland. However, I shall very freely be able to judge of it as soon as we see the Bill; but, in the meantime, I think it necessary that a movement proceeding from so high an authority, and intended perhaps to have an overt bearing upon immediate legislation, should not be allowed to pass unchallenged. Sir, in the Amendment which I move I invite the House to inform the Sovereign that a decisive majority of the Irish people, and of their Representatives in this House, are convinced of the inability of the Imperial Parliament to isolate for Ireland as her distinctive interests require, and that this conviction has been intensified by the manifest failure of the Land Purchase Act of 1891, to afford an acceptable basis for the extension of the class of occupying proprietors in Ireland. I do not endeavour in my Amendment to define precisely the inability of the Imperial Parliament to legislate well for Ireland, because I think it comprises more what physicians call a complication of disorders. It proceeds from profound ignorance of Ireland, an ignorance which I may as well say is incurable, because you are resolved not to take advice; and it proceeds partly from prejudice, which is certainly not upon the decrease among the Party opposite. That inability, also, in a great measure, proceeds from the increasing strain and pressure of the duties of this Parliament, and that is a cause which will not diminish, but must increase, as time goes on. It will be observed that I do not invite from this House any declaration as to the right of Ireland to a separate Legislature. The judgment of Ireland upon that subject is quite enough for me; and the judgment of Ireland is undoubtedly that, even if your legislation for her interests were as good as it is bad; that circumstance would not affect her natural and historic right, which she is, under all circumstances, determined to maintain. I do not even ask you to declare upon the expediency of a separate Legislature for Ireland. That is a question for the electors of the country, which will presently come before them, and to them I am content to leave it. I do not raise any debate upon this occasion upon any specific scheme of Home Rule. I think the gallant Gentleman opposite must admit that it would be idle for me to do so in the presence of a trenchant majority which is firmly pledged to opposition to any and all Home Rule, and also committed by its own legislative act to the perpetual coercion of Ireland. It would be idle to raise discussion now; but the time for it will come very shortly, when the Minister vested with the power of conferring a Parliamentary Constitution upon Ireland proceeds to invite the House of Commons to execute the will of the country. I am not moved by the circumstance, of which I am well aware, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is athirst for particulars, and I know very well what he did with particulars when he had them before. He affected to accept the principle, but he used the particulars to attack the principle. He attacked the sources is it derived; have the powers of the recently constituted Colonisation Board been in any way extended as to the raising or utilisation of funds for colonisation purposes generally; and do the Government intend to take any action on the lines recommended in the Report of the Colonisation Committee of last year?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): In reply to the first two paragraphs of this question, I have to inform my hon. Friend that the Government have no intention of sending any crofter families to Canada this Spring, there being at present no funds available for the promotion of further colonisation from Scotland. The recently constituted Board have no extended power of raising funds, but as regards utilisation of funds, their powers are extended so as to include Ireland. It is intended, shortly, to ask the House to vote a sum of money to enable the Board to carry out colonisation from Scotland on the lines recommended by the Select Committee last year.

IRISH LAND PURCHASE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland from how many, and what, counties of Ireland applications for sale and purchase, under "The Land Purchase Act, 1891," were received up to the 31st of December, 1891, by the Irish Land Commission; how many landlords and how many tenants were concerned in these applications; what was the total amount applied for, and what the total, so far, sanctioned; and what issues of stock, if any, have been made?

MR. JACKSON: The Land Commissioners report that applications under the Land Purchase Act of 1891 were received up to December 31st from 22 counties, as follows:—Ulster.—County Antrim—number of applicants—i.e., tenants—2; two estates; total amount applied for £899. Cavan—number of applicants, 6; two estates; total amount applied for, £5,226. Donegal—number of applicants, 2; one estate; total amount applied for, £825. Down—number of applicants, 1; one estate; total amount applied for, £500. Fermanagh—number of applicants, 2; one estate; total amount applied for, £734. Londonderry—number of applicants, 5; four estates; total amount applied for, £3,063. Tyrone—number of applicants, 24; two estates; total amount applied for, £7,517. Total—42 applications; 13 estates; amount applied for, £18,764. Leinster.—Kildare—number of applicants, 18; one estate; amount applied for, £6,260. Kilkenny—number of applicants, 4; two estates; amount applied for £4,230. King's County—number of applicants, 1; one estate; amount applied for, £400. Longford—number of applicants, 1; one estate; amount applied for, £220. Meath—number of applicants, 3; two estates; amount applied for, £1,942. Wexford—number of applicants, 1; one estate; amount applied for, £1,955. Wicklow—number of applicants, 1; one estate; amount applied for, £636. Total—29 applicants; nine estates; amount applied for, £15,703. Munster.—Cork—number of applicants, 6; four estates; amount applied for, £6,074. Kerry—number of applicants, 63; three estates; amount applied for, £25,998. Limerick—number of applicants, 15; four estates; total amount applied for, £4,153. Tipperary—number of applicants, 4; two estates; total amount applied for, £2,371. Waterford—number of applicants, 3; three estates; total amount applied for, £2,930. Total—91 applicants; 16 estates; amount applied for, £41,516. Connaught.—Galway—number of applicants, 2; one estate; total amount applied for, £600. Roscommon—number of applicants, 2; two estates; total amount applied for, £372. Sligo—number of applicants, 9; two estates; total amount applied for, £2,629. Total—13 applicants; five estates; amount applied for, £3,601. Totals for Ireland—175 applications; 43 estates; total amount applied for, £79,584. For the information of the House, I may add that, taking the Return up to January 31st, the total application amounts to £130,000. No cases were sanctioned within the period specified, and no stock has been issued.

Mr. Seton-Karr

IRISH RAILWAYS.

MR. COLLERY (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if his attention has been called to the abandoned state of the works on the Collooney and aremorris Railway; if the delay is used by some technical disagreement between them and the Treasury; and whether, in view of the responsibility entered into (on the faith of promises made by the Government) by the counties

Sligo and Mayo, he will use his influence to bring the matter to a speedy conclusion, so that the works may be resumed and much-needed employment given in a poor and congested district, as well as to arrest the further decay of the existing works?

SIR JOHN GORST: My right hon. friend has asked me to answer this question. The matter in dispute between the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company and the Board of Works is now the subject of negotiation. No effort will be spared to bring about settlement at the earliest possible moment.

LADY SUB-COMMISSIONERS.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Lady Sub-Commissioners have been appointed by the Royal Commission on Labour now sitting to inquire into the conditions under which female labour is carried on in the country; and, if so, whether the Lady Sub-Commissioners will inquire first into the circumstances of female labour in the Metropolis or in the provinces?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am asked by my right hon. Friend to answer this question. One of the Commissioners of the Royal Commission on Labour has recommended the appointment of Lady Sub-Commissioners to inquire into the conditions of employment of women in certain industries. The application is now before the Treasury, and is under the consideration of that body.

ARMY VETERANS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the grant in aid of the survivors of the Crimean and Indian Mutiny campaigns, alluded to last Session, would be available for their widows?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid this could not be done, as soldiers' pensions are never in any case whatever continued to their widows.

MAJOR RASCH: I beg to ask the

Secretary of State for War whether he would consider the possibility of granting some pension to old soldiers over 50 years of age who have served 12 years with the colours?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Any grant of deferred pensions would require great consideration, as the amount involved is very large; and the system would be directly contrary to the principles of short service and a reserve. I have already announced a limited grant of pensions to men who served in campaigns before 1860; and I am now considering whether it is possible to reduce the period of service which qualifies for such pensions.

THE CHILTERN HUNDREDS.

MR. T. M. HEALY (North Longford): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the precedents upon which he acted in granting a Member of this House the Chiltern Hundreds while the House was not sitting?

MR. GOSCHEN: The dates of the grants, together with the names of the hon. Members during the last ten years, are as follows:—Mr. Sullivan, 3rd February, 1882; Sir Charles Russell, 6th February, 1882; Mr. Finigan, 15th September, 1882; Mr. Cowan, 19th October, 1882; Mr. Bisset, 16th November, 1883; Mr. Holmes, 24th January, 1884; Mr. Cohen, 7th February, 1888; Mr. Lacaita, 7th February, 1888.

BRUSHMAKERS' STRIKE IN SHEFFIELD.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in connection with the strike of the Sheffield division of the United Society of Brushmakers, an application has been made to the managers of the Macclesfield Industrial Schools by certain employers for the services of lads from the schools to take the place of those on strike; and, if so, whether he will give instructions that no such application be acceded to, inasmuch as the Industrial School is a State-aided institution?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Managers of the Macclesfield Industrial Schools that no application has been made to them by employers for the services of lads from the schools to take the place of the brushmakers on strike. The Managers have been told that if such an application be made to them, it must at once be refused.

THE INSURANCE OF CHILDREN.

COLONEL DAWNAY (York, Thirsk Division): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government will take steps to pass a Bill, similar to the one brought forward last Session, to amend and regulate the Laws relating to the insurance of children?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In answer to my hon. Friend I have to remind him that this Bill, which was introduced into the House of Lords last year, was sent to a Committee, which took evidence, but gave no Report on the merits of the Bill. I am afraid that, under these circumstances, and without myself expressing any opinion on the merits of the Bill, it would not be possible for us to add to our already considerable programme of legislation.

COMMISSIONS IN THE ROYAL ARTILLERY.

MR. E. STANHOPE: As some misconception appears to have arisen in regard to the answer given by me on Thursday last to a question put by my hon. Friend the Member for the Basingstoke Division, I would like, with the permission of the House, to explain that my reply applied only to Militia Artillery candidates for commissions in the Royal Artillery. As regards the other Militia candidates, looking at all the circumstances of the case, I have come to the conclusion that the reduction was somewhat excessive, and I have accordingly added 10 to the number which had been announced for competition.

THE CONGESTED DISTRICTS BOARD.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he would consider the propriety of extending the district of Luvaly, which has been scheduled as a congested district, so as to include that portion of the outskirts of Tuam which contains the Curragh Mills; and if he would consider the question of re-opening these wood mills under the control or with the assistance of the Congested Board?

Mr. Matthews

MR. JACKSON (Leeds, N.): The Congested Districts Board will, I have no doubt, consider the expediency of recommending what the hon. Member suggests.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is it the case that a selection without competition is to be made from Land Commission and Census Clerks for the Congested Districts Board vacancies; and as these officers were originally nominated by the Viceroy subject to examinations, will the Government consider the advisability of filling these posts by competition amongst the clerks in question, so as to avoid apprehensions arising under a system of mere nomination?

MR. JACKSON: The staff of the Congested Districts Board is very limited in number, and the persons appointed to it were selected by the Lord Lieutenant by reason of the experience they possessed in the discharge of cognate duties.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If these gentlemen were so experienced it would have been easy for them to have passed a competitive examination. Why does the Government lay itself open to the charge of favouritism in these appointments?

MR. JACKSON: The members of the staff were appointed, as I have said, because of their experience. They were not nominees of the Lord Lieutenant. They were appointed on the recommendation of the Congested Districts Board.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I would ask whether with the view of dissipating the impression of favouritism that now prevails as to the selection, the staff of the Land Commission and Census Departments would be allowed to compete for these appointments?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, South): Am I right in saying the appointments were made on the recommendation of the Congested Districts Board?

MR. T. M. HEALY: On the recommendation of the hon. Gentleman himself.

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir; I believe the appointments were all made on the recommendation of the Congested Districts Board.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Did the hon. Member for South Tyrone make any recommendation?

MR. JACKSON: No,

MR. T. M. HEALY: We know he did.
MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA IN KENT.

MR. E. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Rochester): I should like to ask my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Agriculture whether there is any truth in the report appearing in this morning's newspapers to the effect that there has been an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease in Kent?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): It is true that a report has been received by the Board of Agriculture to the effect that the disease has spread from the metropolitan area to the neighbourhood of Sittingbourne, in Kent. I find from further inquiries this morning that the outbreak occurred at Minster, in the Island of Sheppey. There are 14 animals, affected out of a herd of 36 animals which have been known to be in contact with a number of other animals on the marshes in that district. An Order has in consequence been passed this morning prohibiting the removal of the animals from the Island of Sheppey, and cutting it off from other parts of the country.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): Was the source of contagion traced?

MR. CHAPLIN: So far as we know, the outbreak has been traced to an animal which left the Metropolitan market before the disease was discovered last week.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS (WAGES).

Moved an Address for "Return of the forms issued by the War Office, Admiralty, Board of Works, and other Departments of the Government, in compliance with the terms of the Resolution of the House of 13th February, 1891."—(Mr. Sydney Buxton.)

Motion agreed to.

OMISSION OF A MEMBER'S VOTE.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co. Ossory): I wish to call the attention of you, Mr. Speaker, and of the House, to an omission in the Journals of the House of last Friday which affects me, and which I think you will see ought to be corrected. I voted on that occasion under considerable difficulty, owing to indisposition, in favour of the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Waterford, on behalf of the release of the treason felony prisoners, and my name does not appear in the Division. I wish to express a desire that the correction should be made. I certainly voted on that occasion, as I walked through the Lobby with my hon. Friend the Member for Monaghan, who will no doubt testify to the accuracy of my statement. I gave my name as usual, and I also gave the name of my constituency. I think it is possible that the clerk did not hear the name of the constituency, for the name of Dr. Roderick Macdonald is recorded. He is represented as having voted, and I do not think he did vote.

MR. SPEAKER: The matter will of course be rectified, and an erratum will be inserted in the Journals.

A PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. SWIFT MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I wish to make a personal explanation in reference to a certain matter that occurred on Friday evening. I moved an Amendment to the Address relating to the Indian Councils, and I made certain statements of what I considered a very serious character in regard to Indian officials. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India contradicted me very flatly and very thoroughly, and in such a way as to impute to me culpable negligence in the statement of facts, and in likewise bringing forward matters without proper and sufficient investigation. If I were guilty of such conduct I should be unworthy of being a Member of this House, and therefore I would like to say that my statements were made after the most careful investigation. For example, I said that out of 2,367 appointments held by the higher grade of the Uncovenanted Civil Service, only 188 were held by natives. The Under Secretary contradicted me flatly, accused me of ignorance, and said the reverse was the fact—that there were only 188 Europeans, and that all the others were natives. Sir, I made a similar statement two years ago from my place in this House, and the hon. Gentleman the then Under Secretary for India did not then contradict me. My authority was the Public Service Commission Report, where, in pages 92 to 134, every word and syllable of what I stated is to be found. I looked over the matter with the assistance of Mr. William Digby, political officer. No man who gives time and attention to a question has a right to be attacked, and to have his word and good faith impugned by a Gentleman speaking from official information.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. GEORGE CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): I certainly had not the other evening any intention of being in the least discourteous to the hon. Gentleman, still less of imputing culpable negligence to him in any form that could be considered offensive by himself. I am glad he has called my attention to his fact, and that he has given me his authority for the figures he used. The other night the only authority he gave when I asked him was the electioneering speeches delivered by two gentlemen in 1885.

MR. MAC NEILL: I did not quote the electioneering speeches for that statement, but for a statement that out of 900 Uncovenanted Service appointments only nine were held by natives.

MR. CURZON: I am sorry to have imperfectly understood the hon. Gentleman, but he will now understand my reason for regarding with suspicion his authority the other night. I am glad the figures he quoted came from the Blue Book, and I am obliged to him for making the explanation he has now done.

MR. MAC NEILL: Mr. Speaker which is correct now?

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

---

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Main Question [9th February]—"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as followeth:—

Most Gracious Sovereign,

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the gracious speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament:

We take this first opportunity of offering to Your Majesty our sincere condolence in the afflicting dispensation of Providence with which Your Majesty and this Nation been visited, in the death of His Highness Prince Albert Victor, Duke of Clarence and Avondale:

Mr. Swift Mac Neill

We assure Your Majesty of our hearty participation in the universal feelings of sympathy with Your Majesty and His Highness Prince Albert Victor, Duke of Clarence and Avondale: "—(Mr. Hermon Hodge.)

Main Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

(4.23.) MR. SEXTON (West Belfast) rising to move as an Amendment to the Address, at end, to add,—

"We deem it our duty to acquaint Your Majesty that a decisive majority of the people, and of their representatives in the House, are convinced of the inability of the Imperial Parliament to legislate for Ireland in her distinctive interests require, and that conviction has been intensified by the manifest failure of the Land Purchase Act of 1881 to afford an acceptable basis for the extension of the class of occupying proprietors in Ireland said: at the advanced stage which the Debate on the Address has reached I think it would be useful to refer to one passage in the Royal Speech from the Throne, and even reference I should not have been compelled to make if it had not appeared to me that there is a serious discord and air of contradiction between the passage in question and some recent speech of the Principal Minister of the Crown. Sir, we are told in the Royal Speech that the proposals will be laid before us for applying to Ireland the general principles of Local Government already adopted in Great Britain. Now, the fundamental principle of the scheme of Local Government adopted in Great Britain is that the majority have the right to rule; the majority of the electors shall dictate the composition of the Local Governing Bodies, and that the majority of Local Governing Bodies shall dictate the course of the administration of their affairs. I must say I can discover no satisfactory accord between that decision in the Speech from the Throne and the observations affecting Ireland in the speech of Lord Salisbury at Exeter which has already been referred to in this Debate. I confess I thought it rather hard that the First Member of the Treasury, who has other quite enough to do, should have to defend an orator so erratic and unruly as the Prime Minister. However, Sir, I am bound to say, in justice to the First Lord, that he associated himself as little as possible with the speech of the Prime Minister. He began by saying he had not read it. That did no credit to his powers of defence—at any rate, it was not a brilliant defence. For my own part, I should have been inclined to take no notice of any language that Lord Salisbury might apply to Ireland. We have had some experience of him. It is not so long ago since he compared the Irish people to Hottentots; he said that we were addicted to crime; he said that the only way of dealing with us was by firm and resolute government, and now we understand from actual experience what is meant by that famous phrase. Sir, it means the suppression for ever of the ordinary rights of the community and of the rights and privileges granted by the British Constitution. It means, as to administration, that every official is to be encouraged to attack the rights of the people, that if he is challenged at law he will be defended out of the public purse; that his own word will be taken as final in the matter of guilt or innocence; and that all demands for investigation are to be spurned. These being the acts of Lord Salisbury, why should we be surprised at his language? Sir, I shall be content to leave to the electors of this country, whose opportunity will shortly come, the question whether the language of insult towards the creed of vast multitudes of the people of this realm befitted the Prime Minister of Great Britain. It strikes me that the language of Lord Salisbury at Exeter was something more than mere general declamation. I know that Lord Salisbury is a scoffer by nature, that he is a bigot by calculation, and that he will not consent to bridle his tongue when his party so desire. He will denounce the religion of the Roman Catholics to-day and court their votes to-morrow, according as it suits his purpose. When I read the language of Lord Salisbury at Exeter I asked, What is his present and immediate object? What is the meaning of this elaborate attempt to exalt the minority and insult and degrade in public estimation the majority of the Irish people? Sir, the conclusion at which I arrived was that the Prime Minister was endeavouring to influence the course of public opinion in respect to the Local Government Bill. Lord Salisbury has turned history upside down, has inverted his facts to suit his purposes. So far from it being true that the Catholics of Ireland exhibited an attitude of hostility towards the Government of England (which well deserved it), their great historical fault has been in, regard to the Government of this country, that they have been too patient, too submissive. If they have made progress, and if they are likely to make more, it is due to the fact that they have had much suffering, and they have learned much in the past. The Irish Catholics of the present day are men of keener judgment than their forefathers, and of more penetrating insight into political affairs. They are more stern and persistent, and it is with these qualifications that Lord Salisbury and all concerned will have to take account in their future transactions affecting Ireland. How was it Lord Salisbury described the majority of the Irish people? The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, who was very careful and guarded in his speech the other day, treated the speech of the Prime Minister as if he had only said that the rich in Ireland were the few, and that the poor were the many. But the Prime Minister said a great deal more. He said the majority contained all that is backward and unprosperous, and all that is opposed to civilisation and enlightenment. Now, what does the minority contain? It contains the Irish landlords. When you remember what they have been and what they have done, what great powers they have misused, what splendid opportunities they have wasted for promoting civilisation and enlightenment, how they have squandered their substance, how they have been the plague of Ireland and the disgrace of this Empire, do I go too far, in the view of any impartial mind, when I say that the landlords of Ireland have shown themselves to be the most backward and the most unprogressive body of men not only in Ireland, but in Europe? Its idea of enlightenment is to perpetuate sectarian rancour by keeping alive the passions of a religious quarrel that ended two centuries ago. It contains all those whose idea of civilisation is to resist—no, not to resist, to threaten to resist

—the grant by the Imperial Parliament and the Crown of a free Constitution to Ireland. If the majority in Ireland contain an element that is rather backward and unprosperous, to what is that due? It is due to the fact that you have, for generations, deliberately exploited their country in the interests of an intruded class, in the interests of a class to whom you gave legal power over the means of the livelihood of the people, and who use that power without stint and ruth to strip the people bare and keep them in a state of abject poverty. The true cause of the backwardness of Ireland was stated in an earlier and a wiser speech of Lord Salisbury, when he said that it was due, not to the Celtic race, to the Catholic Creed, nor to the democratic sentiment of Ireland, but to the fact that the British Government existed in Ireland, and that an alien rule had cast a blight upon the life of the people. Those of the Irish majority who have been able to make their way outside the sphere of British rule to any other country in the world, where the chance of fair play existed, or even inside the sphere of British rule, but outside the circle of Irish maladministration, have shown that they are as able to prosper as well as any other men, and that they are fully alive to, and not opposed to, civilisation and enlightenment. The backwardness of Ireland, so far as it exists, is due solely to her poverty. Her poverty is directly due to the necessary effect of your agrarian policy, and you cannot attempt, in regard to this question of Local Government, to make this wrongdoing in the past, and in the present, a justification for committing further injustice. The First Lord of the Treasury was more guarded in his own opinion than the Prime Minister, but his observations equally challenged notice. I am at a loss to understand why he brought in the question of Ulster. He spoke of Ulster as if it were a political unit. But it is nothing of the kind. The other three provinces of Ireland are political units, but Ulster is not a political unit, and, what is more, it never will be. Ulster is represented in this House by 33 Members, of whom 16 are adherents of the Government and 17 are Nationalists. It is true the four Eastern Counties have a majority of Protestants, but the five Western

Mr. Sexton

Counties contain a heavy majority, which is Catholic, Celtic, and Nationalist. Why, therefore, the First Lord of the Treasury should have brought in Ulster, in view of the facts I have stated, which can lead to no inference unfavourable to our view of Home Rule and Local Government, is more than I can attempt to explain. But the First Lord of the Treasury has evolved out of his own reflection another delusion which may be corrected by a very little inquiry. He stated in his speech the other night, that the line of division of political opinion in Ireland corresponds with the line of demarcation between backwardness and progress—very ingenious, truly, and very convenient for the Government, no doubt; but I submit that the contrary is the case. If the right hon. Gentleman meant to refer to education, I can tell him that the Irish Catholics, class for class, are now as well educated as Protestants, and they have proved themselves well able to hold their own in every form of contest and competition, and in every walk of life. They are as well educated as the rank which resorts to the University, or as the children of the peasant who resort to the National School. Did the right hon. Gentleman intend to speak of wealth? Again, I say the landlords of Ireland, their connections and dependents, are the marrow and substance of the minority. But many of them are in a condition of insolvency. Most of them have nothing to spare, and the few amongst them that can be called men of wealth have no more claim to be counted than is justified by what they draw from Ireland, which they spend, together with their lives, in England or in some other country. Let not the right hon. Gentleman forget that eleven years ago the Irish tenant acquired by law the legal proprietorship of the soil. I have no doubt that if a precise valuation could be made of the assets of every Irishman in Ireland, and his debts deducted from it, it would be found that, poor as the people undoubtedly are—poverty, however, is a relative term, and better than insolvency—the majority of them now hold in their hands the greater part of the real, actual, and genuine value and capital of the country. If the right hon. Gentleman choose to get a Return from the London Insurance Companies, and from other persons who have loaned money on Irish land which has not been repaid, and that were laid on the Table, it would be seen that the money lent to the Irish landlords, and not repaid, probably amounts to very nearly the fee-simple value, at the present moment, of the entire soil of Ireland. So much for the theory of the right hon. Gentleman—that the line of political division of opinion corresponds to the line of demarcation between backwardness and progress. I would respectfully invite him, especially in these matters of practical legislation where precision is so important, not to found himself upon baseless theory notoriously at variance with the facts. If these two Ministers, the Prime Minister and the First Lord of the Treasury, intended by their speech, and by their attack upon the majority of the Irish people and their elaborate praises of the minority, to convey that the proposals to be made before us in regard to Ireland would allow the majority to rule, their way of expressing that view is so exceedingly indirect that I may be pardoned for entertaining some doubt upon that point. If, on the other hand, the Prime Minister and the First Lord meant that they will not apply to Ireland the rule that they apply to England—that the minority in Ireland is to be fortified or protected, and that the majority is to be curbed and checked—then it would have been more frank to have advised the Sovereign not to tell the House that proposals would be made on the same general principles already adopted in Great Britain, but that the principles adopted here are opposed to those they intend to apply to Ireland. However, we shall very freely be able to judge of that as soon as we see the Bill; but, in the meantime, I think it necessary that a statement proceeding from so high an authority, and intended perhaps to have a covert bearing upon immediate legislation, should not be allowed to pass unchallenged. Sir, in the Amendment which I now move I invite the House to inform the Sovereign that a decisive majority of the Irish people, and of their Representatives in this House, are convinced of the inability of the Imperial Parliament to legislate for Ireland as her distinctive interests require, and that this conviction has been intensified by the manifest failure of the Land Purchase Act of 1891, to afford an acceptable basis for the extension of the class of occupying proprietors in Ireland. I do not endeavour in my Amendment to define precisely the inability of the Imperial Parliament to legislate well for Ireland, because I think it comprises more what physicians call a complication of disorders. It proceeds from profound ignorance of Ireland, an ignorance which I may as well say is incurable, because you are resolved not to take advice; and it proceeds partly from prejudice, which is certainly not upon the decrease among the Party opposite. That inability, also, in a great measure proceeds from the increasing strain and pressure of the duties of this Parliament, and that is a cause which will not diminish, but must increase, as time goes on. It will be observed that I do not invite from this House any declaration as to the right of Ireland to a separate Legislature. The judgment of Ireland upon that subject is quite enough for me; and the judgment of Ireland is undoubtedly that, even if your legislation for her interests were as good as it is bad; that circumstance would not affect her natural and historic right, which she is, under all circumstances, determined to maintain. I do not even ask you to declare upon the expediency of a separate Legislature for Ireland. That is a question for the electors of the country, which will presently come before them, and to them I am content to leave it. I do not raise any debate upon this occasion upon any specific scheme of Home Rule. I think the gallant Gentleman opposite must admit that it would be idle for me to do so in the presence of a trenchant majority which is firmly pledged to opposition to any and all Home Rule, and also committed by its own legislative act to the perpetual coercion of Ireland. It would be idle to raise discussion now; but the time for it will come very shortly, when the Minister vested with the power of conferring a Parliamentary Constitution upon Ireland proceeds to invite the House of Commons to execute the will of the country. I am not moved by the circumstance, of which I am well aware, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham is athirst for particulars, and I know very well what he did with particulars when he had them before. He affected to accept the principle, but he used the particulars to attack the principle. He attacked the principle from behind the particulars, and used the particulars both in this House and in the country as a means of procuring the defeat of the principle. The right hon. Gentleman's large family of plans of Home Rule all perished in their infancy. He frankly, I may say, cynically admits his failure in the capacity of a parent. Having failed in that capacity, he is now anxious to make a fresh start in life as a guardian of the progeny of others. But others are naturally unwilling to trust their progeny to him, as his antecedents, in their judgment, do not fit him for the office of guardian. His natural rôle—I speak with the greatest respect—is that of the wicked uncle. If I may illustrate by metaphor my view of the position of the right hon. Gentleman, I should say that he mutinied and deserted his ship because he was not suffered to take command. He has obtained another command, however, and is now captain of a band of political wreckers; but whenever or however he may regard that band, I tell him with some confidence that no Irish Nationalist will assist him in holding out false lights to the ship freighted with the hopes and fortunes of Ireland. I do not ask this House even to declare its own opinion upon its fitness to legislate well for Ireland, particularly because the Party opposite considers itself well able to legislate for the people of the whole world; while another reason is that this House is moribund. I regard it as a dying sinner, and I think it would be too cruel to ask a dying sinner to frame an epitaph commenting frankly upon his career; but it is not too much to expect that this House should make some atonement to those it has injured in the course of its ill-spent life; and I think I am entitled to ask it to make reparation for having placed Ireland under the ban of perpetual outlawry, by at least admitting the opinion which the Irish people hold upon the source of such legislation. I am asked the ground of the conviction entertained by the Irish people, that the Imperial Parliament is unable to legislate for Ireland, and I shall state it in brief and plain terms. For 90 years of what you call "Union"—the forced partnership between Great Britain and our country—we find that your population has trebled, and almost quadrupled, within that term, and has advanced—and I certainly do not grudge the advance—by leaps and bounds in the standard of the comfort of life, and in every element of national prosperity and individual wealth; whilst in the same period you have brought down our population, not only to the level at which it stood at the date of the legislative Union, but to the lowest level at which it stood within the century, and that population, so decimated by your policy, stands at this moment, generally speaking, upon a lower level of subsistence than anywhere prevails within the bounds of what claims to be civilised Europe. You may say that you are not responsible, but I say the responsibility is directly and solely yours; and why, because Ireland, being a country where the people had no means of living except by the cultivation of the land, where, therefore, it was necessary for them, from the first, to have legislative protection in the pursuit of their industry and in the security of the means of living—so far from affording that legislative protection, you did just the contrary. You placed over them, as I have said, a privileged class; you enabled that class to fix the price of the natural agent by the use of which the people could find a means of living; you placed in the hands of that class the power they have used without mercy and stint; and the result was that thrift was made impossible in Ireland, and that the very idea of progress was rendered a mockery. The landlords were enabled and encouraged by your law, to take from the people all the produce of their labour, except so much as kept body and soul together, so that the formation of the first element of national prosperity, the capital fund or reserve in the hands of the people, was rendered impossible; and, therefore, we have seen, in the present day, tenant farmers in abject poverty, and we know that at present the labouring class is, by a necessary consequence of the condition of the farmer, the most wretched class, not only in the civilised world, but more wretched than some savage tribes. Well, Sir, the whole agrarian system is breaking down by its own weight, and I shall presently show that your attempt to substitute another system has proved abortive. But there is something more. Under the policy of legalised plunder that you have pursued in Ireland, you have never allowed us to come within the Constitution. The time given to Ireland by the English Parliament since the Union, has been mostly passed in enacting coercive Statutes. There is an unbroken line of these Statutes, which extends from the date of the Union down to the present day, and this Parliament has capped the climax by passing what I must call an Act of perpetual outlawry, by a coercive Statute, which has placed Ireland under the ban of coercion, not for a day, but for all time. So that the nett result of the Union, which Pitt promised should bring us material prosperity, has been unexampled misery; and, politically, the result of bringing us into union with you has been, that you began by taking her native Constitution from Ireland, and you have finished in this Parliament by shutting out Ireland in perpetuity from the pale of the British Constitution. This is a brief sketch of the effect of your legislation for Ireland since the date of the Union; but I go on to say that I could found my Amendment and justify it on the effect of this Parliament alone. When you came into power in 1886 you were warned by the Irish Members, upon the amplest evidence, that the judicial rents in the Acts of 1881 would need, in that Session, to be revised, and that it was no longer possible to exclude leaseholders from the benefits of the Acts. Your reply was a non possumus. The fact that the demand was made upon you by Irish Members seemed a sufficient reason for refusal. You told us the judicial rents could not be touched, and that leasehold contracts could not be violated. Having enjoyed your satisfaction by refusing what the Irish Members then asked, in the very next year you brought in a Bill yourselves—a Bill halting, partial, and marred by great defects—but a Bill which did touch the sacred judicial rents, and broke the inviolability of the leases. You brought in that Bill when it pleased yourselves, and not when Ireland required it; and what was the effect of your Bill? In the interval, men, driven desperate by oppression, had recourse to the defence of agrarian combination, and you made the existence of that temporary combination the excuse, in the first place, for violating your pledge to the electors of Great Britain that you would not propose coercion, and, in the second place, for imposing coercion, not for a time, but for ever. Four years passed, and last year, the old evil agrarian system having broken down, and being, by universal confession, a failure, you tried to substitute another; you set about passing the Land Purchase Bill; never had an English Minister a more splendid opportunity. The policy of purchase was generally accepted, the means in your hands were ample, your experience was sufficient, and the very machinery was ready; the country had a right to expect from you a great reforming Statute. But, unfortunately for Ireland, someone or other, possessed of a fatal love for ingenious complexity in financial affairs, was allowed to make that Act his hobby, and he rode it to death. The then Chief Secretary for Ireland anticipated a great success; he took the most elaborate precautions to provide that the large farmers should not run away with the share of the small ones; he fully expected, and avowed that expectation, that united Ireland would make a rush on that £30,000,000. The Marquis of Londonderry, in another place, got a clause inserted to provide that if the applications from the counties under the Act in any one year did not reach the common level of £1,200,000, an applicant of either class might come and take the balance. We remember the glowing terms in which the Act was heralded through Ireland, and in the Speech from the Throne at the end of last Session. Why is the Speech silent on the subject this year? The Tory Party is always ready to blow its own trumpet; why does not the right hon. Gentleman perform on that instrument with regard to the Act? There is what appears to me to be a conspiracy of silence. The Annual Report of the Irish Land Commission, which is usually distributed in December, has not yet been distributed for the year 1891, and the Monthly Reports of the proceedings of the Land Commission have been kept back since July last year, the month before the Land Purchase Act was passed. I think all this silence can only be explained by the fact that there is no pleasant story to tell. I have said that financial complexity ruined the Act, and there was no excuse for the blunder of the Government. They had the result of the working of the Ashbourne Act for five years before them when passing the Land Purchase Act, and at that date, out of an amount of £400,000 repayable to the Treasury, the arrears only amounted to £600. Has the British Treasury ever come off so well with any other class of debtors? The Land Commission had only sold up 47 farms for default, and generally found process by a civil bill effective. During the whole of the stupendous transactions, extending over five years, not a penny has been lost to the State. The moral inference which the right hon. Gentleman might have drawn from all this was that the securities provided by the Ashbourne Act were sufficient—they were the security of the holding and the amount of the guarantee deposit. What did the right hon. Gentleman do in his Bill? He added four others—a reserve fund of £400,000, which Ireland was to provide; an insurance fund provided by the purchasing tenant; power to hypothecate £1,200,000 of the Imperial grant; and power to make a levy on the local rates to recoup the Imperial Exchequer. All this was superfluous. To my mind, however, the reserve fund would not have impeded contracts, nor would the power of hypothecation, which was unconstitutional; nor would the power to levy a county rate without the consent of the ratepayers, which was grossly and excessively unjust. These would not have prevented the practical working of the Act if individual landlords and individual tenants had seen that transactions under it would be to their advantage. The fatal blot on the whole Bill was the insurance fund. Before I come to that, however, I ought to say that the Act satisfies neither landlords nor tenants. Landlords decline it because they are unwilling to take Irish Land Stock instead of Consols, and as they are both National Stock it was a piece of financial pedantry to refuse them the taking of either. We begged the right hon. Gentleman to leave out the insurance clause, but he would not, and it was a fatal blot; because a land purchase system had been in operation for five years successfully in which there was no such fund. Since 1885 every purchaser under the Ashbourne Act has been allowed the full benefit of his bargain from the first; he was only asked to pay the State 4 per cent. on the purchase money, whatever that might be. Under the Ashbourne Act they had to wait a long time for the settlement on the judicial terms, but times have changed. The Irish people expect the return of a Liberal majority to power, and for a better administration of the Land Law; and looking to all these facts, was it reasonable, was it intelligent of the right hon. Gentleman to expect the farmers of Ireland to bind themselves, rather than wait three or four years, by a contract by which they and their successors would be bound for half a century, so that every man for the first five years would have to pay to the State for an insurance fund perhaps double as much as was paid in the first five years by his neighbour in the next parish who had purchased under the Ashbourne Act? The right hon. Gentleman knew little of Ireland, and next to nothing of human nature, if he expected anything of the kind. By insisting on the provision of an insurance fund he doomed his Act to failure. We told you so last year; you neglected our advice, and the result is before you. The legislative mountain has been in labour, and has brought forth, what? Not even a mouse. For, half a year ago, an Act was passed offering thirty millions to anyone who would come and ask for it, and the Secretary for Ireland has to-day told us that not £1 of Irish Land Stock had been sold. Not only do I judge the failure of the Act from the paucity of transactions, but from the national indifference. The landlords have discussed it only to damn it with faint praise, and it has been practically ignored on the part of the tenants. The Act which might have done a great, vigorous, and potential reform if it had been intelligently drawn, has fallen dead. In the space of nearly half a year the transactions, instead of reaching three-quarters of a million, as they would have done on the same lines as those under the Ashbourne Act, only amounted to £80,000, or to £130,000 to the end of January. We know the eagerness of the Irish landlords to escape from their present position; what must be their opinion of the Act when, out of 9,000 landlords, only 43 have applied under it, and out of half a million tenants only 175? Such failure is hopeless and absolute. Is it not a pitiable thing that in a House where you have the means of ascertaining the opinions of Irishmen who are well acquainted with their country, a measure of this kind, undoubtedly great in its conception and vast in potentiality if wisely applied, should be doomed totally, because of the miserable attempt to impose unnecessary guarantees and an insurance fund which five years of experience had shown to be unnecessary? That fund was intended to meet a bad year, but the tenant would rather have gone on the security of his farm to meet it than be compelled by compulsory clauses to provide an insurance fund excessive from the first, and which would not benefit him till the end of his payments. No Irish Member, responsible to an Irish Assembly, dealing with this question would have thought of doing so, and ignoring the evicted tenants. After a night's Debate the right hon. Gentleman did insert a clause dealing with the question, but it has done more harm than good, as it discouraged and almost warned landlords not to deal with evicted tenants when their farms were relet. It did harm by fixing a limit of time absolutely inadequate. Why should the landlords and evicted tenants be forbidden to agree at any time if they wished to do so? It has tempted landlords to demand exorbitant prices by warning the tenant that unless he had signed an agreement by the fifth of this month his last chance of restoration was gone. The agreements, few as they are likely to be abortive, as they will probably not be sanctioned by the Land Commission. I repeat the opinion I expressed last year, that this clause should be revived without the limit of time, and the landlords should be encouraged to deal with the evicted tenants whether the farms have been relet or not. If they cannot agree, the terms should be determined by the Land Commission or by arbitration. I deeply regret the failure of the Act, and in face of the evidence in my hands, of the public attitude in regard to the Act, and the contemptible number of these transactions, I think the right hon. Gentleman can hardly deny that the Act, as a means of substituting a new agrarian condition for that which has broken down of its own weight, has been a total failure. In my judgment, this Parliament has beaten the record, not only of blundering, but also of despotism, since the date of the Legislative Union. We have seen what has become of your great remedial measure. What has been done in the way of oppression? This Government found

Mr. Sexton

Ireland a country in possession of a popular franchise and faithfully represented by a body of Members in this House. They were, nevertheless, guilty of the despotic folly, the amazing blunder, of placing Ireland outside the pale of the British Constitution by the unprecedented act of passing a Coercion Act unlimited by time. I can hardly believe that you imagine that in a country so maltreated, and represented in this House, you will be free for one Session or one month from the confusion and distraction in legislative affairs due to a discontented country. I think you have begun to understand that until you have set Ireland free to manage her own affairs you will never be free to manage yours, or to proceed with calmness and the necessary deliberation to even approach with the slightest prospect of decreasing the heavy arrears of the great and primary duties which lie in your hands as the legislative organ of this Empire. But the mandate of the Tory majority is exhausted, their power for evil or good is at an end. Moreover, the country has made up its mind, the turn of the country has almost come, and cumulative evidence leaves not the slightest doubt that the judgment of the great majority of the electors of Great Britain on the majority of this House, for their sins of omission and commission against the people of Ireland, is one of unqualified condemnation.

Amendment proposed.

At the end of the Question, to add the words, "We deem it our duty to acquaint Your Majesty that a decisive majority of the Irish people, and of their representatives in this House, are convinced of the inability of the Imperial Parliament to legislate for Ireland as her distinctive interests require, and that this conviction has been intensified by the manifest failure of the Land Purchase Act of 1891 to afford an acceptable basis for the extension of the class of occupying proprietors in Ireland."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

(5.25.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I have listened with great attention to the speech of the hon. Member who has just addressed the House, and I do not think he has, in any degree, specified the particular distinctive legislation which he thinks is necessary for Ireland, and which he thinks this House is unable to pass. He has, however, told us that he does not think it necessary to define the inability under which he thinks the House is unable to legislate for Ireland. If he did, his definition lacked completeness, and certainly lacked precision. He has declined to specify the scheme of Home Rule which would satisfy the aspirations of Ireland. He has devoted the greater part of his speech to what he calls the failure of the Land Purchase Act of last year, and he relies entirely, apparently, upon the short experience that we have had of that Act up to the present. Surely, however, there are causes which it is not difficult to specify which may to a very large extent account for the small number of applications and the small amount of business done. The hon. Member led us to believe that, in his opinion, a comparison between the operations under the Act of 1885 showed that the transactions under that Act were very much more extensive than they had been under the Act of 1891. It is necessary for me to remind the House that the Act of 1885 made changes which were, at that time, certainly unexampled and without precedent. They offered to the tenants of Ireland opportunities and advantages which had never been offered before. The Act of 1885, for the first time, permitted the advance of the full amount of the purchase money. And I think the House will remember that the prediction was—and I am not sure that the hon. Member for West Belfast was not one of those who joined in the prediction—that the Act of 1885 would be a failure.

MR. T. M. HEALY: No, no.

MR. JACKSON: Well, I must say that I have seen quotations from the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I think those quotations justify me in what I am saying. I think it would not be difficult to make quotations from the speeches of hon. Members opposite in regard to that Act for the purpose of showing that, in the opinion of hon. Members, it has successfully done its work, and that, by contrast with later Acts, it has been held to have been almost the perfection of legislation. There are, no doubt, other causes which have tended to some extent to delay the operations under the Act of 1891. Under that Act certain rules were prescribed, in the issue of which by the Treasury there was some delay, for which there was reasonable cause; and the absence of these rules may have to some extent tended to delay the working of this Act. The hon. Member has referred to the Insurance Fund principle as being fatal to the Act. That opinion is quoted by hon. Gentlemen opposite, but so far from the Insurance Fund being a fatal blot, I believe it is a distinctly valuable feature. The hon. Member for Longford can scarcely have read the Act, or he would not have fallen into such an error; he would not have forgotten that the Insurance Fund is a fund provided for the tenant's own protection. It is a provision which the tenant is asked to make, so that in the event of certain possibilities taking place he may, at all events, be able to draw upon that fund and to provide for his difficulties; and so far from its being a blot upon the Act, I am inclined to regard it as a wise protection for the tenant, and for the Government. Another point to which the hon. Member for West Belfast referred as proof that the Land Purchase Act of last year had not been successful related to the fact that the landlords wished the Government to give them the option of taking Consols instead of Land Stock, and that was the real cause of the failure.

Mr. Jackson

MR. SEXTON: No, no.

MR. JACKSON: I understood that was what the hon. Member meant, and I think he emphasised it that if that option were given them the Act would have been a success.

MR. SEXTON: No, no; I said nothing of the kind. I said that the difficulties of the landlords would have been diminished if this opportunity had been given.

MR. JACKSON: Well, I confess I am surprised. I think I may venture to say that no man paid greater attention to those Debates in the House during the passing of this Bill than did the hon. Member for West Belfast, and that he followed closely, day by day, every section and every line of the measure; but is it possible that the hon. Member has not read Section 15, and the sub-section relating to it, of that Act?

MR. SEXTON: It places upon the landlord engaged to sell that he should take the Land Stock in the first instance, and he cannot say what the value of that Land Stock would be, and it is upon the value of that Land Stock that the whole thing depends.

MR. JACKSON: I am sorry that I cannot appreciate the point of the hon. Member. The landlord in selling his estate has a certain guide and indication as to what would be the minimum price that he would get for his Land Stock. That minimum price is the price of Consols, and the Land Stock being at  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., without the liability of reduction to  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. after a certain period of time, is a better security than Consols, and has just as good a market as Consols, because it is exchangeable for Consols at any time,

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why does it not sell?

MR. JACKSON: The answer to that question is that the public are not yet familiar with it. I have no doubt whatever that so soon as the applications already received have been sanctioned, it will be found that there is a ready—a good market for any of the Land Stock which anybody could desire to sell. The hon. Member referred also to what he deemed to be one of the blots of the Act, namely, Section 13, which dealt with evicted tenants. I hope that whatever difficulties stood in the way in regard to this matter are being overcome. I am sure that every Member of the House desires to see that process hastened, and I am sure it is the desire of hon. Members not to interfere with it in the smallest extent. But I desire to put the House into possession of the real facts in regard to the comparative periods as to business transactions under this Act. I have referred to the inducements held out under the Act of 1885, and to what changes were made by that Act. I have taken out the actual business done in the period between September and January, 1891-2. In the first period there were 1,551 applications, representing £641,895. Of those applications 880 were connected with the Salters' Company Estates, and those 880 applications, representing £212,503, had been negotiated prior to the passing of the Act of 1885. When the prospect of the passing of the Act of 1885 came, these negotiations, I dare say, were delayed a little in order that they might take advantage of the Act of 1885. With regard to the second period there were 1,634 applications, representing £596,166; in other words, the business of land purchase in the two periods of time was practically the same.

It is the duty of Land Commissioners when they find the funds running down to give notice at a particular time that they will not sanction any more applications for the balance of what is called the "Ashbourne Money" unless those applications are founded on notice signed prior to a certain date. They gave that notice upon the 22nd August, and they fixed as the date the 26th August. More than £200,000 of notices have been received consequent upon the declaration, and of course, this has to some extent absorbed the demand on the market for the time being. But there is no proof in the figures I have given to show that the business of land purchase has slackened now, or has been slackened in the past six months more than it has been during the six months beginning with the Act of 1885. If that be true, it is too early to draw a conclusion that because the applications under the Act of 1891 have been comparatively few in the earlier months the Act of 1891 has been a failure; the demands have been supplied by the balance of the money which was available under the Ashbourne Act. I say that it is much too soon to draw any conclusion, and I deny altogether that the hon. Member for West Belfast has proved his case, that there has been a failure of the Land Act of 1891 as judged by any evidence that we have. It is too soon to determine that yet. The business of land purchase continues to proceed at about the same rate, and I have no doubt whatever that when the Land Commissioners are in a position to put in a clear and precise manner the operations of the Act of 1891, both buyer and seller will be in a better position to know what will happen from their transactions, and we may fairly look forward to a continued business in regard to land purchase. The hon. Gentleman, in the course of his speech, referred to certain matters which he thought proved the necessity of Home Rule. He told us that, in his opinion, one of the causes was the condition of the people of Ireland with regard to their poverty. Now the hon. Member proposes to remedy that poverty of Ireland by separating it from England—from the country that has given its credit for the purposes of Ireland. He spoke with great fairness, and, I think, with great eloquence, of the position of England, which has advanced by leaps and bounds, and he has told us of a part of Ireland to which certain privileges were denied, but he did not tell us that there was a part of Ireland which possesses the wealth and intelligence of the country, and which, under the same laws, has made much progress. He did not tell us of a district of Ireland, of which I know something, which competes with our manufactures, and which successfully competes with us in everything it undertakes; and that most progressive portion of Ireland is not that part which demands separation from this country, and desires to be released from the control of the Imperial Parliament. No; they are the very people who believe that in the long run they will be benefited by being stout champions of that Union between Great Britain and Ireland which has existed so much for the benefit of both countries.

*(5.55.) SIR GEORGE O. TREVELYAN (Bridgeton, Glasgow): I think that no one who has sat opposite the right hon. Gentleman for the last five years will begrudge him the warm hearted cheers with which he was received upon his first speech as Irish Secretary. But I consider that the Member for West Belfast was justified in defending his proposals to-night solely upon the grounds of the Land Purchase Bill of last Session, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will never have a more difficult task than that which he has had to-night in replying to it, for it was a difficult task indeed. He gave statistics to the House that were absolutely of a phenomenal character; but what do these statistics mean? They mean that Parliament has spent its time in passing this measure of Land Purchase as a remedial measure for Ireland, but the fact of it is that instead of promoting the purchase of land in Ireland it has checked it, and checked it to a degree that is quite incredible. I approach the Purchase Act from a different point of view from the Member for West Belfast. He approved of the principle of the measure, and I was opposed to it. But I heartily agreed with him in this. I trusted that when the Bill was passed that it would be of benefit to Ireland in making a great number of peasant proprietors, and I believed and I trusted that it would tend to the reconciliation and pacification of Ireland, and in all the leading reforms in detail which the Member for West Belfast proposed in Committee I heartily agreed with him. It is precisely these points of detail on which we from this side of the House gave one class of advice and the Government adopted another class of advice—it is precisely these points of detail that have wrecked the Purchase Bill. I want to read to the House a few very significant figures indeed. In 1886 the estates that were sold were sold for 18 times the rent. In the year 1887 they were sold for 17·6 times the rent. In 1888 they were sold for 17 times the rent, and in 1889 they were sold for 16·4 times the rent; and in 1890 for 16·7 times the rent. And observe this: that all this while the average rents of Ireland had been going down on account of the operations of the Land Commission, and yet in five years the number of years' purchase had fallen from 18 times the rent to 16·7 times. Now, these significant figures have, in my mind, only one meaning, and that meaning is, that in the mind of the Irish tenant, which would be the mind of an Irish Parliament, the principle of the Land Act of 1881 still holds sway—the principle that the rent of Ireland should be subject to constant revision, and in the eyes of the tenant constant reduction. I think the argument I have given is a most practical one to see—constant reduction before you arrive at the real figure of the landlord's claim. Now, that is not the view of the Government—that was not the view of the Government. Lord Salisbury in the House of Lords spoke on this subject in the strongest words that a man can possibly use. He said—this was, I think, in August, 1886—

"We do not contemplate any reduction of the judicial rents. We do not think it would be honest in the first place, and we think it would be exceedingly inexpedient."

The Government tried to adopt that policy, but they could not for two reasons: First, the pressure of the Irish Members; and, secondly, what was much more important, the pressure of the nature of the case. Mr. Parnell brought forward his proposal for revision for the purpose of reducing the rents. The Government accepted that proposal in spite of what Lord Salisbury said. They accepted it a year too late. They did more; they extended the Act of 1881 to leaseholders, and it was only because they made that concession that even the Government with all their power were able to carry through this period of disturbance and discomfort in Ireland. Well, now, the Land Purchase Bill was brought in to destroy this system of dual ownership and revision of rents; but it has not destroyed the national way of regarding the question of the land. The figures which I have read to the House prove that the Irish tenant only uses the Land Purchase Bill for the purpose of completing and extending the work of the Land Courts and of reducing his rent. This is the position which I am anxious to prove—which I say these figures absolutely prove. What are the reductions which the Land Courts make? We have not got, I think, any Returns of reductions later than July, 1891.

MR. JACKSON: There are others.

*SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: Oh, there are others. I have not been able to lay my hands on them. But in July, 1891, what was the statement? All through the whole of Ireland the rents had been reduced by the Land Courts from £20,000 to £16,000—that is to say, a reduction of 20 per cent.; but under the Land Purchase Act, when the tenant gives 16½ years' purchase, it is more than 30 per cent. reduction, and so it is quite evident that the tenants will only use the Purchase Act, if at all, for the purpose of reducing their rents more than they would be reduced by the Land Courts. That is the attraction which, under the Ashbourne Act, tempted so very many tenants to purchase. Now, I want to tell the House—and I think it is a very serious matter—what the result of the recent Purchase Act has been. During the operations of the Ashbourne Act the average number of applications was to the extent of £2,300,000 a year; that is to say, to the extent of about £200,000 a month. Since this Act has been passed, there has been the entire time only of the half year; instead of something like £1,150,000 being applied for, there has been only £75,000 applied for. But it is fairer to take it by the month, because there is a rise in the month of January. The best month—January—since the present Purchase Act was passed has brought it up to £550,000 of applications, against this monthly sum of £200,000 that was applied for one year with another during all the four years that the Ashbourne Act was under operation. That is the most remarkable comparison of figures that I think has ever been known. Now, the reason of it is perfectly plain. I have shown that the reason the tenant applies under the Purchase Act is because he wants to have his rent reduced; but more than that, he wants to have an immediate reduction. But the right hon. Gentleman opposite, in his Purchase Bill, postpones to an almost indefinite time the opportunity of the tenant of having his rent reduced. He has to pay for five years only 20 per cent. less than his former rent, and what does that mean? Hon. Members must remember that he not only pays 80 per cent. on his rent, but he likewise pays, I think, on the average, 7 per cent., which was the share of his landlord's rates. And the consequence is, that the only immediate reduction—

MR. JACKSON: No, no.

*SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: Does not pay that? How is that? Still he pays the rates.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He does not pay the rates in addition to the 80 per cent.

*SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: He pays the rates whatever they are; but I shall pass from that point for the present, and say it is 20 per cent. That is the reason, and the main reason, so far as I have been able to learn, that the tenants will not apply under the Act of 1891. But there are other reasons likewise. I have been informed, from more quarters than one, that one of the reasons that the Act of 1891 is unpopular is the very unfortunate amalgamation of the Commissioners of the Act of 1881 and the Act of 1885. Now, this amalgamation would be very inexpedient in any case, but it was undoubtedly inexpedient after the extremely strong remonstrances and representations that were made against it by the hon. Members who really speak the voice of the people of Ireland. Now, I have no doubt that the Government will say that this interference of the ordinary Land Commissioners has been postponed until the appeals have been worked off; and this is another point on which I should like some information, and that is, how near the appeals are of being worked off, and how soon the Commissioners under the Act of 1881 will take part in the operations of the Purchase Act with the Commissioners of 1885? But the tenants know very little about that small point of whether or not these particular Commissioners have yet the power of determining values. What they know is that the general conduct of the affairs of purchase has been made to the whole Commissioners, and under Sub-section 6 the Land Purchase Act is administered by a majority of the Commissioners; that is, by those very Commissioners against whom the Members for Ireland on this side of the House, at any rate, unanimously protested as being Commissioners who had not the confidence of the Irish people. Then there is another point which weighs with me a good deal, and which I am quite satisfied must weigh with the tenants; that is, that the tenants are unwilling to purchase, because they do not know what obligations will be thrown upon them in the future. Hon. Members for England sometimes forget that there are many important burdens on the English rates, and on the English land, which do not lie upon the Irish land; and the most important of all these is education. In the country districts in England here a landlord pays largely for the education of the people, or it is paid out of the rates. Over at least three-fourths of Ireland the landlord pays nothing, or next to nothing, for the education of the people, and nothing whatever is paid out of the rates. But I suppose the House does not believe that if Ireland had the Parliament which is foreshadowed in this Amendment—that undoubtedly greater claims would not be made for education upon the districts in the shape of rates, and that all these would fall upon the tenant. And I think it is a very great blot indeed on this Purchase Act that the landlords are able to go off with the money in their pockets, with the prospect of the education rates, and other rates in the future, all capitalised so that they escape them, and so that in the future the burden would be laid upon the tenant, and the risk, will be on the British Treasury. For all these causes small proprietors are very shy of buying. The average value of an Irish farm in Ireland is £184 now. In the first 15 months of the operation of the Ashbourne Act the average value of the holdings sold was not £184, but £450. In the next 15 months the average value went up to £460; and as I took down the figures of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, so far is the Act of 1891 from encouraging the small tenants to buy, that this very large average, already between twice and thrice the price of an average holding in Ireland, instead of falling has run up to nearly £500.

Sir George Trevelyan

MR. JACKSON: No, not so much.

*SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: I think that is very near the figure. It is too evident that this land purchase system has failed to establish small proprietors over the country hitherto, and that its action, instead of being quickened, has been very much diminished by the legislation of 1891. What your land purchase system has done is this: that certain great landlords—sometimes they are corporations—who were prepared to sell and had everything ready before the Ashbourne Act was introduced—sold directly, in the course of the first year, at 20 years' purchase. They got the benefit. But I imagine that after the first burst of selling very little has been done, and the pace is less quick than ever. Well, then, the land purchase system of the Government has failed to tranquillise the country. We earnestly trusted that it would put a stop to evictions. Now, it is not at the present moment the question of mere eviction; it is now a question of the more insidious eviction notices by which a tenant loses the status of part owner of his farm, and is put in the position of an ordinary individual, with no hold on the farm. The purchase system of the Government came into full operation in 1888. In that year there were 9,700 eviction notices served, in the next year there were 6,500, in the next year there were 5,932, and in the first half of 1891 there were 2,258. I say, when you have an average of 5,000 eviction notices in one year, it is a very poor result of the immense sacrifices which were made by the British people in granting this purchase system to Ireland, and the great obligations which Ireland has incurred. Now, Sir, I want to say two or three words about the general character of this Amendment. I can quite understand land that there are a good many Members in this House who do not wish to see this Amendment placed on the Journals of this House. Can they for a moment deny any single word that is contained in it? What is it?

"We deem it our duty to acquaint Her Majesty that a decisive majority of the Irish people and of their Representatives in this House are convinced of the inability of the Imperial Parliament to legislate for Ireland as her distinctive interests require."

Are we not so convinced? In 1885 over three-fourths of the Irish population—over, I should say, five-sixths or eleven-twelfths of the area—there were contests on this question, and that part of Ireland declared quite unanimously, by an absolutely phenomenal majority, in favour of this question. In 1886 there was another General Election. There were no contests, but the same results occurred. Since then there have been contests, and very hot contests indeed. But it is observable that every Member who came into Parliament successfully on either side—if I may so express it—in these contests was in favour of the theory that this Parliament could not properly legislate for Ireland. At Cork the population has increased very substantially since 1885, but the number of citizens of Cork who were opposed to the declaration made in this Amendment fell off at the last Election from 1,500 to 1,100. What have hon. Gentlemen to say against the only conclusion we can draw? In the first place, they say it is a question of clerical influence. At the election of Sligo the candidate whom the Ecclesiastical Party supported succeeded; at the election of Waterford the candidate whom the Ecclesiastical Party opposed succeeded; and they both were in favour of this Amendment. It is quite idle to use the clerical argument against this declaration of Irish Nationalist feeling. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, with great assurance, said there was a province in Ireland which stood aloof from this way of regarding Ireland.

MR. JACKSON: A part of Ireland.
*SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: Well, what is that part of Ireland? This body of opinion is entirely confined to three or four counties, and does not even exist outside them in such force as to be able to return a Member of Parliament. You may fairly say that the part of Ireland to which the right hon.

Gentleman refers touches the shores of a single lake, and yet on that lake there are counties, where there is a numerous Nationalist tinge amongst the people—counties where it is very doubtful whether there is not a Nationalist majority. The Prime Minister tells us that the minority are rich, and that the poor and needy are the majority; and he gives two instances of cities in support of this, and one of these cities returns one of the most respectable and influential Nationalists in this House; and, therefore, I say that it is quite worth while putting the hon. Member for West Belfast's Amendment on the Paper in order to teach the Prime Minister a lesson in political geography. There is another theory, which is the one held apparently by the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Lord Londonderry. He says the cry is factitious, and is got up by demagogues. When Lord Londonderry came back to our part of the country in the North of England he was treated with great ovations, and a great banquet was given in his honour. This is what he said on the subject—I am not sure, by the way, whether these words were spoken in England or at Belfast—but they are his words. He said, "This demand for a Parliament in Dublin comes solely from a body of men," whom he then describes—and I shall not insult the Irish Members of Parliament by reading the description then given of them by a man who was sent to Ireland to be their ruler. Now, I maintain that the manner of this speech of Lord Londonderry is a tremendous argument in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman—the mere fact that the ruler of Ireland should speak in this way of the chosen Representatives of the country that he ruled—in a way that I will not read. (Cries of "Read it!") Well, I will read it if it so wished—

"Whence comes this demand for a Parliament in Dublin? It comes solely from a body of men whose leaders have no stake in the country, who have contributed nothing to the wealth of the country, who have nothing to lose and everything to gain, who trust that in the change they clamour for they will share in the benefits arising from the enterprise of others, which they themselves have no part or lot in, and divide the spoils which they never helped to win."

It is a sufficient reason for this Amendment that Ireland is governed by rulers who thus speak of the chosen representatives of her people. But it is to the matter, and not the tone, that I now object. It is not a question of demagogues in Ireland. Anyone who has had to do with the administration of Ireland knows that the national feeling is not a slight feeling, that it is not a superficial feeling—that it is a genuine irrepressible feeling, an immutable feeling in the population; that it does not depend on the land question, that it does not depend on clerical influence, and that it depends still less upon the exhortations, however eloquent, however sincere, of any public man, to whatever section of the Irish Party he may belong. Before I sit down, I will accept the challenge of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. That challenge—for I took down the words—was to bring forward a distinctive instance of the inability of the Imperial Parliament to legislate for Ireland as her interests require. I cannot even conceive how anyone can have lived through this Parliament and have the very slightest doubt that the case, in the exact words of the right hon. Gentleman, has been absolutely made out. Each Session Bills are brought into Parliament—Bills of the very greatest importance to Ireland—Bills as to which there is no difference at all amongst five-sixths or nine-tenths of the people of Ireland. Each Session these Bills come to nothing, and that for three causes—first, that they are opposed by the majority of the Members of this House; next, that they cannot pass through another House—where not one single Nationalist sits; and, thirdly, and this is almost as important as the other two, there is no time for them. What do hon. Gentlemen say to this? At this moment, except, I think, in two municipal towns, an enormous majority of the Irish residents and citizens in the boroughs are deprived of taking any part in the municipal life of their country.

MR. T. M. HEALY: One.

*SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: I thought it was two. What do hon. Gentlemen say to this? Irish registration is still ineffective, and many points on which Irish Members feel most keenly cannot be amended, because in old days the House of Lords—now I am sorry to say a majority in the House of Commons—was set against them. What do

Sir George Trevelyan

hon. Gentlemen say to the question of the boundaries of Dublin? I do not say whether it is right or not, but I have no doubt almost all Irishmen, especially all Dublin men, want to enlarge the boundaries of Dublin. Have hon. Gentlemen read the paper put into their hands this morning—the census of Leinster? Have they seen how the city of Dublin is diminished in population; how, on the other hand, there has been a very large increase in those suburban districts where rich men live? But the Dublin citizens cannot increase the boundaries of their city because Imperial Parliament has no time for it, and if it has time, has not the will. Again, the Corporation of Dublin, even the House of Commons, were unanimous in favour of doing away with the most humiliating, and most inefficient, and I think in some degree, the most cumbrous system of conducting the finances of the city. Yet though the Corporation of Dublin and the House of Commons were in favour of it, the Committee of the House of Lords, at the instance of a paid official of the Corporation of Dublin—paid by the Corporation of Dublin, but not responsible to the Corporation of Dublin—at his instance a Committee of the House of Lords (five Lords sitting in conclave) were able to defeat what is the overwhelming opinion, perhaps almost unanimous, of those who live in the capital of Ireland. No, Sir, none of Ireland's wishes can be met unless it suits the views of that minority in Ireland which has the ear of the majority in this House, and of almost the entire complement of the Members of the other House. Ireland is not unavenged. I shall vote for this Amendment, as hon. Members last year voted for the Irish Purchase Bill and voted for Free Education in England, because I am convinced, just as they were, of the need for a change in our policy. I shall vote for this Amendment as a British Member of the House of Commons, and still more as a Scottish Member. While Irish grievances are being ventilated, while Bills which Irishmen approve in principle are being passed through Committee, while details which Irishmen recommended are accepted grudgingly or are rejected—in all cases with immense expenditure of time—still more while Coercion Bills, which Irishmen hate, are being thrust down their throats.

some cries of "Oh, oh!" and laughter.) —To laugh is not to answer, nor is it mannerly—I say while these things are being done English, Scottish, and Welsh business is thrown into a corner. All last Session Wales got nothing except the Tithes Bill, which it did not want. The crofter districts of Scotland, about half the area of Scotland, wish to get certain legislation. Part of it this Parliament approved of in principle, against other parts of it there is really nothing to be said. These districts can get nothing, largely because Ireland blocks the way. When we take the whole of Scotland what do we find? The majority, and indeed the whole of Parliament, voted in favour of entirely reforming the system of Parochial Boards—a matter equally as important to Scotland as District Councils in England. Nine years have passed, and Scotchmen—on a matter which they understand, on a matter on which they are as good as unanimous—cannot have their way because business is so blocked. English, Welsh, and Scottish measures are waiting by the dozen and by the score, and they will have to wait until Irishmen can do Irish business on the soil of Ireland according to Irish ideas. Sir, I think it is high time that there was an end to this system of mutual hindrance between communities who could carry on their own affairs much better and much quicker if they were allowed to carry on that part of their affairs which concerns themselves, and which can be managed without detriment to others. Therefore it is, that out of goodwill to Ireland, and because till this question is settled the rest of the nation cannot have the arrears of legislation for which they have been so long waiting, I shall most cordially support the doctrine laid down in the Amendment.

(6.40.) MR. DUNBAR PLUNKET BARTON (Armagh, Mid): I trust the House of Commons will be lenient to a new Member. I see very little about the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, who has just sat down, to reply to. It seems, however, to be the fashion now to attack absent Peers.

*SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: I beg the hon. Member's pardon. I spoke of Lord Londonderry, not as a Peer, but as a ex-Viceroy of Ireland.

MR. BARTON: I reply to the right hon. Gentleman as an ex-Chief Secretary for Ireland. No more insulting language has been used by Lord Salisbury or by Lord Londonderry, or any other Peer, than that of the right hon. Gentleman himself, which we, as Unionists, well remember. He said "there were two Irelands—the Ireland of loyalty, and the Ireland that sympathised with crime." I would not venture to rise to-night, but my constituents are deeply interested in the two subjects with which this Amendment deals, namely, with the capacity of this Parliament to legislate for Ireland and with the Land Purchase Policy. My constituents, Sir, are strongly in favour of land purchase, and I heartily sympathise with them. Many of them wish to see land purchase universal, and I am not afraid to say that if that could be carried out with the concurrence of the Treasury, and with the concurrence of the landlords and tenants of Ireland, I would be in favour of universal land purchase. But, Sir, my constituents, who are mainly tenant-farmers, and who are themselves enthusiastic about land purchase, are not so impatient as to condemn an Act of Parliament because it does not boom in six months. They are not so ingenuous as to suppose that they ever would get a Purchase Bill from the hon. Member for West Belfast as Chancellor of Exchequer of an Irish Parliament, and they are wise enough to know that the Purchase Act of last Session was a large, a liberal, and a very carefully considered step towards the ultimate reaching of their aspirations. We are in Ulster in favour of land purchase, because we believe that if we can make a large majority, and, if possible, all of the occupiers of Ireland, owners of their farms, you will make Ireland easier to govern, and you will make Ireland more difficult for hon. Members opposite to agitate in. The Ulster tenant farmers who returned me here six weeks ago have given a denial to this Amendment. Though they like land purchase they have been convinced in the last five years that this country is capable of governing Ireland. For the rest of Ireland my test is found in the speeches of hon. Members opposed during the Recess—speeches made to their constituents, and speeches which are directly inconsistent with the Amendment which they now offer. What is the Amendment? It asks the House to adopt three propositions—first, that the Act is a failure. With reference to that we have had very reassuring statements from the Chief Secretary. The hon. Member has said what will surprise most Irish landlords, that this Stock could not fall below the price of Consols. That statement is most reassuring, and it will certainly have a very important effect upon this Act. The hon. Member also told us other matters which were very reassuring—that all the money is not applied for and is not all dealt with. You cannot expect the Irish tenants to commence their dinner before digesting their lunch. Secondly, it is said that the failure of this Bill is because of its defects. It is because of that statement that I call in question the speech of the hon. Member. The hon. Member for Longford, who can speak with authority as a lawyer, as he is familiar with the Bill as a lawyer, but also with authority as a Member, addressing his constituents, said in Longford, when dealing with the Insurance Fund, which we are told is to be the final proof of the incompetence of this House to deal with Irish matters, that 20 per cent. is the biggest reduction under the Balfour Act; but if this Amendment is right the Act has failed because this Parliament is incompetent. What did the hon. Member for Longford say? He said the reason was because there was a section, 33 strong, led by Parnell, who said that it was a grand Act, and they could not amend it in the House of Commons. So that the reason of the Insurance Fund failing is not because of the incompetence of the House, but because of the split in the hon. Member's own Party. The moral of that argument is that his own Party should be united, and not that this Parliament should be broken up. What did the hon. Member say within the last few weeks when, in addressing a meeting, he referred to the various defects of the Act? Did he tell his audience that the reason of the failure of the Act was that Parliament was unfit to govern Ireland? No. If it has failed it is not due to the incompetence of Parliament, but to his own Party. If that is the reason of the defect, why has it failed in Ireland? I now turn to the hon. Member for East Mayo. I think he can provide the answer. The hon. Member for East Mayo did not allow the grass to grow

Mr. Barton

under his feet. Before this Act was passed, he told the tenants what was his advice. Speaking at Wexford, when delegates from every district assembled, addressing the tenant farmers, a Member of this House who claims, and rightly claims, to be influential in Ireland—one whose speeches are read all over Ireland, says—

“That the first question which suggests itself to my consideration is that the tenant farmers ought not to avail themselves of that Land Act.”

There is the question put very clearly, but it is not more clearly put than answered. He says, my advice is simple and distinct. Have nothing whatever to say to the new Purchase Act. Add that to the reason that we are told this Bill has failed because Parliament is incapable. I say that speech alone would account for the failure of this Act. What reason does the hon. Member give? Does he give the reason that this Act is a bad Act? He gave a reason why they should not buy. His words were:—

“Now my advice to the farmers of Ireland is simple and distinct, and it is this: have nothing whatever to say to the new Purchase Act. (Cheers.) The ranks of the people of Ireland are re-forming. The National movement is rising again to its full former strength after the troubles of last winter. (Cheers.) We have shown in the past that by organisation and by perseverance we have been able to get each succeeding year better and better terms, so that those tenants who settled and bought ten years ago are sorry to-day, some of them, for having done so. The darkest days are over. (Cheers.)”

On the face of that statement to the farmers of Ireland, I suppose the hon. Member will walk into the Lobby to ask the House to affirm that the failure of the Act is due, not to his advice, and the reasons he gave to the people of Ireland, but to the absurd, ridiculous view which he has expressed on this Amendment. I am not the only person who has put this construction upon his words. The hon. Member for Waterford, speaking in County Kildare on this matter, referred to the Land Act as a valuable Bill for the farmers of Ireland, and he referred to the reasons why it failed. He said:—

“That Bill, as you will remember, in Session was first attacked and opposed by the leading Members of the Seceders, and it was only when Mr. Parnell went into the House of Commons, and showed that that Bill would be an enormous benefit to the farmers of Ireland, that they desisted from further opposition. Even then they hung on the flank of the Bill, and though they did not openly destroy it, they did their best to impair it."

I am against the insurance fund. I would like to see this Bill even a much larger Bill than it is. But for the first time in the history of legislation it has been said that because an Act requires amendment—I think it requires amendment—not that the amendment should be effected, but that this Parliament should be broken up. The hon. Member for East Mayo answered the speech of the hon. Member for Waterford by a long letter in the papers, but he never referred to the taunt, nor thought it worth his while to deny it. On the 7th February Mr. Davitt, who was chosen as the representative of hon. Gentlemen opposite, said in Kildare:—

"All I have got to say on this point is this: If the tenant farmers will put this Act in operation at the present time they will regret it."

Can hon. Members wonder that the Act has fallen dead? It has fallen dead by the words of the very men who blamed the incompetence of this Parliament to deal with Irish questions. Before sitting down I would say one word as representing the tenant farmers in Ulster. We are told that there are none but Irish landlords represented by Irish Members on this side of the House. I believe I have nearly 5,000 supporters, but hon. Gentlemen opposite did not give me the opportunity of testing how many. Among these I am not aware, I think, of more than five landlords. I do not represent the landlords, I represent the commercial, industrial, and, especially, the agricultural classes. On their behalf I say I object to the way in which the hon. Member for North Belfast, following the example of the right hon. Member for Derby, has tried to raise the cry of religious bigotry. It is from the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen, and not from these Benches, that the cry of bigotry has been raised.

MR. SEXTON: I condemned raising the cry of religious bigotry.

MR. DUNBAR BARTON: It has been said that the government of Ireland is carried on for the benefit of those we represent. I would like to test that charge by the measures of the last and the preceding Session. What were these measures? They were for the relief of the people of Ireland. We rejoiced that they applied to the constituents of hon. Gentlemen opposite. When the right hon. Gentleman, now the Leader of the House, nobly conceived and carried out that work of charity, not one penny went to the people I now represent. The Bill for light railways and tramways did not benefit our constituents, but those represented by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Even this Purchase Act which they are now attacking we do not think was adapted to Ulster, but far more to the farmers of the West of Ireland. If I had to protest for a grievance it would be on behalf of the farmers of Ulster, that land legislation ought to be framed more to suit their grievances. Hon. Members laugh. We have our grievances in Ulster, but we expect to see them remedied by this Parliament, and this Parliament alone; and we are grateful to the Government for the measures they have passed during this Parliament for relieving the distress of their Catholic subjects. We are grateful to them, above all, for restoring to Ireland order and settled government, and showing by the policy they have pursued that England is capable, and has never been incapable, of, in this Parliament, meeting the wants, redressing the grievances, and governing the people of Ireland.

(7.5.) MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): In congratulating the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down upon his speech, I may say that we heard with great satisfaction his declaration that he had been convinced by the speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast, if not convinced before, that the Land Purchase Act of last Session is defective, and when in the course of a few days we endeavour to remedy those defects we hope we shall have the assistance of the hon. and learned Gentleman. Sir, the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Belfast raises two distinct points. Each one would have been sufficient to engage the serious attention of the House. So far as the smaller or more restricted of the two questions is concerned—namely, that dealing with the Land Purchase Act—I desire to say that I heartily sympathise with the arguments used by the hon. Member for West Belfast, in which he pointed out the defects which have led to the failure of the Act up to the present..

It is conceded by all who know anything of the matter that this Insurance Fund—to which the hon. and learned Gentleman has declared his hostility—is the main defect which stands in the way of the tenant farmers of Ireland taking advantage of the Act. That Insurance Fund had not the support, so far as I know, of any section of Irish Nationalists in this House; it certainly was opposed by the late Mr. Parnell and by those who were honoured in following his lead; it certainly was opposed by us, and it was inserted in the Bill undoubtedly to cater to English public opinion and to provide another safeguard for the money of the British taxpayer. Another defect in the Bill which the hon. Member for West Belfast most rightly alluded to was the failure of Clause 13 to provide any assistance to the evicted tenants in Ireland. Sir, I listened to the speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast with attention and interest, because a Bill has been introduced by the hon. Member for Roscommon dealing with that defect in the Bill of 1891 in almost the very manner recommended by the hon. Gentleman. I sympathise with the position taken up by the hon. Member for West Belfast, but I do not go the full length of his Amendment. I do not think he established his case for saying that the Land Purchase Act of 1891 was a manifest failure to provide an acceptable basis for the establishment of a peasant proprietary. My opinion is that it does afford a basis, and a valuable basis. There are defects in the machinery which prevent it from working, but the machinery is there, and the defects can be removed, and when that is done an enormous boon to the tenant farmers of Ireland will result. Therefore, while joining with the hon. Member in calling attention to these defects, and calling for their removal, and showing that these defects were not due to the Nationalist Party, but were put in to satisfy English opinion, I am not prepared to deny, as this Amendment denies, that the Act forms a valuable basis for the creation of a peasant proprietary. The other portion of the Amendment seems to me to raise questions of the widest interest and the greatest importance. For my part I regret that the hon. Member did not see fit to introduce a little more appearance of reality into this portion of the Amendment. I was oppressed all through with a feeling I could not conquer that there was an utter absence of reality in the observations he made on that part of his case. Sir, a debate has been raised in this last Session of Parliament on the subject of Home Rule in a somewhat half-hearted or faint-hearted fashion. But I believe that no Debate on this question of Home Rule for Ireland ought to be allowed to terminate without the voice and opinion of all sections of the Irish people, and the requirements of the moment being clearly and unmistakably heard in this House. There is no use in disguising the fact that at this moment amongst large masses of the Irish people there exists the very gravest anxiety on this question. There is, among large masses, a wide-spread desire for some further information—not for the details of the measure which the Liberal Party have promised to introduce—that is a cry that we have never raised; that is a foolish and impossible demand. No, not for information as to the details of the Home Rule Bill, but for information with reference to certain of its main features and proposals. We know from the speech delivered a few days ago by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, we know for the first time officially, that it will be proposed to keep the Irish Members in the Imperial Parliament, but as to the consequences likely to flow from that change in the Home Rule Bill of 1886, and especially how far the Imperial Parliament is to retain the power of interfering with and controlling Irish legislation, we know absolutely nothing. Not only do we know nothing, but we hear contradictory voices. I believe that the Irish people have real and substantial ground for the anxiety which they feel. We are told we should simply trust to the admitted, recognised and honoured earnestness of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. We are told we should trust implicitly to his good intentions and the good intentions of his Party, that we should not embarrass our friends. Sir, in asking for information, I deny that I am taking a course which will embarrass the Liberal Party in the future. They have succeeded in bringing over to Home Rule the great majority of the people of England, who are convinced that in order to carry out the pacification of Ireland it will be necessary to grant Home Rule with a large and a generous hand. That being so, how can it be an embarrassment to the Liberal leaders and their party to declare the main features upon which they intend to shape their Home Rule policy. Sooner or later these main features will have to be discussed in the constituencies, and if these main features were voted upon by the constituents the House of Lords would not dare for one instant to stand between Ireland and that Home Rule which the English electors want. In asking for information I am taking the most direct course to hasten the progress of Home Rule. Much has happened within the last year in Irish politics. I do not care to refer to all the circumstances which have undoubtedly shaken the faith and confidence of a certain section of the Irish people in this matter. The policy of patience, silence and confidence, which might have been safe when Ireland had a united Nationalist representation and a wise and powerful leader, is, as many of us know, both unsafe and unwise in the present circumstances of political life. Every event of the past year in our opinion has only tended to increase the anxiety of those who are doubtful in Ireland on this question. In December, 1890, a demand for further information was made upon the Liberal leaders, not by a section of the Irish Nationalists, but by the united Irish representation. In view of the differences of opinion arising between Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Parnell on the accuracy of Mr. Parnell's recollection, the Whips were instructed to obtain from Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Morley, and Sir William Harcourt, before further consideration of the question, what their views were with respect to these two vital points—the control of the police and the land question. Two days later another Resolution was passed in these terms :—

"That the following members of the Party, namely, Mr. Leamy, Mr. John Redmond, Mr. Sexton, and Mr. T. M. Healy, are hereby authorised to request a conference with Mr. Gladstone for the purpose of representing the views of this Party, and requesting an intimation of the intention of himself and his colleagues with respect to certain details connected with the following subjects :—

1. The settlement of the Irish Land Question.

2. The control of the Irish Constabulary in the event of the establishment of an Irish Legislature."

Therefore, Sir, so far back as December, 1890, the necessity for obtaining further information was admitted by the Irish Nationalist Party. We used all the arts of persuasion, and I may add entreaty, to carry out the object with which we went to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, but we made our appeal in vain. What the Irish people have been asking ever since is, Why the information was refused. There was a terrible and cruel situation for Ireland at that moment, which threatened us with months, and perhaps years, of internal discord, and we were all of opinion that, if the desired information were given, that situation could be ended and that discord stopped. Though that was our opinion the information was denied. After an interval of some weeks the United Nationalist Party again endeavoured to obtain the information which was desired from the Liberal leaders. The same considerations were pressed—the necessities of the general situation, and the necessities of the particular situation that existed at that moment—and again that information was refused. It was suggested that the information might be given secretly, so that no embarrassment might be felt by the right hon. Gentleman. But secret as well as public information was refused. These two refusals under these extreme circumstances of pressure, naturally as I think, had the effect of arousing anxiety, doubt, and misgiving in the hearts and minds of Irishmen. But I come to the gravest case of anxiety of all. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby began to make speeches in England. Almost the very first of his utterances on the Irish situation was an utterance in which he stated that, while the English people were still firm in their allegiance to Home Rule, and the Liberal Party still prepared to grant it, neither he nor his colleagues nor the Liberal Party nor the English people were in favour of what is called Mr. Parnell's Fenian Home Rule. Now, Mr. Speaker, what did he refer to? What was Mr. Parnell's Fenian Home Rule? Was it not then what it had always been—not the demand of Mr. Parnell, but of the entire Irish people; and, finally, I will ask, Was it Fenian

Home Rule? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham made a speech the other night in which he displayed his usual hostility and malignity to Ireland. He made a speech, not for the purpose of doing anything great or noble, but with the view of making a little mischief, and, in furtherance of his policy, he had the hardihood to misquote the words of the late Mr. Parnell. He professed to quote Mr. Parnell's definition of Home Rule. I will read the whole passage, and I think I have reason to complain that the right hon. Gentleman did not read one sentence more, because that sentence more might tell against his argument. Here is the whole passage. It was made in a speech on 25th January, 1891:—

"The Liberal Party and Mr. Gladstone know what Ireland wants. There can be no mistake about it. We want a Parliament with full powers to manage the affairs of Ireland —this is the part that the right hon. Member for West Birmingham carefully omitted, and across which he drew his pen:—

"without trenching on any Imperial prerogative or injuring any Imperial or English interest: but a Parliament we must have that will be supreme in regard to Irish questions."

It may be said that that was an uncorrected speech, but I have a report of a Convention held in July last, over which Mr. Parnell presided, and which defined the Nationalist programme to be the restitution to the Irish people of the right to manage their own affairs in a Parliament elected by the people of Ireland. Is that what the right hon. Member for Derby is speaking of when he talks of Mr. Parnell's Home Rule? It is the Home Rule supported by every man who sits on this side of the House. There is not an Irish politician who will take that programme in his hand and say he will accept one whit less as a satisfactory solution. If that is what he refers to, he is wrong in calling it Parnell's Home Rule Bill. It is the Home Rule of O'Brien and Dillon and McCarthy, and I say it is monstrous on the part of the right hon. Member for Derby to pretend that it is a Fenian Home Rule scheme. I also deny that the scheme has any connection with Separation. We are a Constitutional Party seeking, within the Constitution, to obtain the restitution of the Irish Parliament. We are not Separatists, and those whom I represent are willing to accept the scheme which I have read as final and conclusive. A great deal of nonsense, it seems to me, has been spoken on both sides of this question about the words "supremacy of Parliament," "a subordinate Parliament," "a co-ordinate Parliament." I will explain what I understand by these phrases. This Imperial Parliament is supreme. None of us desires to touch its supremacy, and it must remain to the end of all things the supreme Imperial Parliament. I would be inclined to repeat the argument which, I am sorry to say, was used without effect in the pre-Union Debates in Ireland, when it was urged by the great constitutional lawyers that the Irish Parliament had no power to abdicate its own functions; so I would say you have no power to destroy the supremacy of your Imperial Parliament; at any rate, we have no desire to interfere with it. We belong to this Empire, and the symbol of our right to take part in the Government of that Empire will be found in the continued presence of the Irish Members here. We are willing to come here to take part in the government of that Empire, which owes its existence quite as much to the intellect and energy of Irishmen as to the intellect and energy of Scotchmen and Englishmen. Under these circumstances, it is an absurdity to suggest that we desire to interfere, in the remotest degree, with the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament. While we object to the words "subordinate Parliament," we do not object to such a phrase as a "minor Parliament," because a Parliament created under this, for Ireland, must always be a minor Parliament. But I and others gather, from the constant repetition of the phrase, that what is desired and intended by some people is, that after you have given us the right in an Irish Legislature, to deal with Irish affairs, then you are to have the right of constituting yourselves a Court of Appeal, wherein every Act passed by the Irish Parliament would be brought up and re-considered, and interfered with, and destroyed. That is a danger we foresee. It may be said that there exists a veto with reference to Colonial Legislatures, and undoubtedly in theory that is the case; but everybody knows that the exercise of that power is a dead letter. The colonies are not represented here. They are at the other side of the world, and it would be preposterous and ridiculous for this Parliament to endeavour to revise and control Acts passed by them. You are going to keep the Irish Members here—I do not know in what numbers—but in that case you will have here representatives of the small body which is working against Home Rule, and would have them trying to wreck Home Rule by raising Debates, and the result would be that the Irish Parliament would have every Act and word criticised and interfered with in this Parliament. I have no hesitation in saying that no Legislature that the wit of man could devise could possibly exist if all its transactions were to be made the subject of discussion and amendment and control by a Court of Appeal in the shape of Imperial Parliament. While, therefore, we admit that this Parliament must remain supreme in Imperial matters, we demand that in those Irish matters which are to be committed to the Government of the Irish Parliament, that Irish Parliament shall be supreme. I do not know what the views of the right hon. Member for Derby are in this matter, and the Irish people are in doubt and mystery on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman says that the Liberal Party and the English people will not have Mr. Parnell's Fenian Home Rule. We know that Mr. Parnell's Home Rule is the demand of the whole Irish people, and they want to know whether the Member for Derby means—I do not believe that he does—that the Liberal Party will not accept such a scheme of Home Rule as Mr. Parnell propounded. The right hon. Gentleman makes us fear that the Liberal Party may be tempted to destroy the chance of Home Rule by some attempt to disregard Irish opinion, and therefore it is that we ask for some general declaration of policy. I do not believe in the wisdom of the Irish people or the Liberal Party living in a fool's paradise. We ought to know what is in one another's minds. I am not alone in making this demand. There are Members of the Liberal Party who have made it. The hon. and learned Member for Fife has made exactly the same demand, and for the same reasons which I have given. There is another, and possibly a more powerful, ground on which I base this demand for information. The right hon. Member for Derby some little time ago delivered a speech in the City of Glasgow which created considerable uneasiness in Ireland; and just as it was beginning to disappear, that bad impression was revived in a startling manner by a speech made by the right hon. Gentleman who has taken part in this Debate to-night. Lord Salisbury had stated that the House of Lords had the power and was prepared to exercise it—and the Chancellor of the Exchequer confirmed the statement—of peremptorily throwing out a Home Rule Bill, if its main provisions had not been voted upon at the General Election. On the 8th October in Glasgow the right hon. Member for Derby said, speaking of the House of Lords—

Mr. John Redmond

"They hope to wear us out by dissolution forced on us by the House of Lords. Well, I fancy they will find themselves mistaken. In my opinion, if they are going to play that game they should have rope enough; they should be allowed to do their worst on the whole scope and tenour of Liberal reforms; to make clear to the nation their attitude towards the popular will on all the heads of popular reform and upon all its measures."

We read that in Ireland as meaning that if the Home Rule passed by the House of Commons were rejected by the House of Lords, it would be hung up while the House of Commons proceeded to discuss the items of the Newcastle programme. The Liberal Party would pursue the even tenour of its way, and Ireland be left out in the cold, and the chances of Home Rule for this generation would be fading into the far distance. But what did the right hon. Gentleman who spoke to-night say on the 22nd January last at Rothbury? I am quoting from the Times of 23rd January, 1892. He said—

"Questions such as the Disestablishment of the Welsh Church, the registration of voters, local control of the liquor traffic, one man one vote, District Councils and Parish Councils, were ready for settlement, and would be dealt with by the Liberal Ministry immediately it came into power. It had been stated that the House of Lords would throw these Bills out. All he had to say was, let them try."

Now what is the meaning of that? How are the House of Lords to try the policy of throwing out these Bills if they are not sent up from the House of Commons first? I want to know whether these seven or eight measures of Liberal reform are to be passed simultaneously, in the same Session, with the Home Rule Bill?

SIR G. TREVELYAN : I beg pardon. I think that report in the Times of my speech at Rothbury, a very remote village in the centre of Northumberland, is about twelve or fourteen lines long. I will send the hon. Member the report of my speech published by the Liberal Association there, as corrected by myself. If he will read that he will see what I really said.

MR. REDMOND : The right hon. Gentleman will make allowance for me when he remembers that I am not a subscriber to the Liberal Association of Rothbury. The report in the Times was read, of course, by the right hon. Gentleman, but it was never corrected by him, and it is quite enough for my present purpose. If the right hon. Gentleman would take advice from me he would, instead of referring me to the Liberal Association of Rothbury, stand up and, in one sentence, say that he is entirely against any such policy as the Times has attributed to him.

SIR G. TREVELYAN : I am entirely in favour of the policy of bringing forward, one after another, those Liberal measures, and daring the House of Lords to throw them out. But that has absolutely nothing to do with this question of Irish Home Rule. I never said it was to be done in the same Parliament, or anything of the sort. If the House of Lords does venture to throw out either the Home Rule Bill or any of those Liberal measures, we shall see how the House of Commons will act.

MR. REDMOND : I feel myself in a worse position than before, because it now seems to be uncertain whether the Home Rule Bill is to be the first Bill, after all, to be submitted to the House of Commons and the House of Lords. However, I pass over that ; and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will take some early opportunity of letting the Irish people know definitely, first, why he was unwilling to give us the information we asked for ; and, secondly, whether he will protest against any delay with, or hanging up of, a Home Rule Bill beyond the Session in which it is passed by the House of Commons ? In giving such information as we ask for, the Liberal Party would be acting wisely from their own point of view and that of the masses to whom they will have to submit their policy when the General Election comes. All I have to say, in conclusion, is this : Let England and the English people and English Political Parties be under no misapprehension whatever as to this Irish question. Grant to Ireland a partial and halting measure of Home Rule, leaving power to the English Parliament to discuss and revise—thwart and destroy—Irish legislation, bring Irish Members to this House, and constitute it a sort of Court of Appeal to which the grievances of every section of the Irish people could be brought, and I say your last state will be worse than your first. Act in a spirit of distrust to the Irish people, and they will continue to act in a spirit of distrust to you. But, on the other hand, if you deal out justice to the Irish people with a free and generous hand ; if, having made up your mind that Home Rule is necessary, you do not halt and "let I dare not wait upon I would" in your policy ; if, having made up your mind that an autonomy ought to be given to Ireland, you go to the full logical length of that conviction and give to Ireland, in certain purely Irish affairs, supreme control of her own business, then I believe England will be repaid in the near future by having an end put to this Irish question which has been for generations the plague and the torture of this House and the disgrace of this English Empire, and Ireland will be repaid after her long and troubled and fevered history by being enabled at last to enter upon a new era of liberty, prosperity, and peace.

*(7.50.) MR. W. JOHNSTON (South Belfast) : I have been greatly interested and somewhat amused by the turn which the Debate has taken ; and I have been impressed by the feeling that if Ireland is to have a Legislative Assembly granted to her, it would be desirable that those of her Representatives in this House who claim that position for her should first settle amongst themselves their own disputes. The Amendment which has been submitted by the hon. Member for West Belfast has been objected to in part by the hon. Member for Waterford, and I must leave these two gentlemen to settle between themselves the policy they will propound to this House as the policy of the Irish people. I am sure the House must have listened with great gratification to the "maiden" speech of the hon. Member for Mid Armagh, who has come to this House to give assistance to the loyal minority of Ulster, and whose voice will not be raised to break up the legislative union. We have been accused in Ulster sometimes of uttering bitter words concerning other sections of the Irish people, but in no part of Her Majesty's Dominions more than in my constituency is there a strong desire to see an advance made in the material and moral prosperity of the Roman Catholic subjects of the Queen in Ireland. We have to thank Her Majesty's Government for having on various occasions brought in measures for the promotion of the prosperity of Ireland, and we have regretted that by some sections of the Irish Party those measures have been bitterly opposed. The complaint now comes from them with a bad grace, that all they have desired has not been done for Ireland. I wish to give my strongest opposition to the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Belfast, who, as I know, does not represent the majority of that constituency. He may sit for that constituency at present, but another story will be told after the General Election, when the majority will send to this House a Representative who will give expression to their sentiments. We have been told that Ulster returns a majority of Nationalists to Parliament. It is so by a majority of one, but the votes that have been recorded for them are so small that we are certain to reverse that position at the General Election. We, at least, who represent the loyal minority in Ireland are not afraid of an election, because we know that the policy we advocate in this House is the policy of the loyalists of Ireland, and that they desire the maintenance of the Union as the best guarantee of the prosperity of their native land.

(8.35.) MR. DOUGLAS H. COG-HILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): The hon. Member for West Belfast alleges by his Amendment that this Parliament is unable to remedy Irish grievances, and the same remarks were made in the course of the Debate by Scotch and Welsh Members in regard to their own country. Now, at the General Election in the year 1886, the Unionist Party said, in reply to this demand, that if the question of Home Rule for Ireland were once entertained it would not be long before the same demand was put forward by Scotland and Wales. Of course, we were told that we were foolish to indulge in such predictions, but we had not long to wait. Demands have been made for separate Parliaments for Scotland and for Wales, and I should like to ask where this multiplication of Parliaments is going to stop. We have been reminded by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton of what has taken place in Ireland at bye-elections; we have heard of clerical interference in Irish elections; we have been told that it is wrong to complain of clerical influence, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was very angry last week because Lord Salisbury had gone so far as to mention one of the Catholic Archbishops by name. The right hon. Gentleman was most indignant at it, but I would ask why should not a Catholic Archbishop, if he separate himself from his sacred office, and take to electioneering, be mentioned apart from that sacred office which he has abandoned, and in connection with the work he has substituted for it? As long as a priest confines himself to his functions, so long may his office be respected. I should like to remind the House of what has taken place in Ireland, and I should like to quote to the House two short extracts—I am not going to quote from a Unionist paper, I am going to quote from what may be regarded as the official Gladstonian organ, the Star, referring to the Kilkenny election in December, 1890. This was said upon the 22nd December by that paper:—

"But of all the work that has been done, the most important was accomplished this Sabbath morning, when, throughout the constituency, the blessing of Holy Church was practically pronounced upon Sir John Pope Hennessy's candidature. It amounts to this, that in almost every parish in the constituency the Holy Sacrament of Mass was adapted to purposes of political organization. Hennessy was not exactly blessed, nor Mr. Parnell denounced, from the steps of the altar, but it was very like it at 36 parish chapels in the constituency."

The same correspondent upon the next day says:—

"At Ballyragget, voters, as they came up to the station, were taken into the priest's house for the last word of good counsel; at Johnstown, the priest was in the booth. All over the division priests acted as personation agents. At Gowran, each of three personation agents was in a black frock. In the electoral history of the world there is registered no device to compare with this. Voters found the priest so all-prevailing that some of them must have believed a ballot-box itself to be an ecclesiastical appurtenance with a priest inside it."

These statements, I think, justify the Unionist Party in their contention that when a Home Rule Parliament is established in Dublin the most improper influences would be brought to bear upon the electors. We have been asking for a long time what the Home Rule policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian really is. The right hon Gentleman the Member for Derby has made a statement with regard to that policy. He said, first of all, that Home Rule is not local government. But it has been dinned into our ears, and I have heard it stated over and over again at bye-elections, that the only thing meant by Home Rule is local government for Ireland—that local government was understood to mean that the Irish people were to have the power to deal with the supply of gas, water, electricity, and other matters of that kind; but now we have a statement from the right hon. Member for Derby that Home Rule means none of those things; we have it upon the right hon. Gentleman's authority that Home Rule is to be something very different. Then, the right hon. Gentleman referred to Canada: he asked us to look at the self-governing powers possessed by Canada; but are you prepared to give the same powers to Ireland as to Canada? Canada might, and could, raise an army or a navy; Canada could send Ambassadors to foreign Courts; it could impose protective duties, and yet, when Unionists said it was possible that Ireland might demand any one, or all of those, we are told that it is only a Unionist bogey. Are you prepared to give Ireland the same rights? I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, are these the powers that he would give Ireland? "No such thing," it is said; all that is meant is to give Ireland a subordinate Parliament. Yes; but the Irish Members say that it is not a subordinate Parliament that they are aiming at. We have heard it again from the hon. Member for Waterford. The hon. Member for North-East Cork, speaking in Ireland, at Drogheda, on November 15th of last year, said:—

"They, on their side, had now an Irish Party united enough and formidable enough to stand no nonsense in reference to the pledges that the English Liberals had solemnly given them, and with the help of the people of Ireland they would succeed in giving back to the old country all the blessings of National unity and independence."

Mr. Douglas H. Coghill

In all that there is nothing about a "subordinate Parliament." I think every man inside and outside this House knows full well the meaning of these words—"National unity and independence"—and that what is implied is a Parliament that would be supreme. That is what is put forward before the Irish people. In England, no doubt, the tone adopted is very different, and very different, too, to that adopted across the Atlantic. Here they say they are in favour of a subordinate Parliament to manage local affairs, but it is very different upon the other side. We have asked over and over again what the policy is, and we have complained over and over again of the old policy of concealment, obscurity, and silence. Are the powers they propose to give something like the powers possessed by the people of Canada? Now, we find that what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby would give the people of Ireland is something like what the Canadian people have; and very likely, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian comes back to the House, the first thing he will do will be to throw over that policy. We want to know, before the General Election takes place, what is the exact scheme of Home Rule that is to be the programme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. It is complained in this House by the hon. Member for West Belfast that sufficient attention is not paid to the opinions set forth by Irish Members; and the Gladstonian Party say that we do not represent the opinion of these Members; but only last year, on the Second Reading of the Irish Land Bill, all the Irish Members went into one Lobby and the Gladstonian leaders went into the other. Thus, the right hon. Members for Derby and Newcastle deliberately tried to vote down the legitimate expression of Irish opinion. No charge is made more frequently in this House than that we disregard the opinions of the Irish people; but if those charges are to be made they should be made by somebody other than Members of the Gladstonian Party, and especially by leaders of that Party. Last week, in the Division on Friday on the convicted dynamiters, I observed with much interest that the hon. Member for Rossendale considered it his duty in the first vote he gave as a Member of this House—and I watched it with great interest—to vote against his own leaders, and we had Members of the Gladstonian Party in one Lobby and the leaders in another, deliberately voting down the opinion of the Irish Members. The hon. Member for Rossendale—a new disciple so recently returned—voted against his leaders, and became a Dissentient Liberal. And, by the way, with reference to the Debate upon the question of the release of these prisoners, I would like to ask whether it was one of the pieces of business to be entrusted to an Irish Parliament; because, if not, this Imperial Parliament would still have the eternal Irish question with us, and we should have it with us as much, if not more, than ever. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle denounced the right hon. Member for Birmingham for sitting on these Benches. For my part, I can see nothing wrong in it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle ought rather to be proud of it, for we all know that in the years 1885-6 the Tory Party were carrying on a small flirtation with Home Rule, and he ought to be pleased that the Members of the Tory Party have been won over to the old Liberal creed, and taken up the attitude formerly so firmly held by the Liberal Party, including the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, than whom, of course, we all know, no one more energetically denounced the idea of giving to Ireland a separate Parliament. There is small temptation, indeed, for the Unionists to join the ranks of the faithful, because we do not know how long they will be in favour of Home Rule as the man "convinced against his will is of the same opinion still," and the time might come when we may see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian travelling about the country and proclaiming from railway carriages that anyone who was so foolish and misguided as to believe in Home Rule must be either a lunatic or madman. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle said that the country was against the Government, but I do not gather that from the number of English Members who were amongst the new Members who took their seats the other night. The tactics pursued at election after election by the Gladstonian Party showed that Home Rule by itself was not good enough to win upon. In North-East Manchester, where there is a large section of Irish people, it was not Home Rule that was put forward; in North Leeds it was thought better not to take it up, and a flagrant example of these methods was found in the bye-election that took place at Wisbech last summer. The question there was not whether the Gladstonian candidate was a fit and proper person to represent the constituency; the only question was as to the abilities of the wife of the hon. Member singing Irish airs with a touch of the real Irish brogue. We wish to know what the Home Rule Parliament is to be; the Home Rule question ought to be put fairly before the people, and I think if the question is put before the constituents, and when electors have an opportunity of deciding upon it, the people of this country will endorse once more the policy of having one Parliament for the whole of the United Kingdom.

(8.55.) MR. WILLIAM E. M. TOMLINSON (Preston): I must say that I do not believe that this question of Home Rule is a burning question throughout the country, and I would call the attention of the House to the extraordinary fact that for a considerable time during a speech of much interest and importance the Front Opposition Benches were absolutely tenantless, and that not one of the Gladstonian side of the House rose to continue the Debate. In fact, this Debate is a mere sham and parade, and I am afraid there is some idea of trying to carry the Amendment in the absence of a considerable portion of Members of the House. When hon. Members are so convinced upon this Home Rule doctrine why do they not rise to carry on the Debate upon an Amendment raising very important issues? In Ireland we have three Parties, one of which is bitterly hostile to Home Rule, and another of which is absolutely indifferent upon the question. I am one of those who think that this question of Home Rule does not excite any very great interest in this country, and I think the hon. Member will find himself greatly mistaken if he really and bona fide endeavours to carry the next General Election on the cry of Home Rule without taking up local questions which are supposed to interest the country, and gradually putting them forward in the manner described by the hon. Member opposite. I naturally took considerable interest in the General Election of 1885. I was opposed by the hon. Member for North Tyrone. It is quite true that the hon. Member for North Tyrone in many of his speeches dealt largely with this question of Home Rule. For my own part I always on that occasion declined to follow the arguments of the hon. Member, because I did not conceive it possible that Home Rule could ever be brought forward in the House of Commons. I quite admit that the hon. Member had a better idea of what was coming than I did, and I quite admit that if I had known that we were so near raising a question of this kind I should not have remained so silent as I did in replying to his speeches. At the same time, my silence could not be construed as any attempt to minimise so important a question, nor could it in any way be described as coquetting with Home Rule. I do not wish to occupy the time of the House further. As I have said before, the attitude of the House and the manner in which the Debate has been carried on appear to me conclusive of the fact that this was a parade and a sham, a mere form, and that the question has been brought forward in a perfunctory way with the view of making a show. I believe it is unnecessary to discuss this question, and that those who appear now to support Home Rule know that if they left other questions out of sight at the Election their chances of return at the Election would be slight indeed.

(9.5.) COLONEL JOHN P. NOLAN (Galway, N.): I myself do not look on the Amendment as a sham. I look upon the Amendment as brought forward by my hon. Friend with very considerable ability for a specific purpose. The hon. Member for Preston, of course, was only joking when he said the Parnellite Members were not anxious for Home Rule. The hon. Member for Waterford defined what he meant by Home Rule, and it seems almost useless for any other Member of the Irish Party to do so until the questions he put to the front Opposition bench have been answered. They are plain and simple questions, and I think it is absolutely necessary that they should receive a reply. I should say that this Amendment is not a sham, but a very real Amendment. This Amendment is really a reversion to the days of Mr. Butt. In the days of Mr. Butt we Irish Members were in the habit of bringing forward what have been called entitative or undefined motions for Home Rule. We used to make an almost annual motion in favour of Home Rule, and we succeeded in getting from about 6 to 20 Members to vote for us. We used to have a majority of Irish Members—very likely not more than a bare majority, but we had a majority always, and we succeeded in getting from 6 to 20 English Members to vote with us. In those times I think it was very good tactics to bring forward an undefined Motion, and the usual form of our Motion was that this House do resolve itself into a Committee to consider the Relations between England and Ireland. Mr. Parnell quite abandoned these tactics. He would not bring forward any Resolution in the House. He thought it was perfectly useless to ascertain how many English Members would vote for us. He threw that plan to the winds, and he brought pressure to bear upon the great English parties until Lord Carnarvon very nearly took up the question; and, finally, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian took it up and made it a great Party question. Then it was put to the House and a vote taken on it, but at that time it went against us. Of course the Liberal Party could not stand against the opposition of the Duke of Devonshire, Mr. John Bright, and many other very distinguished men. The verdict was temporarily given against us, but I believe that if the Irish Party only stood united in November last year they would now be going to the General Election with an absolute certainty of winning it. This Amendment is introduced as an undefined Amendment, almost an illusory Amendment. It is a declaration for Home Rule, and if any hon. Member votes for it he must vote for something labelled Home Rule. This Amendment merely compels an hon. Member to give some sort of vote for some kind of Home Rule. I think we would have been better without this Amendment than with it, but now that it has been introduced—it is my own personal opinion—I should say we ought to vote for it just as we ought to vote for any pronouncement in favour of Home Rule. But I do not think it is a judicious one. I think it is rather letting people out of their pledges in place of binding them more closely to their pledges. That is the reason I consider the Amendment to be an injudicious one except so far as it gave an opportunity to my hon. Friend the Member for Waterford to address those very pointed interrogatories to the Front Opposition Bench. At the last General Election and afterwards there was a sort of compact or treaty that we were to get the old Home Rule Bill or something better. That was the position up to November last year. Then according to the proposals made to Mr. Parnell it was agreed that a certain number of Irish Members should stay in Parliament—34 was the number mentioned. This matter is a matter for the most urgent and immediate attention. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle spoke about that the other night. He said we must have the Irish Members remaining in the English House of Commons. That is the only modification of the old Bill that has been stated by the Front Opposition Bench. I have not the slightest objection to the whole of the Irish Members staying here when we have a Home Rule Government. If they stay here, they will keep their power here, and any power we get in Ireland will be something to the good. But, on the other hand, if some power is to be taken away from the Irish Parliament because a certain number of Irish Members stay here, it becomes a matter of the most vital importance, as Mr. Parnell pointed out, how many Irish Members stay here. Now, 34 is about one-third of the present Irish representation. It is said that because the Irish Members would be able to vote on Imperial Motions as well as on English and Scotch Motions in the House of Commons, their number should be reduced to one-third; but really that is an absurdity. I do not think that 34 Irish Members now vote upon every question in the House of Commons, and that number would not have as much power as three times the number now has on strictly Imperial questions; and, consequently, to reduce the number of Irish Members is simply to reduce the powers of the Irish Members. It would be 34 Members instead of 103, and it would be a serious question indeed if the Laws that were made in Dublin were all to be revised in the House of Commons, and if only 34 Irish Members were here, either directly to support these propositions or indirectly to influence Ministers by voting for or against them on foreign questions. It is quite a different matter having no Irish Members here at all. If there were no Irish Members here the Government would then have to consider Ireland as it now considers Canada or Australia. I have some fault to find with the Amendment of the hon. Member for West Belfast for its vagueness, after the public declarations that the Irish Members were to be reduced to 34 made by various English speakers. The hon. Member for West Belfast said very little indeed about Home Rule. The reason was very simple. He is not only a great orator but a great tactician; and he saw the embarrassment it would cause to his friends on the Front Opposition Bench. The right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench do not desire to state what sort of Home Rule they are in favour of now. They say this is a great tactical advantage to keep it a secret, but I fail to see where is the tactical advantage. You want either to humbug the Irish voters by afterwards giving us less than we expected, or to humbug the English voters by giving us more than we expected. The hon. Member for Waterford has pointed out to the Front Opposition Bench how frequently he has tried to elicit the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian and others on this subject, and how the Irish Members of all Parties went last November to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, and almost went on their knees to ask him to say something on the subject of Home Rule, and without any result; and what can be the tactical advantage of it? I do not believe much in that theory that Home Rule will be discovered at the right time, and I do very much fear that the Irish voters in Ireland may not have the proper means of making up their minds on this subject at the General Election. The Irish voters were very moderate on this question. The Irish voters in England are men who have to a great extent adopted a new country and formed new ties—some for Liberals and some for Conservatives. A good many of them have formed local ties. If the Irish Members unanimously called upon them, as they did once or twice, for their support to enable Ireland to get a real measure of Home Rule, there can be no doubt that a very large number of these gentlemen would throw up their local ties and go for Home Rule. But how can they call upon them to do so when we do not know what the Home Rule is to be? The right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench could make it clear in one sentence. They might also make it a broad question and push it forward strenuously. What the Liberal Party are going to do when they get into power is, I consider, almost of as great importance as the question of what Home Rule is to be. The occupants of the Front Opposition Bench might very well say, "If you want a very small Home Rule Bill we will get it through Parliament; but if you want a very big one we will get it through the House of Commons all right, but it will be stopped in the House of Lords." I believe that is what will happen next Session. Then the Liberal Party might turn round to the Irish Members and say: "We must go on with our English Measures now." What we want is a large and sufficient Measure of Home Rule to be pushed through tenaciously and sent up to the House of Lords; and if they do not assent to it, then we should either bring in a Bill to abolish the House of Lords or declare a Dissolution. That would be the only way of taking the verdict of the electors on the particular Home Rule Bill that is needed. Lord Salisbury has threatened that he would use his influence with the House of Lords to throw out a Home Rule Bill out of the Lords unless the principles of it were first stated. Well, I think that is a challenge. I do not understand after that the reticence of the leaders of the Liberal Members in not telling us broadly and simply what is meant by Home Rule for Ireland. Curiously enough, in this Amendment a reference to a particular Land Bill has been mixed up in a very intricate fashion with the general Home Rule Question, so that it is very difficult to disentangle it. If I vote for this Amendment, which I intend to do, and I think the Irish Members ought to do, it must be clearly understood that I do not agree to vote for the last half of it. It simply means this: that the hon. Member for West Belfast is so clever that he is able to tie a knot up I cannot disentangle. What the hon. Member said with reference to the Land Purchase Act is, I think, inconvenient. What Mr. Parnell said was very simple. We did think the Bill of last year was a very good one. We would have liked to change many points in it, but what was got by that Bill would not have been got but for Mr. Parnell—for I daresay Members would have managed to throw it out, but we brought them into the Lobby with us. They could not stand out, and so we got a credit for £40,000,000 or £50,000,000. A large number of Members objected to this pledging of English credit; but what Mr. Parnell knew was that, after he got a credit for £40,000,000 or £50,000,000 opened, it would be very difficult to close it. But it is very difficult to get money voted. Here was an opportunity, however, for doing so; and, although the Radicals might give us something considerable in the way of Home Rule, they would never have given a credit for £40,000,000 or £50,000,000. Mr. Parnell was most anxious to get this credit opened; not that he approved of the general details of the Bill. I have no private information as to his views—only his public utterances; but all his speeches were directed to getting this credit opened. Afterwards a new Parliament might bring in any measures to increase the advantages to the tenants. I think it is a little premature to say whether the Bill is good or bad. I attach very little importance to any views on that subject at this stage of the proceedings. The hon. Member for West Belfast has brought forward an absolutely indefinite Motion with regard to Home Rule. Anyone who likes may say, after the Division, I voted for a Home Rule proposal, but if he were asked "Which did you vote for—Parnell's Bill, or what particular kind of Home Rule," he could say, "Oh! that was not in the Amendment." If the desire was to get a large vote, then this was a lever Amendment, but I do not see any object in a large vote. I think it a pity to have drawn up an Amendment with such vagueness. There is still ample time for the Front Bench men to set this latter right. They can make a perfectlyappy family by simply getting up and defining Home Rule, and say that when he Liberals take up the measure, they mean to push it right through without giving way to any other measure. The Arnellite Party as we are called—we do not repudiate the name; I would possibly call it the Parliamentary or Nationalist Party—are not indifferent to Home rule. But we want precision; we want to know what we are to ask the Irish people to vote for. We ought with politeness, but humility, to ask gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench to throw a little light upon this subject—a little glimmer as to their course of action in the next Parliament. What are to be the principles we are to vote for, and what the application of the principles? I hope every Irish Member will join in that entreaty.

Mr. William E. M. Tomlinson

Colonel John P. Nolan

*(9.35.) MR. WEBB (West Waterford): An hon. Member opposite said there was a great want of reality in the Debate, and it is also said that Home Rule is dead. I do not agree with either assertion. Somehow Home Rule is always coming up. We are only at the commencement of the Session, and yet there is not a day the question has not been brought forward. An hon. Member brought the charge that we were inclined to be disingenuous regarding Home Rule, and that while using one language here we used a different language in Ireland. It appears no use saying over and over again what we are not afraid to say in Ireland as here, that in the matter of protective duties, or the Army or Navy, or questions of that kind, we do not desire to have any power under our Home Rule Bill. The hon. Member also made a charge that our Liberal friends did not vote with us always on Irish questions. That does not show want of sincerity, and it is quite a different thing from desiring to give us liberty to settle our own affairs. But we cannot leave out of notice the speech of the Prime Minister. It has been said the tendency of the majority in Ireland is backward; that all that is progressive in Ireland and all that is enlightened is in the minority. The majority might say something very unpleasant of the minority, but we do not desire to make disparaging comparisons. Our desire is to try and elevate every Party in Ireland. We desire, also, that the minority should be strong and respected. We do not want to pull down, but to raise up. The whole object of this Parliament for ages was to degrade and pull down the majority, and it is only within recent years that they have emerged out of that attempted state of degradation. That they are not permanently degraded is due to their own innate qualities and powers. To say that the majority are unprogressive is contrary to the truth. Anyone who has travelled in Ireland must have seen the beautiful churches and institutions which these unprogressive and unenlightened people have raised. If a visitor to Ireland asked me to bring him to any similar institutions founded by the minority, I would have difficulty in finding them out. There are other institutions in Dublin of the same kind, such as the Hospital for the Dying. In Cork you find the same thing. Some of the great institutions there, such as the Institution for the Blind and the Institution of the Good Shepherd, are of the same class. Surely these are not the institutions of a backward or uncivilised people. In England, great country as it is, are there any institutions to compare with the institution of the Christian Brothers in Ireland? When education was banned in Ireland, after the people were only beginning to rise by the exertions of the Irish Parliament from the depths of ignorance to which you consigned them, the institution of Christian Brothers was founded and took up the work, and made exertions when there was no other popular educational institution in the country. There are now some 700 of these men who devote the whole of their lives, for nothing but the poorest living, to the toil of teaching the young, without hope of rising to higher positions such as is given to most men in other walks of life. I am quite unable to understand how any man with any knowledge of Ireland can attribute backwardness and ignorance to the majority of the Irish people when such qualities are found among them. We have a Corporation in Dublin elected by this retrogressive and backward people. Just in proportion as the backward majority obtained power in the election, matters municipal were placed upon a right footing ; and now Dublin possesses the best water supply perhaps to be found in any city in the United Kingdom. That was due entirely to the efforts of the majority as against the wishes of the minority. Every effort that has been made for good in Ireland in the present century has received the support of this backward and unprogressive majority, and has been opposed by the highly enlightened and civilised minority. When you wanted to reform the Corporations, to put an end to the infamous system of tithes, and to dis-establish the Irish Church, it was not to the enlightened minority you appealed, but to the unprogressive and backward majority. I know for myself, having taken an active part in politics in Dublin for some time, that the only time I saw a meeting broken up with brickbats and stones was when some Protestants held a meeting in favour of Disestablishment, and it was broken up by other Protestants opposed to Disestablishment. I am prevented from going as fully as I could wish into the real character and conduct which sometimes disgraces the minority in Ireland ; but I will not be thought unfair or out of order if, Mr. Speaker, I refer to the Belfast riots. There never was such a state of things as arose in these riots ; and that was not the work of the unenlightened majority, but of the highly educated and enlightened minority, who arrogate to themselves all the virtues. If I wanted to give a test by which to judge the spirit of the minority as compared with that of the majority, I would refer hon. Members to the song books of each Party. Let any man here who wants to know the real spirit of the minority in its purest form in Belfast buy a minority song book, and they will there see the sentiments of this enlightened minority, and let him buy a song book of the unenlightened majority, and contrast the spirit of the two. He will find in one a feeling of hatred and bitterness, and in the other nothing but a desire for union and kindly feeling. It is true that the majority did not always entertain this feeling. We would be more than human if we had not felt bitterly at one time towards this country who so cruelly oppressed us. But my own belief is, from what I know of the Irish people, that they have quite as much of the civic virtues in their hearts — the very poorest of them—as the rich and wealthy have. I find, in moving among all classes of them—that there is a much more Christian spirit among the poor than among the rich—among that poor who are so much sought to be despised. It is quite possible that, as between the minority and majority, the paths of civilisation may run in different lines, but I firmly believe both are progressing. I believe that if the power were taken out of the hands of the minority, both sections would come to be on the best possible terms. A few years ago, when it was said that the Conservative Party were coqueting with us in this House, I visited a manufacturer in the North of Ireland. He was then in the best spirits regarding us and our people, and gave us the best character, both Catholics and Protestants. But now that there is a possibility of throwing us off they look upon us differently ; and I heard that same man lately, when asked what he was doing with his Catholic workpeople, say, "Oh ! he was quietly weeding them out." That is what we fear will continue until the Catholic majority get upon more level terms with the minority. We are asked what could an Irish Parliament do better for us than the English Parliament can do ? Well, I might answer, in what respect could any hon. Gentleman opposite manage my house as well as I can manage it ; or how could this Government manage the affairs of France better than the Government chosen by the people of France ? The Member for West Birmingham said that one of the difficulties he and his Party were now placed in was that now there were two Parties amongst us, and they did not know who they were dealing with, whereas before they could have dealt with Mr. Parnell. It appears to me that you will now have a much more solid ground to go upon in the knowledge of the real opinions of those whom you are dealing with, because, after the next General Election, you will have the real opinions of the Irish people, each constituency giving its own. Then you will not be able to say that, in accepting whatever Home Rule we may accept, it is being accepted on the fiat of one man. I shall only add one word more, and it is s : that I do think, when one Party ers upon a course that brings it to position of criticising its best friends receiving the cheers of its worst mies, that Party can hardly be adopt-its proper course.

Mr. Webb

9.55.) COLONEL SAUNDERSON : , I should not wish that the bate on the Address should terminate hout some expression of the great ef felt, I believe, universally in Ireland the affliction that has befallen the yal Family. The Irish people, with their faults, are a warm-hearted ople, ready to enter into the joys and rows of those they know and like ; d the Duke of Clarence went the right y about acquiring the sympathies of e Irish people. He came over and ed in the country ; and we had the aching letter from the Prince of Wales the Lord Mayor of Dublin that he was ry happy there. And the Irish people tered into the happy and auspicious ent that promised to crown his life ith gladness ; and when the tragic ent occurred which cut off his young ie, it struck a sad chord in the Irish art. I hope it will be a solace to Her lajesty and to the Prince and Princess f Wales to realise that their sorrow is ared by, I believe, the great majority f the Irish people. Now, I would y a few words with regard to the mendment you are now considering nd to the speech of the hon.
Member for West Belfast. The Amendment would, I think, have served its pur-ose well had it not been for the fact hat behind the hon. Member for West Belfast sat the hon. Member for Water-ord. The Amendment undoubtedly aised a question of the very highest importance. It is to this effect : That the British Parliament, having tried every method to satisfy the wants and requirements of the Irish people, and, having ailed, had better give up the hopeless ask ; and then it went on to criticise a Bill which we passed last year. Now, I ould ask any fair man which part of this Amendment was the most important ? To consider a Bill which we passed last year, which received the sanction of the then Leader of what was then a united Party, or to consider whether Ireland is to be dissociated for ever from British Parliamentary control ? I wonder that the hon. Member for West Belfast did not see he laid himself open to this objection, that he ignored the important and vital part of his Amendment. He spent twenty minutes of his speech in attacking the language of the Prime Minister, which he said was insulting to the nation. However strong and objectionable to the Irish Members that language might have been, it is mildness itself compared with the language which hon. Gentlemen have recently used about each other. The hon. Member for West Belfast said very few words about the main or Home Rule portion of his Amendment, and I do not think he occupied four minutes by the clock in his observations about Home Rule. Yet his whole contention is that as the House has failed in the past in dealing with Irish questions, including the question of Land Purchase, Home Rule ought to be granted. The hon. Member, in the matter of Home Rule, occupies a very critical and a very delicate position. He does not like to say anything to embarrass his friends on the Front Opposition Bench. He appears to me to occupy the position of a Nationalist waiter attending to the commands of his friends above the Gangway. That may answer the purpose of the Liberal Party and his Liberal friends, but he makes a grand mistake if he thinks that a course of that kind will ever secure a great following in Ireland. We had a speech from the hon. Member for Waterford of a very different kind. The hon. Member, with whom I entirely disagree, whom I am ready to oppose in this, and do my best to oppose by all means in Ireland, is at any rate a foeman worthy of any man's steel. He puts forward something to hit at. He is not an oratorical eel that comes in as the hon. Member for West Belfast did on Home Rule and steps out on Land Purchase. The hon. Member for Waterford raised this Debate from the position into which it had been degraded by the Committee speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton and the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast to its proper level of a Government Debate, before a General Election, brought forward in this House with the object of centreing the opinion and attention of the British people on one of the greatest questions that they have ever had to consider. We learned from the hon. Member for Waterford exactly what his idea of Home Rule is. I believe his views are shared by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway and the whole of his Party, and from what the hon. Member for Waterford said, and from the reception his speech met with from his present friends and former allies, we must conclude that his definition of Home Rule is a definition which accords with the views and which had the general assent of the majority of the Gentlemen sitting opposite. His idea is, so far as I can make out, that this Parliament is to retain supremacy. I must say it is an Irish supremacy, because it is a supremacy that consists in this, that the Irish Members in full force shall have the power of coming over here to London to sit in this Assembly and to assist in directing the course of British Imperial affairs, whereas the British Parliament shall not have any authority whatever to interfere in Irish affairs. That is not my idea of reciprocity. Still I am glad to have the authoritative definition from a united party on the subject of Home Rule, because we have had no authoritative opinion from the Front Opposition Bench. I do not believe it exists. The Home Rule of the Front Opposition Bench depends altogether upon the state of parties after the next General Election. We know by the answers of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton that his mind is affected by the volume of opinion coming from the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. He gave us every intimation of the reasons why he became a Home Ruler, and apparently it was because he disapproved of the arrangement of the borough boundaries of Dublin. As regards the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, he has laid it down as his final opinion that he will never accept Fenian Home Rule. He has not defined what Fenian Home Rule means, and if a large and united Nationalist Party in the next Parliament sit below the Gangway, and he finds himself in the position of leader of the Party that has not a sufficient backing in England and Scotland and Wales, the word Fenian will become a very elastic term. Now, Sir, it is said you are to grant Home Rule not because Ireland is a country tyrannized over, ground down beneath the heel of the Saxon, but forsooth because the Irish people have not swallowed the Land Purchase Bill with sufficient avidity. I thought the hon. Member for West Belfast would have supplied us with some more sufficient reason than that for dismembering the Empire. But it was simply and solely because enough money had not been advanced to the Irish people under the Land Acts that the hon. Member for West Belfast justified his demand for Home Rule. I am sorry the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant for Ireland is not here, because I wanted to give him a bit of advice. It is the greatest possible mistake to quote from any speech of any Gentleman opposite unless you have the quotation in your hand. I have always come down to the House to make a speech on the Irish Question with a considerable sheaf of paper in my hands. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, thinking it was my speech, have called out "Read, read!" But it was not my speech; it was elegant extracts from the speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite. When my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary said that hon. Gentlemen opposite had interfered with Land Purchase by asking the Irish tenants not to buy, the hon. Member for North Longford interrupted him in an almost violent manner, and said, "No, no"; "Quote, quote." My right hon. Friend, not having sufficient experience, had not the quotation by him. But here it is. On the 28th February the Member for North Longford said:—

Colonel Saunderson

"The farmer who bought his land to-day could, when a Home Rule Parliament was in three or four years' time, be very sorry he had been in such a hurry."

do not suppose the hon. Gentleman will say that that was not inducing the rich tenants not to buy their farms.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) : And mighty good advice too.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON : That may be, but the House will now understand now it is that the Irish tenants have held somewhat aloof from taking advantage of the Land Purchase Act.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Will you read me the context of my speech?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON : If I had read all the speeches of the hon. Member I would never have done. The hon. Gentleman has not spoken, and we can give us the whole passage. Therefore, Sir, I was going to say that if the Land Purchase Act has not gone down with that rapidity which some of its supporters hoped, one of the reasons is that the chosen and trusted leaders of the Irish people have advised Irish tenants over and over again to refrain from purchasing under the Act, and to wait for better times, when they will get their land, as they were told by the hon. Member himself, at prairie value. Sir, the test by which the Irish policy of the Unionist Government is to be tried is not the test of the success of one measure, such as the Irish Land Purchase Act, but the test of the success of their whole policy during the last six years; and in order to test that policy it is absolutely necessary for us to consider what was the task that the Unionist Government undertook, and whether they have completed that task with success. We undertook to govern Ireland under the laws of this Imperial Parliament, and to make Ireland a peaceful and prosperous country, and the record of the last six years proves conclusively that we have succeeded in our task. It is the duty of any speaker on the opposite side to show to the House and the country that the Unionist Party have failed in this great task. The hon Member for West Belfast never even attempted to do so. All he said was that the population of Ireland had largely decreased since the Union. I believe it has; but I venture to maintain that 5,000,000 of well-to-do and thriving Irishmen are far better than 8,000,000 of Irish paupers. The present Irish population is ten times more wealthy than Irishmen were at the time of the Union, and the commercial prosperity of the country has steadily advanced. Take the savings banks, and you will find that the capital of the Irish people has rapidly increased. Take the joint-stock banks, the commercial returns, the trams, and you will find all along the line—

MR. T. M. HEALY : Which line?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON : All along the Irish line—that prosperity has steadily increased. Then take the question of the condition of the country. When the Unionist Party, a few years ago, undertook the task of governing Ireland, they were met with difficulties which had never been experienced by any British Government before. Never before in the history of this country had a British Government found itself confronted by those who opposed the law of the land in Ireland, and by right hon. Gentlemen opposite, who had been themselves responsible for maintaining the law, and who deliberately banded themselves with the opponents of the law in Ireland against the Government. It was said, if you pass a Coercion Bill, you will force crime under the surface; but the condition of Ireland at present, so far as crime is concerned, compares favourably with her condition at any previous period. Five years ago there were 5,000 persons boycotted, but now there are none; and, from every point of view, that is one of the greatest triumphs achieved by the Unionist Party. This is the only Session for many years past when we have met without some Irish Member being in gaol.

MR. T. M. HEALY : There is one English Member in gaol. (Cries of "De Cobain," and "Hastings!")

COLONEL SAUNDERSON : I think it will be found that Irish Members in future will be very shy of appealing to British sympathy by undergoing intermittent periods of incarceration and retirement. The arrangement was this: Hon. Members opposite, having fairly stated their intentions, went over to Ireland and defied the law, and were put in gaol, and they appealed from their prisons to the sympathies of the British people, some with clothes and some without them. And then their Saxon sympathisers, not willing to allow them to suffer alone, came over and shared their fate. Even distant Cornwall sent us a martyr from Camborne, and he appealed to the British people, but found to his surprise that he could not elicit the sympathy he had expected. Apparently, the opinion of the British people was that when he was in prison picking oakum he was engaged for the first time in his life in a really useful and interesting occupation. The right hon. Member for Newcastle was stirred in his soul by the condition of the hon. Member for North-East Cork when he refused to use those clothes to which I have referred, and the right hon. Gentleman said he was "a spectacle to the civilised world." Right hon. Gentlemen opposite, not having a sense of humour, failed to see the comic side of the question which the British people perceived. I venture to say that the Member for Mayo and the Member for North-East Cork have learned a lesson by their recent incarceration which they will never forget. They went to gaol as they have been in the habit of doing periodically, but the British people absolutely forgot their existence; and, wonderful to relate, after all their manifold sufferings, there is hardly at the present moment a county in the South and West of Ireland which they can visit without police protection. The game is not worth the candle, for martyrdom is no longer a trump card. Eviction was a trump card which was played with great success in those "Remember Mitchelstown" days. But eviction failed to elicit the sympathies of the British people, because they found out that those unfortunate Irish tenants were evicted not because they could not pay their rents, but because they would not pay their rents, and would not pay their rents because they dared not when they were ordered not to do so by the Member for Mayo and his friends. The eviction sham failed, and what about the coercion sham? There never was a greater sham played out in this country. There is just as much coercion now as there was two years ago, but we have no flights of English Members coming over to Ireland, and returning to England to make violent speeches on English platforms detailing their horrible experiences of the reign of "Bloody Balfour." I am a subscriber to United Ireland, but I see nothing in it now about "Bloody Balfour"; nor have I seen in the paper of the other Party any allusion to "Sanguinary Jackson." It must be a consolation to the Leader of the House to see that the violent vituperation which was learned by those on the other side at his expense, and which was developed to heights to which no Irishman ever attained before, is now entirely devoted by them to describing the moral enormities and political turpitude of each other. All these shams have been exposed, and cannot again be made use of in this country. What is the next sham? I imagine it will be Home Rule, and I expect that opinion is shared by hon. Gentlemen opposite of both Parties; for I have observed in the speeches of the Parties to which the Member for Belfast and the Member for Waterford respectively belong certain grave doubts expressed as to the reality of the Home Rule of the right hon. Member for Derby and the right hon. Member for Newcastle. What failure is there in Ireland? It is peaceful, and crime has disappeared. The National League, which we were told was too strong for the law, has practically ceased to exist, and lies shattered and dis-

red in the dust. What about the Campaign, which was to destroy efforts to maintain law and order? What has happened in Newary, which was to have been the polis of regenerated Ireland? I saw her day that the O'Brien Arcade, magnificent structure of which we so much—the culminating point of nationalist architecture—had ceased to be the property of the hon. Gentleman opposite, and become the property of the hon. Member for South Hunts. I ventured to my hon. Friend that he would for ever retain the O'Brien Arcade in its integrity, and outside it a statue of the Member for North-Cork in his Tullamore clothes. If statesman was so handed down to generations they would know Ireland would have been and what ates would have looked like if the Campaign had succeeded. While is a laughable side to these questions there is also a tragic side to them; is the side of the tenants who were ill and betrayed by the hon. Member for Mayo and his friends. It is difficult to cuse the course pursued by those states; but yet there is one great excuse, for the men they had learned to and to obey had promised that if refused to pay their rents they would never be the losers. But what then the result? I have in my hand result of this arrangement between Members opposite and their uny dupes, who are now starving on roadside. It appears that the total from the 1st of August to the 31st December, 1891, to the "wounded ones" and those isolated tenants who abandoned by the National League, amounted to £11,456 1s. 2d. The hon. Member for Mayo stated that there were 5 evicted families, numbering 7,500, at the present moment on the s of the Federation. If we divide 456 by 1,495, we arrive at the fact for five months £1 10s. 8d. per month, or 7s. 8d. per week, has been for the support of each family, or, in other words, 2½d. a day per head for those who obeyed the hon. Members site.

R. DILLON: That is more than half of the landlords have given.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: For that interruption I am very glad; it is by the hon. Member for Mayo who makes an assertion which he cannot prove. I have quoted from his own accounts, published in his own newspaper, and the result is that these miserable tenants who obeyed him and forsook their homes in which they had lived in happiness and peace all their lives are living on a pittance of 2½d. a day. I would like to know what those men would have said if the hon. Members had gone down to Tipperary and said that they would give them 2½d. a day to leave their homes. The crowning feat of all is, that these poor men, having found that they had been betrayed and made fools of, have gone back, and have refused to give up their shanties at the assurances of the hon. Members. Never has the policy of a Government during six years triumphed more gloriously than this Government along a more difficult line. And yet we are to give up all this and grant Home Rule. Whose Home Rule? In my early days there was only one Ireland. Then it was discovered that there were two Irelands—law-abiding Ireland and criminal Ireland—that was the discovery of the hon. Member for Bridgeton. Then came the Union of Hearts, that political espousal, and as a result there was an increase in the Irish family. There are now three Irelands—loyal Ireland, disloyal Ireland, and the priests' Ireland to which the hon. Member for West Belfast belongs. And then we have Parnellite Ireland, to which the hon. Member for Waterford belongs.

DR. TANNER: Kept by the Tories.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Can any right hon. Gentleman opposite, who hopes some day to occupy a responsible position in the country, really conceive that he can possibly frame a Home Rule Bill which would satisfy all the demands of all the various sections now fighting for the mastery in Ireland; it passes the wit of man. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, however, do agree on one point—and it is the only one in the world on which they do agree—that they must have the control of the police. I do not at all wonder at it. I will give an illustration from a speech made the other day at the Waterford Election; it gives a forecast of what Home Rule would be. It is part of a speech made by the hon. Member for North-East Cork. He says:—

"On Friday night Dr. Fitzgerald announced publicly in Dublin that if we came down here to Waterford we would be mained and wounded for the crime of addressing our fellow-countrymen."

MR. J. G. FITZGERALD: I never made such a speech; I never had any intention to main or wound the hon. Gentlemen. They must have taken some body else for me.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: I never said it was the hon. Gentleman; I was merely quoting from the Freeman's Journal part of a speech by the hon. Member for North-East Cork. I will leave the hon. Gentleman to settle with his late colleagues as to who Dr. Fitzgerald is. The hon. Member for North-East Cork went on to say:—

"The Police Authorities had full notice of that intention to murderously assault us here to-day. To-day, instead of seeing fair play they have batoned our men and given every opportunity that men could give to other men to murder and assault us in the streets of Waterford. But the day will come, please God, when the Irish people will have command of their own police."

Now, Sir, what did that mean? It meant that the hon. Member for North-East Cork was looking forward to the happy day when he would have command of the Irish Police. I wonder what the Member for Waterford will think of that? I believe that the Irish Constabulary—whose chief occupation of late has been to protect hon. Members when visiting their own constituencies—is a safer force to have to deal with than this Praetorian guard which hon. Members opposite hope to conjure up when they get Home Rule. A Home Rule Parliament, Home Rule Judges, Home Rule juries, and Home Rule police will indeed make Ireland a happy land. Will any man who has thought dispassionately on these matters consent for a single moment to place his life, the lives of his family, and his property at the disposal of such a combination? The section of the Irish people I represent—which includes many Roman Catholics—would never sanction it. We have no religious rancour amongst us in Ireland at present, and I challenge hon. Members opposite to point to one sentence that I or my friends have uttered which tended to religious animosity; but is there anyone who blames us when we declare our intention to resist to the utmost such a state of affairs. At the Waterford election—I now allude to Tannerism—the hon. Member for North-East Cork would have been absolutely skinned by the Tanners if he had not escaped under the protection of the police. I can assert that whatever the exigencies of British parties may demand, whatever politics they may choose to adopt, we, constituting a very large and very powerful section of the Irish people, will never consent for one moment to obey such an authority. And this is the policy that hon. Gentlemen propose to go to the country with. To bring in a Home Rule Bill, which they dare not define, to satisfy the Irish people, which although they hate all Britons, hate each other more. To produce a Home Rule Bill that will satisfy and bring peace to Ireland is a task beyond even the wit of the right hon. Member for Midlothian. I hope that the majority of the House will reject this Amendment, and that the rejection will foreshadow the rejection of this policy at the next election; that as the House refuses to admit that the British Parliament is unable to maintain the law and satisfy the requirements of Ireland, the British people at the next election will re-echo our decision, and decide that the policy of Great Britain in the future shall be that Ireland shall remain under the authority of the British Parliament.

Colonel Saunderson

(10.55.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I have seldom listened to a speech with more satisfaction than that just delivered by the hon. and gallant Gentleman. I hope we may have a few more such speeches from Members of the Orange Party, because the effect on these Benches will be most salutary, and the more the hon. and gallant Gentleman rubs in the salt and dwells on the differences which exist in Ireland between the various sections of the Nationalist Party the better for Home Rule. I think, however, if the hon. and gallant Gentleman is going to play the Tory game, that is hardly the policy to pursue. I think the policy of the First Lord of the Treasury would be not to offer insults to both sections of the Irish Party. In the language of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, we are all "in one red burial blent." I may tell the hon. and gallant Gentleman that if he has his sport against us to night—sport which we can always appreciate—our time is shortly coming ; the Local Government Bill is about to be introduced. We hear a great deal about the details of the Home Rule Bill ; why does not the hon. and gallant Gentleman ask for details of the Local Government Bill ? How ardently he longs for that Bill, how fully he believes in it, how the Orange drum will be beaten at all the cross-roads in Ulster to the glory of the First Lord of the Treasury. We have our troubles and trials which it is not for me to seek to minimise, but I will not consent to make the differences which exist between myself and my late colleagues the sport of the British Philistines in the British House of Commons.

MR. P. O'BRIEN : That is what you did when you killed Parnell.

MR. T. M. HEALY : The hon. and gallant Gentleman is now much amused at the downcast and fallen condition of Ireland, but she will rise like the Phoenix from the ashes, as she has done many a time before—after '98, '48, and '68, and only the epitaph of the First Lord of the Treasury remains to be written on the Irish tomb. Unless the Irish question is settled by statesmen who have some conception of its magnitude you will find some haunting form hovering round which will yet crush you. At any rate, Sir, the worst medicine from the Tory point of view is to pour poison and gall into the wounds, and I can retort that those who have heard the speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman have some conception of what we have to stand in Ireland. It is, no doubt, great sport to hon. Gentlemen upon the other side of the House to hear the sentiments uttered on behalf of a class of men in Ireland who, by your decisions in your Judicial Land Courts in Ireland, have been robbing and slandering the Irish people for centuries and generations. Search your Blue Books dealing with Ireland, and you will find in them the record of your robberies. Your accusation against us is that we—the sons of a people having a Government and powerful Empire to contend against, and in an entrenched camp of the enemy—have not wholly succeeded in the task we have taken up. No, Sir ; it is true that we have not succeeded—as yet ; but we have not yet done, and we feel that, whatever be the dissensions which at present exist amongst the Irish Members, the healing hand of time will come to repair them, and that Members who have borne no part in the dissensions and tribulations of this time will carry forward the Green Flag of the country. I hope that the speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman to which we have listened to-night will be printed verbatim in every National newspaper in Ireland, and I hope that his words will be read in every home in Ireland, and I believe it will do good ; the rancour he has expressed on behalf of the landlord minority as his contribution towards the settlement of the Irish question will, I think, go far to bring about a settlement of the difficulties that now exist in the Irish ranks. I pass from that, and I ask what is the material upon which the hon. and gallant Gentleman depends ? He wants to know what kind of Home Rule we are going to have. What, he asks, is the kind of Home Rule that the Liberal Party intend to put forward ? He asks. Are we going to have "Popkin's Plan" ; is it going to be Canadian Home Rule, or the Home Rule of Parnell ; or that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby ? The hon. and gallant Gentleman said you cannot satisfy everybody, and therefore he argues that you ought to try and satisfy nobody. I must compliment the hon. and gallant Gentleman upon the speech he has made here to-night. For my part I do not intend to give hon. Members opposite anything to hit at. I do not know whether the hon. and gallant Gentleman has ever heard of the remarks of a French general—"My children, you have come here to kill others, and not to get killed yourselves." Therefore, when the hon. and gallant Member opposite compliments the hon. Member for Waterford upon his speech, I begin to think that there is something in it that should be avoided. So far as I am concerned I do not intend to play the Tory game. We may be told that there are differences, and that on this question of Home Rule for Ireland, English statesmen differ among themselves, and differ from Irish statesmen, and that Irishmen differ amongst themselves ; that some say there is one way of conducting a campaign and some another. I do not pretend to make people comprehend this Home Rule Question; I do not attempt upon this occasion to teach my grandmother to suck eggs. Those who have to deal with it have a difficult question—a great and weighty task before them. But we shall have to be reckoned with in the settlement as we have had to be reckoned with before, and for my part I say that I see no reason to shake my confidence in the Liberal Party. I believe in the honesty of its intentions, and I have read no declarations by any Liberal statesman regarding the Home Rule Bill to change my mind from that day in 1886, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian made his statement upon that measure. So far as my judgment goes I think the English people, instead of showing themselves to be little-minded, have shown the greatest magnanimity in this matter. I have not hesitated to say it in Ireland, and I do not see why I should hesitate to say it here. My judgment is that "too many cooks spoil the broth," and that if we were content to follow the policy adopted from 1885 to 1891 by a united Irish Party, after the next General Election it would be possible to pass a Bill which will satisfy the legitimate aspirations of the Irish people. There is only one other remark. The hon. and gallant Gentleman desired to show the great success of the Unionist policy; that the Irishmen "were down in the dust and ashamed to be seen," and he went on to show how the Unionists had been successful all over the country. After the tremendous chain of successes which has been achieved I should have expected the hon. and gallant Gentleman to have gone on to advise the First Lord of the Treasury to dissolve Parliament at once, and go to the country in a blaze of glory. But that is the last thing the hon. and gallant Gentleman wants; the last thing they want is to be brought face to face with their constituents, and the strang thing is that, while the Irish Members are told that they cannot go to their constituents without police protection, we are most anxious to go, and yet cannot go. The Debate has taken a wide range; but I say it has taken a very fortunate range for Her Majesty's Government. A Motion was brought forward to-night for the purpose of exposing the failure of the great plan of Irish pacification passed by the Unionist Ministry; and yet instead of considering that question straightway we started to count our chickens before they were hatched, and to discuss a Home Rule Bill which has not yet been produced in a Parliament that has not yet been elected. I think that has been a very fortunate thing for Her Majesty's Government. After the speech of the hon. Member for Mid Armagh—whose appearance in the House both sides I am sure must welcome—no person, no Tory, could deny that this great panacea for Ireland has been a miserable failure. The hon. Member called it a failure; he admitted it to be a dead failure, and proceeded to give reasons why he thought so.

MR. DUNBAR BARTON: I did not say it was a failure. I admitted that it had faults, but not that it was a failure.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That was my impression; that he had twice used the phrase, but I am sure that the hon. and learned Gentleman will now withdraw the expression if he has used it. The hon. and learned Gentleman admits that there has been failure in connection with the Bill. The hon. Member for West Belfast has been greatly blamed for bringing forward a single measure as an illustration of the necessity for Home Rule and as an illustration of the fact that the British Parliament is unable to legislate for Ireland. It is true it is a single measure, but it was brought forward as a great bulwark and buttress of the Unionist Party, and it was put forward as such, not only by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, but by Lord Salisbury and other statesmen of the Unionist Party. The Irish Members are, I contend, entitled to rely upon the failure of a measure of this kind as further proof of the inability of the English Parliament to deal with Irish questions. We know what human nature is, and know that selfishness is a very ingredient in it; and I say if this was a success, and if it had offered advantages to the Irish tenants, they would likely have taken advantage of it; it is a lie, and it matters nothing what I say three or four years ago, when we are dealing with a Bill passed last year, at happened in 1881? Never was there a more powerful organisation than Land League of those days. They led the people to test the Act then introduced before availing themselves of it; yet, no sooner was the Act passed, than 40,000 originating notices were sent in three weeks because the Irish people believed that it would be for their interest. In 1887 we had the same experience. In regard to the Act of 1881 not a single fraction of money has been advanced, nor has a single transaction taken place under it. Why is that? It certainly is not due to any speeches by the Irish Members. I maintain that the Act is a failure because the First Lord of the Treasury refused to take the advice; but not only did he refuse the Irish advice, but he refused to take advice from any quarter of the House. He was advised by Irish officials of great experience and judgment that his scheme would not work; but, of course, the right hon. Gentleman disregarded their advice. What he said was, "I am Irish by birth. I believe I know Ireland better than any Irishman." Then he went and puts in this Insurance Clause, which it is due to the memory of Mr. Hall to say was—I believe: I only speak from recollection—was opposed by quite as much as by us; so that before we were ad idem on that point, the right hon. Gentleman was distinctly told that the Irish tenants would not be exempted by 20 per cent. reduction; told him that at the time, and that turned out to be the fact. The Irish story to-night, who had the task given upon him, as the apostolic successor of the First Lord of the Treasury, to defend a Bill which, of course, he had nothing to do with framing into law, was obliged to admit the extraordinary fact, that in the first six months of the present Act no money had been paid and only £80,000 applied for, and in the first six months of the Ashbourne Act over half a million of money had been applied for on behalf of some thousands of tenants. And what was his excuse? "Oh," he said, "they are all going in for the Ashbourne money." That is exactly our case. The landlords—and I do not blame them—do not like your paper. They want your sovereigns. What is the good of the Irish Secretary telling them that his paper is as good as Consols if the landlords do not think so? Of course, it is exactly the same with the £1 notes of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, I am sure, believes that there is nothing like a £1 note. He says the financiers of the City will not take £1 notes. He says they prefer the solid metal. The Irish landlord has a great streak of the City man in him on that point. These landlords may be very dull men, on a great many points, but when you come to where their heart is—the region of their pockets—no amount of rustle of paper will fetch them. They want the ring of the money; as we say in Ireland the arragaseesh—the money down. You may praise your Land Stock as much as you please, you may flourish it before the eyes of the Irish landlords, you may rustle it into a Wagner harmony; but if the Irish landlords will not take it up, what is the good of it? That is the state of the case; your Land Stock is a drug in the market in this sense, that it is not applied for, and the people will not take it; and to tell us at once that this Stock is of great value, but that they will not have it, is to take part in more or less of a farce. Who is it that has given the most deadly blow to the Land Stock of the right hon. Gentleman? It is one of the right hon. Gentleman's own Ex-Attorneys-General—Mr. Justice Gibson—who, the other day, in having to deal with this question, gave a deadly stab to the great Act of 1891. What was his view? A landlord had been offered £18,000 in chinking sovereigns for a property in County Down by an outside land jobber—a speculator! The tenants came in and said: "We will give a great deal more; we will give you as much as the Land Commission will allow us to pay." The one was, I think, about 15, and the other about 20, years' purchase, the tenants giving five years more than this land jobber. What did Mr. Justice Gibson say? "Yes," said Mr. Justice

Mr. T. M. Healy

Gibson, "you will give it in stock that is below par." Well, I think that was a very shrewd thrust at the measure of the right hon. Gentleman, and that is exactly what is hindering transactions. The landlords do not know the value of your stock; and I say that the Amendment of my hon. Friend is an Amendment, so far as that portion of it is concerned, which I should have thought would have been boomed by the Orange quarter opposite. The other difficulty is the difficulty about the insurance. I have no doubt that the Irish Secretary quoted me correctly; but what I had in my mind was this: that so far as the rents are concerned, you compel the Irish tenants, willy-nilly, to guarantee one another. If I spoke of insurance at all when I should have spoken of the rents it is only an error of phrase; but the idea remains, namely, the idea that one man who is an honest, thrifty tenant has to pay the piper for some other man in another portion of the county because he happens to be behind in his instalments. Well, then the other defect in the Act is the £50 limit. Now, we are at odds with some of our colleagues from Ireland as regards this matter. I do not wish to labour that point needlessly, but at any rate one effect it will have undoubtedly is that the landlords—to use a phrase used last Session—are unwilling to "chess-board" their estates. They do not want to sell them piecemeal. They want to sell them altogether or not at all. These are the reasons why your Act has been a failure. It is no pleasure to us to chronicle it as a failure. We only chronicle it as an instance of the chronic inability of this House to legislate for Ireland. If my hon. Friend, instead of taking the Land Purchase Act to hang his Amendment upon, had taken a small measure, an attenuated measure, I would be perfectly satisfied to rest the case upon it. I will take a small measure, and I am prepared upon it to rest the validity of this Amendment. Last year we passed through this House with enormous difficulty a little measure called the Drainage and Improvement of Land Act—a measure so microscopic that it escaped the observation of the hon. Member for Camberwell, who is blocker-in-ordinary to Her Majesty's Government. The effect of it was to enable judicial tenants to borrow money from the Board of Works for the drainage of their holdings. What happened? It reached the Upper House, and there every Peer of Parliament interested in Irish land came down with one accord and strangled this little Bill. I challenge any man to say that this Bill had anything contentious in it. It was taken out of the Bann Drainage Bill which the Government found themselves unable to pass; and Lord Cadogan was obliged to get up at the Table of the House of Peers and to announce that this Drainage Bill was one that he could not invite the attention of their Lordships' House to during the present Session. Well, you think yourselves able to legislate for Ireland, and you cannot pass a little Bill of this kind. Now, I say, that any Bill introduced by an Irish Member, even if you pass it with enormous time, labour, and trouble in this House, the moment it goes beyond that hall, it has the axe of the executioner levelled against it. What has happened in this House for the last 12 years? We have been keeping up the fight so far as that goes, but so far as legislative enactment goes, I can scarcely remember anything except such grafts as we have been able to make on Government Bills; but, so far as actual legislation is concerned, the whole of the Irish Party have been engaged for the last 12 years in the work of Sisyphus, bringing in Bills, laboriously rolling them up to Third Reading, and when they crossed the Lobby, finding them slain in the home of Toryism on the other side; and, therefore, so far as we are concerned, this Amendment, in instancing the Land Purchase Bill as one of the Bills proving the failure of your legislation, is only taken as a further example, because it was your most boasted measure, and my hon. Friend might just as well have rested his Amendment upon any other Bill introduced during the last twelve years. Your Land Policy, we have been told, was the great arrow in your quiver. It has failed. Your next great measure is now going to be produced. I do not know what is going to happen to that; but I am quite sure that as every Bill you have produced has been a failure, that a Bill which now has the secret antipathy of every Member of the Conservative Party for Ireland, and which you were not able to get your Conservative Association at Birmingham the other day to pass a vote in favour of, I am quite sure that that Bill may be pronounced a failure in advance. I think when we have the works and failures of the Tory Party at the present moment to attack, we have our hands full enough without having to consider the shortcomings of a Bill of a Party not yet in office. On these grounds, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is our duty to challenge the existing Administration, and deal with the next Administration according to its works. That is the policy which our Party intends to push forward. It is the policy that engaged our united support for many years, and I believe that when our work is done, or when our time comes for judgment—that, after all, must be the judgment of the country—I believe it will be found that that policy will yet produce great and salutary good for our country.

(11.35) M.R. C. W. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.): We Unionists are always asking right hon. Gentlemen opposite to produce their Home Rule Bill. We say in effect, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has said, if you expect to come into Office, say within twelve months, with a vast majority at your back, then you will have to bring in a Home Rule Bill. You will then have to bring in a measure that will be a credit to you as a Government, and which you can recommend to the nation. If you can produce that Bill, then you can produce it now. If you produce it now it will be a credit to you, and it will be an advantage to you at the General Election. On the other hand, if you do not produce the Home Rule Bill now you will lay yourself open to a sort of suspicion that you have no such Bill at all. I venture respectfully and humbly to take a more charitable view of the disposition and conduct of the Opposition whenever there is a difference from the view of the Unionist Party. The Unionist Party assume that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Gladstone) has an honest and a genuine intention of producing some Bill at some time, but for my own part I do not share that belief. I am under the impression that they have lost faith in Home Rule as completely as others have. It was once said of Italy that it was merely a geographical expression, and I think it may be said far more truthfully that Home Rule is now but a political expression, about which they talk in Party politics, and in which they affect an interest so long as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian remains a force in public life. But beyond this I think we shall hear very little more of Home Rule from the Opposition Benches. That is my view, and I must, of course, say something in support of the bare statement. That view is, to some extent, supported by the proceedings to-night. We are told by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite that the statesmen who lead in the policy of Home Rule are sure of a vast majority at the General Election, that the people are in favour of Home Rule, that, in fact, the matter is settled. Then in the face of this immediate prospect we have hon. Members coming to the House and putting down Amendments to the Address as though the subject requires ventilation, and information is needed. Now, I think Home Rulers, in taking this action, place themselves very much in the position occupied by "Fair Traders." Three years ago Conservatives, at large gatherings of their Associations, passed resolutions in favour of Fair Trade, and everybody supposed that the whole Party was going to embrace that policy as part of the Conservative creed. But what it has come to is this: an Amendment moved to the Address, on which its authors do not think it desirable to take a Division. What the hon. Member for West Belfast will do remains to be seen to-morrow. There was one part of the hon. Member's speech to which I should like to reply, and that was the threat to the effect that if we did not get rid of Home Rule now we should not be able to get on with our own business. Now, a similar threat was made a long time ago by a Party resembling in many respects the Nationalist Party of to-day—a Party advocating a policy of Repeal. Of the conduct of this Party Sir Robert Peel wrote to the effect that the members of this Party were insensible to the effect of British opinion, and wished to disgust English Members and induce the belief that legislation would be impossible while Repeal was withheld. Now, that was some sixty years ago, but notwithstanding the obstruction offered to public business anyone may see that from that time to this we have passed legislative measures to the great advantage of the Empire. As threats of obstruction then were overborne by the weight of public opinion and the common sense of most, so we may hope that the obstruction threatened in the future may be equally inoperative. Something has been said, and a good deal might be said, with regard to the present social position of Ireland since the present Government have been in office. I think I may put it in a word, and say that the effect of the rule of my right hon. Friend has shown that the resources of statesmanship are not exhausted, and that a great deal more might have been effected for the good of the Irish people had there not been now in this country, as there were in the days of Burke, persons who would be thoroughly disappointed if the people were ever satisfied. Who they are I need hardly point out. Now, the mention of the hon. Member for West Belfast induced me for a moment to diverge from the line of my remarks. I was saying that I took a more charitable view of the conduct of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite in not producing a Home Rule Bill than did the majority of the Unionist Party. I said that they had lost faith in Home Rule, but I must prove that statement—not leave it resting on a mere allegation of my own. First, I will cite an authority from below the Gangway opposite, the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), who is, I understand, a gentleman deep in the councils of the Nationalist Party, and is or was president or chairman of some association of the Home Rule League. He has thought fit, as a tribute to the memory of his late leader, to publish a biography before the blood was cold in his body. In the course of this, the hon. Gentleman remarked that when he left America in March the cause was lost, and was for the moment dead. It is rather a Hibernian expression, and if a corpse is to be revived, it is only by means of a miracle, and this is not precisely the age for miracles. Now, what does this mean, that the sacred cause of Home Rule is dead? It means that the Americans and the American-Irish, those whose sympathy has done most to promote the Home Rule agitation, have failed to keep it alive. The subscriptions of these men in America were to the subscriptions in Ireland, to use a well-remembered phrase of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, "as gold is to silver or copper." Then, these men had lost faith in Home Rule, and would finance it no longer. Why? Was it on account of private misconduct on the part of the late Mr. Parnell? One can hardly suppose they would not condone such conduct. Was it because of the ingratitude of the late leader? I think not, for ingratitude in public life is not much regarded. What could it have been then? Well, I think it was in consequence of the extreme folly of deposing a leader on whose single personality, to quote the words of the hon. Member (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), the success of Home Rule almost exclusively depended. When the King of Terrors claimed the Uncrowned King, if he had not been alienated from his party his name would still have been a tower of strength to the movement. As the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Healy), in his declaration of allegiance at Leinster Hall, said, the deposition of the chief would lead to a scramble among Irish patriots who should take his place. Well, the dissensions in the Home Rule camp showed that Home Rule was dead.

Mr. C. W. Radcliffe Cooke

(11.57.) MR. McLAREN (Cheeshire, Crewe) rose in his place and claimed to move "That the Question be now put."

(12.0.) Question put, "That the Question be now put," and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, "That those words be there added."

The House divided:—Ayes 158; Noes 179.—(Div. List, No. 2.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as followeth:—

"Most Gracious Sovereign,

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United King-

Great Britain and Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the gracious address which Your Majesty has addressed to us of Parliament.

take this first opportunity of offering to Your Majesty sincere condolence in the dispensation of Providence with our Majesty and this nation have been in the death of His Royal Highness Albert Victor, Duke of Clarence and a.

assure Your Majesty of our heartfelt sympathy with Your Majesty and Your family under this grievous affliction the deep sense entertained by all of Your Majesty's subjects of the which the Country has sustained by of a Prince who had won for himself general affection and regard of Majesty's subjects."—(Mr. Hermonpresented by Privy Councillors.

SUPPLY.

lved that this House will, upon day, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.—(Mr. Arthur .)

WAYS AND MEANS.

lved that this House will, upon day, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Ways and Means of granting the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.—(Mr. Arthur Balfour.)

BANK PRISON BILL. (No. 140.)
1st Reading deferred till Thursday.

YANCING AND LAW OF PROTECTION ACT (1881) AMENDMENT BILL.
No. 110.) SECOND READING.

on made, and Question proposed, the Bill be now read a second time.—(Mr. T. H. Bolton.)

T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): we might ask for some explanation.

T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): small Bill which obtained a Second reading last Session. There is no objection to it, I believe, and I hope the House will consent to take the Second reading now.

on agreed to.

read a second time, and committed to the Committee of the House of Commons on Wednesday next.

SALMON FISHERIES (IRELAND) ACTS: AMENDMENT BILL. (No. 112.)

Second Reading deferred till Thursday.

PUBLIC HOUSES (HOURS OF CLOSING) (SCOTLAND) BILL. (No. 92.)

Adjourned Debate on Second Reading deferred from To-morrow till Friday.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

SIR W. HARcourt (Derby): May I ask the Government what will be the business to-morrow?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): To-morrow, as the right hon. Gentleman must be aware, is a private Members' night, over which the Government has no control.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to take the Irish Local Government Bill on Thursday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR assented.

MOTIONS.

FOOTPATHS' BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Bill for the better protection of footpaths and roadside wastes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Bryce, and Sir Walter Foster.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 158.]

HOP SUBSTITUTES' BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Brookfield, Bill to provide for the declaring of Hop Substitutes in the brewing of Beer, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Brookfield, Mr. H. Knatchbull-Hugessen, Mr. Pomfret, Sir Edmund Lechmere, Mr. Rankin, and Mr. Channing.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 159.]

MINING ACCIDENTS' INSURANCE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Baird, Bill to provide for a system of National Insurance against Accidents in Mines in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Baird, Mr. Vernon, Mr. Hugh Elliot, Mr. Hozier, and Mr. Parkes Smith.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 160.]

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (LICENCES REFUSED).

Address for—

"Return of the number of Victuallers' Beerhouse and other Licences for the sale of Intoxicating Liquors, the renewal of which has been refused, in the years 1890 and 1891, by the Justices of the Peace in each Licensing District in England and Wales, showing in each case the ground of refusal, especially when such ground was, in any instance, that the Licence was not required; and showing also the result of appeal, if any (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 381, of Session 1890.)"—(Sir William Harcourt.)

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (SCHOOLS RECEIVING SPECIAL GRANTS).

Order [27th July, 1891] for Return relative thereto, read and discharged; and, instead thereof—

Return ordered—

"By Counties, of the Schools which received during the year ending the 31st day of August, 1891, the Special Grants of £10 or £15 under Articles 104 and 105 of the Code, under the following heads:—Name of School District—Population as returned by Managers:—of School District "within two miles"—Name and denomination of School—Accommodation—Average Attendance—Total Grant (including additional grants)—Additional Grants:—Article 104 (£10 or £15). Article 105 (£10)." (Mr. Arthur Acland.)

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS (WAGES).

Address for—

"Return of the forms issued by the War Office, Admiralty, Board of Works, and other Departments of the Government, in compliance with the terms of the Resolution of the House of 13th February, 1891."—(Mr. Sydney Buxton.)

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (TEACHERS' SUPERANNUATION).

Ordered, That the Select Committee to consider the best system of providing for the Superannuation of Public Elementary Teachers in England and Wales be re-appointed.—(Sir Richard Temple.)

GREENWICH HOSPITAL (AGE PENSIONS).

Return ordered—

"Of Copy of Correspondence relating to Greenwich Hospital (Age Pensions), being (1) Letter from the hon. Member for Woolwich to the First Lord of the Admiralty, and (2) Reply to the same with Memorandum."—(Colonel Hughes.)

AGRARIAN OUTRAGES (IRELAND).

Copies presented,—of Returns of the number of Agrarian Outrages reported to the Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary during the quarters ended 30th September and 31st December 1891 respectively [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

EVICTIONS (IRELAND).

Copies presented,—of Returns of the number of Evictions which have come to the knowledge of the Royal Irish Constabulary during the quarters ended 30th September and 31st December 1891 respectively [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 (ORDERS).

Copy presented,—of Order in Council with respect to the importation of Arms and Ammunition [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

ARMY (APPROPRIATION ACCOUNT).

Copy presented,—of the Appropriation Account for 1890-91, with Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

ARMY (ORDNANCE FACTORIES) (APPROPRIATION ACCOUNT).

Copy presented,—of Appropriation Account of the sums granted by Parliament for the Expense of the Ordnance Factories, &c., for the year ended 31st March 1891 [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

NATIONAL DEBT (SAVINGS BANKS AND FRIENDLY SOCIETIES).

Annual Account presented,—being for the period ending 20th November 1891 [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

TREASURY CHEST.

Account presented,—for the year 1890-91, with Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General thereon [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) (CODE), 1892.

Copy presented,—of Code of Regulations, with Appendices, of the Scotch Education Department, 1892 [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

TRADE REPORTS (ANNUAL SERIES).

Copy presented,—of Diplomatic and Consular Reports on Trade and Finance, No. 982 (Zanzibar) [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

House adjourned at twenty minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 16th February, 1892.

STANDING COMMITTEE.

A Standing Committee—for the consideration of such Public Bills as may be committed to it by the House—on the Motion of the Chairman of Committees—Appointed.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR THE STANDING COMMITTEE.

On the Motion of the Chairman of Committees—Appointed.

The Lords following, with the Chairman of Committees, were named of the Committee:—

L. Privy Seal (E. Cadogan),	L. Balfour, L. Foxford,
E. Cowper,	(E. Limerick),
E. Stanhope,	L. Colville of Culross,
V. Oxenbridge,	L. Kensington.

The Committee to meet on Thursday next, at a quarter past Three o'clock.

House adjourned at twenty-five minutes before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 16th February, 1892.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON AND NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY (NEW RAILWAYS) BILL.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): Upon the London and North Western Railway Bill I desire to say a few words, Sir. I do not know whether this is my opportunity for doing that?

MR. SPEAKER: The Second Reading stage will afford the hon. Member a better opportunity.

Ordered, That the Order (15th February) that leave be given to bring in the London and North Western Railway (New Railways) Bill be read, and discharged.

Ordered, That in lieu thereof leave be given to bring in "A Bill for empowering the London and North Western Railway Company to construct new and widen existing Railways in the Counties of Warwick and Lancaster, and the West Riding of the County of York, and for conferring powers upon that Company and the Midland Railway Company in relation to some of such Railways, and for other purposes," and that Mr. Plunket, Mr. William Lowther, Mr. MacInnes, and Mr. Albert Bright do prepare and bring in the same.—(Mr. Caldwell.)

LONDON AND NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY (HEATON LODGE AND WORTLEY RAILWAYS) BILL.

Ordered, That the Standing Orders be suspended, and that leave be given to bring in "A Bill for empowering the London and North Western Railway Company to construct new Railways in the West Riding of the County of York, to be called the Heaton Lodge and Wortley Railways, and for other purposes," and that Mr. Plunket, Mr. William Lowther, Mr. MacInnes, and Mr. Albert Bright do prepare and bring in the same.—(Mr. Caldwell.)

PARLIAMENT (DEBATES AND PROCEEDINGS).

Copy ordered—

"Of Contract, dated the 21st day of December, 1891, between the Controller of the Stationery Office and Reuter's Telegram Company, Limited, for printing and publishing Reports of Debates and Proceedings in Parliament."—(Sir John Gorst.)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. (No. 46.)

SOLICITORS AND APPRENTICES (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 85.)

Second Reading deferred from Thursday till Thursday 25th February.

QUESTIONS.

ACTS OF BRAVERY IN SAVING LIFE AT SEA.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been drawn to the many acts of heroism in the saving of human life performed by the crews of lifeboats and fishing smacks on various parts of the coast during the disastrous gales of the present winter; whether, among other notable rescues, his attention has been specially directed to that of the crew of the brig Content, of Grimsby, in the North Sea, on Sunday, 13th December, by James Nunn and John Day, the skipper and third hand respectively of the Lowestoft smack Prima Donna; and whether, having regard to the exceptional courage and seamanship shown by these men, he will advise

Her Majesty to create an order of a degree corresponding to that of the Victoria Cross, in order to suitably reward such gallant deeds; and whether he will have a record of this and other special acts of bravery of a similar nature prepared and placed within the public reach?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Yes, Sir; my attention has been drawn to many acts of heroism performed by the crews of lifeboats, fishing smacks and others, in saving life at sea during the gales of the present winter. I have approved the grant of medals and other suitable rewards in many instances, and the particular case of rescue to which the hon. Member refers is at the present moment under consideration. So far back as 1866 Her Majesty instituted a decoration (styled the Albert Medal) for rewarding gallantry in saving life at sea. This decoration consists of two classes, and is (like the Victoria Cross) reserved for cases of very exceptional gallantry. It has since its institution been conferred upon 59 persons, among them being the coxswain of a lifeboat and three masters of fishing smacks. Notices of all rewards granted by the Board of Trade are sent to the Press and published in the Board of Trade Journal. Each grant of the Albert Medal is, in addition, gazetted with a full account of the services for which it is conferred, and a record of each case is also kept at the Board of Trade, as required by the Warrant creating the decoration. Under these circumstances, I think the hon. Member will agree that it is not necessary for me to suggest to Her Majesty the creation of a new decoration in order to reward cases of gallantry in saving life at sea.

THE PATENT OFFICE.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, in view of the statements made by him to the House on the 14th July last, that the estimated surplus from the Patent Office for 1891 was £116,500; that the country ought not to look upon the Patent Office as a permanent source of income; and that it should be considered whether a reduction might not be made in the fees on patents charged in the interval between four and eight years, so as to extend the cheap protection now given for four years to a longer period: What steps have been taken, or arrangements made, to give effect to those statements, and when the promised reduction will come into operation?

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: I think the hon. Member has accurately quoted my observations of last year, but the first sentence might give rise to an erroneous impression. The estimate of the large surplus referred to was made without taking into consideration additional expenditure proposed to be incurred by the practical rebuilding of the Patent Office, and accelerating certain publications connected with the Department. I need not say if those matters had been considered the surplus would have been a very different matter. In pursuance of the promise given last Session I considered the matter very carefully last autumn, and placed myself in communication with the Treasury in regard to it. It rests with the Treasury to decide whether the scale of fees should be adopted as recommended by the Board of Trade. I am sorry to say I have not yet been able to come to any definite arrangement with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, therefore I cannot at the moment state when the reduction of fees will begin; but I hope no long time will elapse before something is done in the matter.

MR. LENG: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if it has been represented to the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the reduction of fees would be followed by a large increase in the application for patents, and therefore an increase of revenue; and I would also ask whether, with the expenditure referred to, there would not still be a very considerable surplus left, by which the reduction might be effected?

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: I do not doubt there would be a surplus, but nothing approaching £116,000. The whole matter is under the consideration of my right hon. Friend.

THE DUTY OF COMMANDING OFFICERS OF VOLUNTEER REGIMENTS.

COLONEL MALCOLM (Argyllshire) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the duty of officers commanding Volunteer regiments to maintain their battalion as near as possible at their authorised numerical strength ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle) : Undoubtedly it is the duty of a Commanding Officer to use all available means to render the corps he commands as efficient as possible in regard to numbers, as well as in all other respects.

POST OFFICE SUBSIDIES TO IRISH RAILWAYS.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General would he have any difficulty in giving a Return showing the subsidies paid by the Post Office Department to the different Irish Railways, the mileage run in each case, the nature of the service afforded, and the populations and valuations of the various towns and districts served by each Company subsidised ?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.) : The payments made to Irish Railway Companies for the conveyance of mails will be found on page 92 of the last Estimates for Revenue Departments. The contracts with the principal Railway Companies include the running of one or more mail trains, the speed of which is settled by agreement with the Post Office, and also the right to send bags of mails by other trains. To give a Return of the total mileage so run by such trains would be difficult, and as a Department we do not possess information as to the populations and valuations of the towns and districts served by the Companies.

MR. T. M. HEALY : May I ask the right hon. Gentleman will he give us a few of the particulars, say, the sums allowed to each of the four Provinces—to the Great Western, the Midland, the Great Southern and Western, and the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Companies. If he will give us the amount paid for each, then we will figure out the mileage and populations for ourselves ?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON : Of course, the railways run through more than one Province ; and there are the rates of speed and various considerations to be taken into account. I do not see my way to giving such a Return.

MR. T. M. HEALY : The right hon. Gentleman knows what we require, he knows the object with which we ask for the Return. We want to see whether the Counties of Wicklow and Wexford could not be better served. I shall put a further question, and shall continue questions on the subject.

COLONISATION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

MR. LODER (Brighton) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any agreement has yet been arrived at with the Government of British Columbia in respect of the scheme of colonisation recommended by the Select Committee on Colonisation which sat last Session ; and whether Her Majesty's Government contemplate bringing in a Bill to carry it into effect ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square) : The arrangements to which my hon. Friend alludes, and which Her Majesty's Government are prepared to carry out, were communicated to the Representatives of British Columbia on 10th June last, but no reply has, up to the present, been received.

TELEGRAPHIC STATIONS, COUNTY GALWAY.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is prepared to establish telegraphic stations in the villages of Mountshannon and Whitegate, County Galway ; and whether he can establish direct postal communication between Woodford and Whitegate, considering that the additional cost would be so small, as a rural messenger runs daily half the journey between these two centres ?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON : Inquiry was made in 1884 and 1885 as to the feasibility of establishing telegraph offices at Mountshanon and Whitegate, but it appeared that the expense would be very considerable, and that, on the other hand, the revenue would be insignificant. I shall, however, be glad to have further inquiry made, and to let the hon. Member know the result. As regards direct postal communication between Woodford and Whitegate, applications have been several times considered, but it has always been found that the necessary expense would be quite disproportionate to the postal advantage to be secured.

SCOTTISH PIER AND HARBOUR WORKS.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that, in the printed form of agreement to be signed by a contractor, for the construction of Scottish piers and other works, under "The Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 1) Act, 1891," there are clauses to the effect (Clauses 7 and 8) that arbitration (if necessary) is to be conducted under the English Arbitration Act of 1889, and that agreements are to be interpreted and disputes decided by the Law of England, and the contractors are obliged to submit themselves to the jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice in England ; whether this form of agreement is issued under the authority of the Board of Trade ; whether it is with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government that this new extension of the jurisdiction of the English Courts in Scotland is being introduced, and Scotchmen, who tender for works to be done in Scotland, are asked as a condition of their tender being accepted to forgo their right of being tried in their own country and by their own Laws ; and whether the Board of Trade will take care that no similar clauses are inserted in the conditions of tender for works in Scotland in future ?

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH : No particular form of agreement is authorised or even mentioned in the Pier and Harbour Orders made by the Board of Trade and confirmed by the Pier and Harbour Orders Confirmation (No. 1) Act, 1891. I am not aware of, and consequently have not authorised, the form to which the hon. Member refers ; and I can only surmise that it is a matter between the undertakers of the Order and their contractor, with which the Board of Trade have nothing whatever to do.

Sir James Fergusson

MR. BUCHANAN : Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake that in future contracts undertaken with the approval of the engineers of the Board of Trade such supervision shall be exercised that no such clause shall be inserted ?

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH : I do not think I have the power to do that. I think it is a matter between the undertakers of the piers and their contractors.

MR. BUCHANAN : I will endeavour to put a further question on the subject, failing a satisfactory answer to which I shall be obliged to call attention to the subject in another manner.

STATIONERY OFFICE CONTRACTORS' CIRCULAR.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the Circular which is being sent by the Stationery Office to all contractors ?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham) : The question was practically answered yesterday, when I said I would lay on the Table a Return giving the information.

THE GLASGOW AND EDINBURGH POST OFFICES.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is true, as stated in the Scottish newspapers, that it has been determined to place the Glasgow Post Office under the control of the Edinburgh Post Office establishment, in many matters concerning which Glasgow has for years past communicated direct with London ; whether he is aware that the system of direct communication with London was adopted in consequence of numerous complaints as to the delay occasioned by the reference to Edinburgh of questions which had to be decided in London ; and if he would be so good as to explain the exact nature of any changes proposed?

SIR GEORGE T R E V E L Y A N (Glasgow, Bridgeton) had also notice of the following question: To ask the Postmaster General whether any steps have been taken towards carrying on the postal administration of Glasgow through the postal authorities of Edinburgh; and, if so, what is the character and scope of the change?

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox), on the same subject, had notice to ask the Postmaster General whether any arrangement has recently been made for subordinating business transacted at Glasgow Post Office to the Post Office staff at Edinburgh; if so, the nature and extent of the new arrangement, and the reasons for making the same?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: I will answer the group of questions on this subject together with a question of which I have had private notice from the hon. Member for the Central Division of Glasgow (Mr. Baird). I am aware of the feeling which prompts these Questions, especially as I belong myself to the West of Scotland; but there is a certain misapprehension involved. It is intended that for all postal, that is public purposes, the Glasgow Post Office shall remain as heretofore. The Postmaster will still be Surveyor of the Glasgow District as well as Postmaster of Glasgow, and there will be no diminution of his powers. The only change that has been made is one affecting internal administration, in which the public have no concern. For example, any question regarding accounts has of late been referred from Glasgow to London, from London to Edinburgh, where the accounts for Scotland are kept, back to London, and again back to Glasgow. By sending such questions to the Surveyor General for Scotland, and, if necessary, through him to London, there will be simplification and greater despatch. Moreover, as between Glasgow and London, owing to the Postmaster being also Surveyor, there will be one stage less than at other places in Scotland.

LORD ASHBROOK'S ESTATE, KING'S COUNTY.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that Lord Ashbrook's tenants have repeatedly offered to accept any fair or reasonable terms, he will refuse to lend the forces of the Crown to assist Lord Ashbrook to carry out evictions on that portion of his estate near Shannon Bridge, in the King's County?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. L. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): No, Sir; I can give no such undertaking as the hon. Member asks. The protection of the police must be given to those who have a right to it, if it be asked.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether any steps have been taken to carry out the successful design for the completion of the South Kensington Museum?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): During the Autumn Mr. Aston Webb, the successful architect, has been at work on the plans, making such alterations in the details of arrangements as have been suggested by the Science and Art Department and the Office of Works. Some time will be required for completion of working drawings, and for certain preliminary works necessary to clear the site, and to provide for the work of the Science and Art Department proceeding without interruption during the progress of the works, and in these circumstances it is not proposed to do more this year than carry out these preliminary works.

LIGHTING THE LIBRARY.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether one of the rooms in the Library can be lighted with candles?

MR. PLUNKET: In reply to my hon. Friend, I may say there are lamps in the rooms if hon. Members choose to have them lighted.

MR. BARTLEY: I am quite aware of that; but what I mean is, will the electric light be removed from one of the rooms? The glare from this light is so intense that many Members cannot stand it?

MR. PLUNKET: I am afraid there will not be universal assent to that.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSIONERSHIP FOR INCOME TAX.

MR. BARTLEY: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the vacant Special Commissionership for Income Tax has yet been filled up; and, if so, who has been appointed?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The vacancy was caused by the retirement of Mr. Daniel O'Connell. My right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury has appointed in his place Mr. Walter Gyles, a member of the Irish Bar.

STREET BETTING IN BELFAST.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the street betting which goes on in Belfast apparently unchecked by the police, and whether he will take steps to insure greater vigilance in its suppression?

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): As I am Member for the City of Belfast, which the hon. and gallant Member is not, and as the question contains a serious allegation against the police and the habits of the population of Belfast, perhaps I may be allowed to ask if the Government are in possession of any specific information that Belfast differs in this respect from any other great city?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): My attention has only been called to this matter by the Question being put on the Paper. I have referred the matter to the police for their Report. In answer to the hon. Member opposite, I may say that up to the present no Report on the subject from the police has reached me.

THE PROCURATOR FISCAL, ROSS AND CROMARTY.

DR. M'DONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, in appointing a gentleman for the now vacant Procurator Fiscalship for the Western District of Ross and Cromarty, he will take care that the gentleman appointed shall be able to speak the Gaelic language, and also shall, according to repeated promises from his predecessors, be prohibited from holding other offices in conjunction with his fiscalship; and whether such a stipulation has been carried out in the case of the Fiscal recently appointed for Lewis; and, if not, will he explain on what grounds?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): I cannot give any undertaking that a knowledge of the Gaelic language will be regarded as essential in appointing to the vacant office referred to, as there are, in my opinion, other qualifications of more importance. I am not aware of any promises made by my predecessor in regard to such appointments; but on several occasions, and once in answer to the hon. Member, it was stated that the question of restricting the holders from private practice is always considered, and in recent cases they have been so restricted. While this restriction is imposed it is usual to insert in the Commission liberty to hold such offices of a public nature as the Sheriff may approve, and this was done in the case referred to in the latter part of the question.

THE JUSTICES OF DRONFIELD AND MR. HARRISON.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the action of the Justices of Dronfield, in Derbyshire, in dismissing a summons against certain gamekeepers of the Duke of Rutland, obtained by Mr. Harrison, although it was admitted that these gamekeepers had hindered that gentleman from walking along a high road on a moor, on the ground that a grouse drive was proceeding, and that, on his refusing to withdraw, he was held back by three of the gamekeepers for 18 minutes; whether his attention has been also called to the fact that three policemen were present during this assault, and refused to give Mr. Harrison any protection, or to interfere with the action of the gamekeepers; whether he is aware that the defence of these gamekeepers, submitted by their solicitor to the Justices, was that it was a bare-faced attempt on the part of Mr. Harrison to interfere with the legitimate sport of gentlemen, and that the summons ought to be dismissed in order to show complainant that he could not be permitted to behave in a manner which had become intolerable; and what action he proposes to take in the matter?

Mr. Bartley

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have received a Report of the case referred to by the hon. Member. This Report contains several particulars not mentioned in the Question. The events occurred on 8th October, and the summons was taken out on 2nd November. The summons having been heard, the magistrates dismissed it, solely on the ground that the assault complained of was of a slight and trifling nature, and came within Section 16 of "The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879." An application to the High Court for a mandamus was refused on 18th January. I am informed that the complainant has now commenced an action for damages against the gamekeepers; and, under these circumstances, it would be improper for me to express an opinion or to take action in the matter until the litigation has closed.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is intended to take any action in this matter in regard to the policemen who witnessed this "trifling assault" for some twenty minutes?

*MR. MATTHEWS: From the Report supplied to me there appears to be some doubt as to the nature of the alleged assault; and until that doubt is cleared up by further inquiry, I do not propose to take any action.

HOURS OF RAILWAY SERVANTS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Board of Trade have, since last Session, ordered any further Returns of the hours of railway servants, which would show whether the Railway Companies have made any substantial changes in the hours of duty since December, 1890?

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: I quite agree with the suggestion contained in the Question, that we ought to obtain some later information in the form supplied for 1890. I believe the changes have been considerable. I have not yet been able to settle the precise month which should be taken. Of course, I desire to take as late a month as possible, so that we may have the most recent information. I hope the Return may be ordered in a few days.

THE COINAGE ACT, 1891.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any steps have been taken to carry out the provisions of "The Coinage Act, 1891"?

MR. GOSCHEN: An Order in Council for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Act is now ready, and will be submitted for approval at the next Council. We shall then be prepared to proceed at once with the issue of a Proclamation to announce that light gold will be received at the Bank of England. The sum of £400,000 has been issued and invested in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

THE IRISH AND SCOTCH EDUCATION GRANTS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, looking at the urgency of the Irish Education Bill, which should be disposed of at the end of the financial year, now at six weeks' distance, he will cause this Bill to be brought in after the introductory stage of the Irish Local Government Bill is disposed of on Thursday?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am afraid it will be impossible to dispose of the Bill before the end of the financial year. At one time I did hope it would be possible; but, considering the amount of business to be got through, I cannot hold out any hope that, even if the Bill were brought in at once, we could pass it within the time, having in view the very important questions raised by the Bill. As the House knows, it does not merely deal with the question of assisted education, but with other questions, such as a modified form of compulsion, and its provisions cannot be expected to pass without a certain amount of discussion. The money with which the Bill deals will partly accrue during the coming year, and will, in part, be money which has accrued in the current year. Proposals will be made for dealing with the money of the current year up to the end of March, and a Supplementary Estimate will be presented in time for the money to be disposed of. The Bill dealing with the general, the permanent allocation of the funds, will be brought forward at a later date.

MR. SEXTON: How soon may we expect to have the Bill in our hands?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is quite right in seeking early information as to the Bill. It will require consideration in Ireland from all interested in education on every side of this much controverted subject. I hope it may be in the hands of Members in the course, say, of ten days at latest. Of course, if hon. Members would be willing to abstain from a First Reading discussion, it could be distributed in a very few days.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Is it contemplated to make any statement on introducing the Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will leave my right hon. Friend to answer that. He is not, at the moment, in the House.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): Will the same plan be adopted in regard to the Scotch money —two items, two portions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The two cases are different, the Scotch Bill is shorter and, I think, much less controversial; so I hope we may dispose of it within the financial year.

MR. SEXTON: May we hope that the Supplementary Estimate will be circulated in such time as will allow full consideration of the proposals before the Vote is taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Certainly.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

John Archibald Willcox, esquire, for Liverpool (Everton Division.)

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MOTIONS.

FOOTPATHS PRESERVATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Jesse Collings, Bill for the Preservation of Footpaths, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jesse Collings, Sir Edward Birkbeck, Mr. Hobhouse, Mr. Cust, and Mr. Story-Maskelyne.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 161.]

TRADE UNION PROVIDENT FUNDS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Howell, Bill to exempt the Funds of Trade Unions paying provident benefits to their members from the payment of Income Tax on their investments, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Howell, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. Burt, Mr. Fenwick, and Mr. John Wilson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 162.]

CRIMINAL CASES APPEALS BILL.

On Motion of Sir Henry James, Bill to establish a Court of Appeal in Criminal Cases, ordered to be brought in by Sir Henry James, Mr. Asquith, and Sir Albert Rollit.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 163.]

FIRE INQUESTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Brookfield, Bill to provide for the holding of Fire Inquests, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Brookfield, Mr. Noble, Mr. Gainsford Bruce, and Mr. Octavius V. Morgan.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 164.]

LOCAL COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. McCartan, Bill to amend the Law relating to Local Courts of Bankruptcy in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. McCartan, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Macartney, Mr. Maurice Healy, and Mr. Knox.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 165.]

RANGES ACT (1891) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Bill to amend "The Ranges Act, 1891," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Bryer, Mr. Compton, Sir Walter Foster, and Mr. Hoare.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 166.]

BEER ADULTERATION (No. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Quilter, Bill for better securing the purity of beer, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Quilter, Mr. Heneage, Viscount Wolmer, Sir Henry Selwin Ibbetson, Mr. Herbert Gardner, Mr. Francis Stevenson, Mr. Gurdon, Colonel Anstruther, and Mr. Llewellyn.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 167.]

SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS ACT (1875) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Dr. Cameron, Bill to amend "The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875," ordered to be brought in by Dr. Cameron, Mr. Channing, Mr. Provand, Dr. Farquharson, and Mr. Thomas Dickson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 168.]

HOURS OF RAILWAY SERVANTS.

(4.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Select Committee be re-appointed to inquire whether, and, if so, in what way, the Hours worked by Railway Servants should be restricted by legislation.

That the Committee do consist of Twenty-six Members."

*MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Bushcliffe) : I do not rise in any way to oppose the re-appointment of the Committee, but I should like to ask the President of the Board of Trade as to when we may expect the labours of the Committee to be brought to a conclusion. This Committee was appointed after a very interesting discussion on a Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Channing). The right hon. Gentleman on that occasion declared that he meant business, and a little later in the evening the late Mr. W. H. Smith emphatically endorsed the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman, and said the fact that there had been overtime was the basis of the appointment of the Committee. Now, on the 3rd of February, when I ventured to put down a somewhat limited Amendment to the Resolution the right hon. Gentleman pointed out certain consequences that would flow from it and asked me to withdraw it, which I did after a very emphatic declaration that he accepted the situation as disclosed in the Reports of the Inspectors. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt), a gentleman of much experience and the Chairman of one of the great Railway Companies, went so far as to say that the Committee would close their labours in a week or two. But the Committee, which consisted of 26 Members—a rather unworkable number—have had a large number of sittings; they have already examined some 30 witnesses, and asked no fewer than 10,000 questions, and the appeal I would make to the right hon. Gentleman is that he will, in so far as in him lies, undertake to do what he undertook to do last year, namely, to get the Committee to move at a reasonably rapid pace, so that we may have its Report as soon as possible. This is an extremely important matter to railway servants throughout the United Kingdom. No one reading the very large Blue Book will contend that some of the questions asked have not been a little wide of the actual scope of the Committee as defined in the Resolution of the 23rd January last year. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be able to assure us that we may entertain something like hope of a result this Session.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) : I desire to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade the state of the representation of Irish Members sitting on this side of the House on this Committee. The Irish Members form practically one-sixth of the House, and yet on this Committee which numbers 26 there are only two Irish Members. I think we are entitled to a larger representation. My hon. Friend the Member for South Donegal (Mr. Swift Mac Neill) has not been very well able to attend this Committee, but his name is put down again without his being asked as to whether he can give the necessary attention to a matter of this importance. At the present time there is a very keen anxiety among railway servants in Ireland, where there have already been two unpleasant strikes in reference to this matter, which it is very desirable should be quickly settled. The case of Ireland differs from that of England or Scotland, and I think that they should have a little more attention and a stronger representation on the Committee.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.) : With regard to the point raised by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, he will recollect that the Select Committee was originally appointed after the usual practice by arrangement between the representatives of all sections of the House. When the appointment came to be discussed, it was objected that the labour interest was not sufficiently represented. Two hon. Members were thereupon added to the Committee, and no doubt that did leave the Irish representation rather smaller than perhaps it might otherwise have been. Of course, there is no objection whatever to the discharge of the Member for South Donegal if he is unable to attend, and the substitution of another Member. I hope, however, the House will not alter the constitution of the Committee, which was only arrived at after very considerable debate, and also because the Committee has already listened to a vast amount of evidence. No one can be more disappointed than I was at the Committee being unable to report last Session. The Members of the Committee will bear me out that the Committee were unanimous in considering it to be impossible to arrive at a Report last Session, and in recommending their re-appointment this year. With regard to our proceedings this year, I can assure the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division that so far as I am concerned I shall desire that they should be as expeditious as possible, and I do not think there can be any reason to doubt that we shall be able to arrive at a decision before the close of the present Session.

(4.13.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I should like to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that since the appointment of this Committee the labour question has undergone enormous development. The railway servants of Belfast are desirous that their case should be heard, and it is, therefore, desirable that there should be a larger Irish representation on the Committee. I hope, therefore, that two Members will be added.

(4.15.) MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): I should like to associate myself with the claim of the Irish Members for a larger representation on this Committee. The question, which engages the attention and excites the interest of the people of Ireland, ought to be considered by a Committee consisting of a larger number of Irish Members. The hon. Gentleman has asked that two Members be added. I think one might suffice, making three in all. No difficulty need arise in deciding upon the name of the additional Member. We desire that the interests of Irish railway servants should be considered by a Committee, on which they are properly represented.

Sir Michael Hicks Beach

MR. SEXTON: It will simplify matters if I accept the suggestion of the hon. Member.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I think the interests of the Irish railway labourers would be fully considered by the Committee as it stands; but I must protest against the idea of the hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. Healy), that, we sitting on this side of the House do not take as keen an interest as Gentlemen sitting opposite in Irish railway servants.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I did not mean to say that the hon. and gallant Gentleman did not have the interests of the railway servant at heart.

(4.20.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I concur absolutely in the remarks of the President of the Board of Trade. I think it is most desirable to bring this inquiry to as speedy a conclusion as possible. I venture to suggest that the Motion should be postponed for a day or two, in order to see if the views of the Irish Members cannot be met without an inconvenient and undesirable increase of the Members of the Committee.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to move the omission of the words "Twenty-six" and the insertion of the words "Twenty-seven."

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "Twenty-six," and insert the words "Twenty-seven."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH): I should hope the hon. Gentleman would not press that Motion. I have no personal objection to the increase of the Committee, but it would be difficult to increase it without disturbing the balance of opinion. I would hope that the House might be disposed to appoint this Committee now, and that there might be communications in the usual way with the view of meeting the wishes of hon. Members from Ireland without any increase of the numbers of the Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Ordered, That the following be Members of the Committee:—Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Mr. Channing, Mr. Radcliffe Cooke, Mr. Crawford, Baron de Worms, Mr. Alfred Gathorne-Hardy,

Mr. Herbert Gl, Mr. Heneage, Mr. Howorth, Mr. M ....., Mr. Mac Neill, Mr. Walter M'Laren, . Maguire, Sir Herbert Maxwell, Mr. Mi ....., Mr. Muntz, Mr. Murdoch, Sir Joseph Pease, Mr. Pickard, Sir Edward Reed, Sir Albert Rollit, Mr. Somervell, Sir George Trevelyan, Sir Henry Tyler, Mr. Vernon, and Mr. John Wilson.

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

That Five be the quorum.—(Mr. Akers Douglas.)

EAST INDIA—CIVIL SERVICE APPOINTMENTS.

(4.24.) MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I rise to move an Address for—

"Return of all Appointments (excluding covenanted Civil Servants only) in all Departments of all the Civil Services, of monthly salaries of Rs. 400 and upwards, stating separately the number employed for each separate amount, and distinguishing Natives pure, and Europeans and Eurasians."

My reason for moving for this Return is to obtain materials for the settlement of a controversy that has arisen between the Secretary of State for India and myself. The Under Secretary has been good enough to send me a letter in which he says he does not see how the Government of India can accede to my Motion, as all the information I ask was given in a Return moved for by the hon. Member for Elgin and Nairn last year, which Return is in the same form, but limited to those with salaries of 1,000 rupees per month.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. GEORGE CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): I beg the hon. Member's pardon; I said, and I meant, 1,000 rupees per annum.

MR. MAC NEILL: My Motion is for a Return of Civil Servants whose monthly salaries amount to 400 rupees and upwards, and I fixed this sum in order to show how, from all the higher branches of the Civil Service of India, natives are excluded. Two years ago in this House I made, in the presence of the then Under Secretary, Sir John Gorst, the same statements as I made the other night to which the present Under Secretary takes objection. My statements two years ago were not contradicted by the singularly astute gentleman who then represented the India Office.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be kind enough not to assume that I admitted everything said in this House about Indian affairs that I did not expressly contradict.

MR. MAC NEILL: The right hon. Gentleman goes on the good old legal maxim of admitting nothing, but if he could have contradicted me he would have done so. I hold in my hand the 14th Annual Report of the Indian National Congress, and I should just like to read a passage to the House—

Mr. Eardley Norton said:—"I like to believe that they not merely make, but redeem, their promises. It pains me when I see them lack the courage of their convictions. Let me call one more witness to the point. He shall be a former Viceroy. I will examine Lord Lytton. I should be afraid to use his language as my own, lest I should be indicted for high treason. But a Viceroy can do no wrong. Lord Lytton, in a secret Report, which accidentally came to light, in terms told the authorities in England that the people of this country had been 'cheated'—I am quoting, gentlemen—of their hopes. So much for the manner and extent of England's redemption of her vows. I wish to touch with brief particularity upon two points in connection with the Public Service Commission. First, as to the excessive cost of the administration of this country. Many people think it ruinous. I agree with them. The only real solution of the difficulty lies in an infusion into the machinery of the country of a large, and yearly larger, element of indigenous Indian talent. What share do you hold to-day in the service of your country? Here are some suggestive figures. Out of 2,357 appointments in the higher Uncovenanted Civil Service you, gentlemen of India, hold 188. The non-domiciled Europeans appropriate 1,460 such appointments, the domiciled Europeans 486, Eurasians 223, and the Indians 188. The three first bodies hold 2,169 berths, you only 188.

Mr. Eardley Norton quoted from a little book entitled Civil Service Reform, written by a native gentleman, which also supports my contention. What I have stated here was said in India four years ago, and in this House two years ago, and accepted as indisputably correct. I am very happy to have had an opportunity of bringing these facts before the public notice, and, surely, if the case of the hon. Gentleman is right, and India is, as Lord Northbrook said it ought to be, held not for the benefit of the British middle class, which starved and robbed the Indian people, it will be easy for him to stultify me by giving the Return I ask for. Indian affairs should be entirely severed from Party politics, and it is our duty to economise course, there is no objection whatever to the discharge of the Member for South Donegal if he is unable to attend, and the substitution of another Member. I hope, however, the House will not alter the constitution of the Committee, which was only arrived at after very considerable debate, and also because the Committee has already listened to a vast amount of evidence. No one can be more disappointed than I was at the Committee being unable to report last Session. The Members of the Committee will bear me out that the Committee were unanimous in considering it to be impossible to arrive at a Report last Session, and in recommending their re-appointment this year. With regard to our proceedings this year, I can assure the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division that so far as I am concerned I shall desire that they should be as expeditious as possible, and I do not think there can be any reason to doubt that we shall be able to arrive at a decision before the close of the present Session.

(4.13.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I should like to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that since the appointment of this Committee the labour question has undergone enormous development. The railway servants of Belfast are desirous that their case should be heard, and it is, therefore, desirable that there should be a larger Irish representation on the Committee. I hope, therefore, that two Members will be added.

(4.15.) MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): I should like to associate myself with the claim of the Irish Members for a larger representation on this Committee. The question, which engages the attention and excites the interest of the people of Ireland, ought to be considered by a Committee consisting of a larger number of Irish Members. The hon. Gentleman has asked that two Members be added. I think one might suffice, making three in all. No difficulty need arise in deciding upon the name of the additional Member. We desire that the interests of Irish railway servants should be considered by a Committee, on which they are properly represented.

Sir Michael Hicks Beach

MR. SEXTON: It will simplify matters if I accept the suggestion of the hon. Member.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I think the interests of the Irish railway labourers would be fully considered by the Committee as it stands; but I must protest against the idea of the hon. Member for North Longford (Mr. Healy), that, we sitting on this side of the House do not take as keen an interest as Gentlemen sitting opposite in Irish railway servants.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I did not mean to say that the hon. and gallant Gentleman did not have the interests of the railway servant at heart.

(4.20.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I concur absolutely in the remarks of the President of the Board of Trade. I think it is most desirable to bring this inquiry to as speedy a conclusion as possible. I venture to suggest that the Motion should be postponed for a day or two, in order to see if the views of the Irish Members cannot be met without an inconvenient and undesirable increase of the Members of the Committee.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to move the omission of the words "Twenty-six" and the insertion of the words "Twenty-seven."

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "Twenty-six," and insert the words "Twenty-seven."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH): I should hope the hon. Gentleman would not press that Motion. I have no personal objection to the increase of the Committee, but it would be difficult to increase it without disturbing the balance of opinion. I would hope that the House might be disposed to appoint this Committee now, and that there might be communications in the usual way with the view of meeting the wishes of hon. Members from Ireland without any increase of the numbers of the Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Ordered, That the following be Members of the Committee:—Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Mr. Channing, Mr. Radcliffe Cooke, Mr. Crawford, Baron de Worms, Mr. Alfred Gathorne-Hardy,

Mr. Herbert Gladstone, Mr. Heneage, Mr. Howorth, Mr. MacInnes, Mr. MacNeill, Mr. Walter M'Laren, Mr. Maguire, Sir Herbert Maxwell, Mr. Milvain, Mr. Muntz, Mr. Murdoch, Sir Joseph Pease, Mr. Pickard, Sir Edward Reed, Sir Albert Rollit, Mr. Somervell, Sir George Trevelyan, Sir Henry Tyler, Mr. Vernon, and Mr. John Wilson.

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

That Five be the quorum.—(Mr. Akers Douglas.)

EAST INDIA—CIVIL SERVICE APPOINTMENTS.

(4.24.) MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I rise to move an Address for—

"Return of all Appointments (excluding covenanted Civil Servants only) in all Departments of all the Civil Services, of monthly salaries of Rs. 400 and upwards, stating separately the number employed for each separate amount, and distinguishing Natives pure, and Europeans and Eurasians."

My reason for moving for this Return is to obtain materials for the settlement of a controversy that has arisen between the Secretary of State for India and myself. The Under Secretary has been good enough to send me a letter in which he says he does not see how the Government of India can accede to my Motion, as all the information I ask was given in a Return moved for by the hon. Member for Elgin and Nairn last year, which Return is in the same form, but limited to those with salaries of 1,000 rupees per month.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. GEORGE CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): I beg the hon. Member's pardon; I said, and I meant, 1,000 rupees per annum.

MR. MAC NEILL: My Motion is for a Return of Civil Servants whose monthly salaries amount to 400 rupees and upwards, and I fixed this sum in order to show how, from all the higher branches of the Civil Service of India, natives are excluded. Two years ago in this House I made, in the presence of the then Under Secretary, Sir John Gorst, the same statements as I made the other night to which the present Under Secretary takes objection. My statements two years ago were not contradicted by the singularly astute gentleman who then represented the India Office.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be kind enough not to assume that I admitted everything said in this House about Indian affairs that I did not expressly contradict.

MR. MAC NEILL: The right hon. Gentleman goes on the good old legal maxim of admitting nothing, but if he could have contradicted me he would have done so. I hold in my hand the 14th Annual Report of the Indian National Congress, and I should just like to read a passage to the House—

Mr. Eardley Norton said:—"I like to believe that they not merely make, but redeem, their promises. It pains me when I see them lack the courage of their convictions. Let me call one more witness to the point. He shall be a former Viceroy. I will examine Lord Lytton. I should be afraid to use his language as my own, lest I should be indicted for high treason. But a Viceroy can do no wrong. Lord Lytton, in a secret Report, which accidentally came to light, in terms told the authorities in England that the people of this country had been 'cheated'—I am quoting, gentlemen—of their hopes. So much for the manner and extent of England's redemption of her vows. I wish to touch with brief particularity upon two points in connection with the Public Service Commission. First, as to the excessive cost of the administration of this country. Many people think it ruinous. I agree with them. The only real solution of the difficulty lies in an infusion into the machinery of the country of a large, and yearly larger, element of indigenous Indian talent. What share do you hold to-day in the service of your country? Here are some suggestive figures. Out of 2,357 appointments in the higher Uncovenanted Civil Service you, gentlemen of India, hold 188. The non-domiciled Europeans appropriate 1,480 such appointments, the domiciled Europeans 486, Eurasians 223, and the Indians 188. The three first bodies hold 2,169 berths, you only 188.

Mr. Eardley Norton quoted from a little book entitled Civil Service Reform, written by a native gentleman, which also supports my contention. What I have stated here was said in India four years ago, and in this House two years ago, and accepted as indisputably correct. I am very happy to have had an opportunity of bringing these facts before the public notice, and, surely, if the case of the hon. Gentleman is right, and India is, as Lord Northbrook said it ought to be, held not for the benefit of the British middle class, which starved and robbed the Indian people, it will be easy for him to stultify me by giving the Return I ask for. Indian affairs should be entirely severed from Party politics, and it is our duty to economise the administration of it, as well as to give the Indians some share in the management of their own affairs. It is ridiculous to say that when 280,000,000 of people are under our rule, they are all to be excluded from the honourable ambition of assisting in the government of their country.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty that She will give directions that there be laid before this House a Return of all Appointments (excluding covenanted Civil Servants only) in all Departments of all the Civil Services, of monthly salaries of Rs.400 and upwards, stating separately the number employed for each separate amount, and distinguishing Natives pure, and Europeans and Eurasians." —(Mr. Mac Neill.)

*(4.40.) MR. CURZON : There are parts of the hon. Gentleman's speech, particularly its declamatory and denunciatory parts, which I think it is unnecessary for me to allude to, and there are only two matters of any importance which I need mention. The first is the Return moved for by the hon. Member, and the second is the alleged discrepancy between the figures quoted by him and other figures quoted by myself in this discussion. On the first point I have already informed the hon. Member in a private letter that it is not necessary to give the Return, for the reason that all the information which he requires, and a great deal besides, will be contained in the Return moved for by the hon. Member for Elgin and Nairn last year, and granted by the Government, the information for which is now being collected in India, and which will be no doubt shortly laid upon the Table. The Return the hon. Member wants is for monthly salaries of Rs.400 and upwards; but our Return gives yearly salaries of Rs.1,000 and upwards, and, therefore, every single item that he desires will appear in that Return.

MR. MAC NEILL : Will the hon. Gentleman in the Return specify the graduated salaries? My point is, that that Return does not show the salaries of the higher Civil Service, and I want to get at the number of natives in the higher Civil Service.

*MR. CURZON : I do not know that there will be any objection to give the information that the hon. Member desires, although I cannot pledge myself to do so; but from the Return granted last year he really will obtain all the information that he wants, although possibly it may not be arranged in the way in which, for his own purposes, he would like it to be. As to the alleged discrepancy of figures, what are the facts of the case? The hon. Gentleman addressed the House complaining that he had been treated with great unfairness and courtesy. There was nothing of the kind. He has been treated with perfect fairness, as I will explain. The other evening I alluded to the officers of the higher branches of the Uncovenanted Service, excluding the Special Departments, and gave certain figures. I quoted from the Blue Book figures which are opposed to those quoted by the hon. Member. He gave no authority for his statement at the time he made it, but yesterday he came down to the House and explained that his authority was the very Blue Book from which I had been quoting. I have spent some time this morning in searching through it, and I have not yet discovered the figures to which he alludes; but he has done me the courtesy to explain that those figures are to be arrived at by selecting different items in the Blue Book, and producing the result he has described. I submit to the House that it is possible, by taking a table here and there, and making a classification to suit your case, to produce any result you please. The hon. Member has entirely ignored the executive and judicial branches of the Service.

MR. MAC NEILL : I beg pardon; I mentioned them.

*MR. CURZON : The hon. Gentleman has entirely ignored them in his figures, based upon a calculation for which he quotes the authority of the Indian Congress. I do not desire to dispute the authority of that Congress, but it is perfectly possible to select particular branches of the Public Service, in which technical skill is required, and in which there must be more Englishmen than natives, and that is what he has done. Having selected his figures, he comes down and makes a speech, giving the House to understand that the figures he puts before us are typical of the whole case. But I submit that that is not a fair method of argument, or a fair conclusion to invite us to come to. I should not object to the publication of any facts or figures giving the whole state of the case at the present time, and the actual number of Englishmen compared with natives employed in India, because I believe that such a Return would convey light to the hon. Gentleman's mind, as he has no idea of the manner in which natives are most wisely employed at the present time.

Mr. Mac Neill

Question put, and negatived.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

---

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE BILL.

(No. 118.) SECOND READING.

(4.50.) Order for Second Reading read.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): This Bill is intended to deal with a grievance which has been felt for a long time—namely, the method of appointing Justices of the Peace in this country. The purpose of my Bill is: in the first place, to give County and Municipal Councils power to appoint a certain number of Justices of the Peace, in proportion to the inhabitants; in the second place, my Bill provides that Chairmen of Boards of Guardians and Urban Sanitary Authorities shall be Justices of the Peace on the same principle that Mayors of towns are Justices, and that Aldermen in some cities, also elected, are Justices of the Peace; thirdly, I desire to abolish the property qualification in respect of the Justices so elected; and, fourthly, to provide for the retirement of a large number of gentlemen whose names are now in the Commission, but who have long ceased to do magisterial duty. No one can contend that the present method of nominating Justices of the Peace is in any way satisfactory, for they are nominated by an irresponsible official of the Crown—the Lord Lieutenant in counties, and in boroughs merely by the wire-pullers of the Party which at the time happen to be in office. This, I hold, is contrary to the principles of representative government. It is unsatisfactory to those who wish to enjoy the dignity of a Justice of the Peace, and it is unsatisfactory to the people at large. This is no new subject, for it was raised in this House as far back as the year 1876 by an hon. Member, in a Resolution, to the effect that the law needed speedy and thorough investigation with a view to its amendment; and the late Mr. John Bright held a very strong opinion of the same kind. I am a Justice of the Peace myself, both for a county and borough, and disclaim any idea of making an attack upon the present Magistrates. Many of them, no doubt, are zealous, conscientious, and thoroughly respected, and I am anxious not to give offence in any way to them; but I can hardly think anyone will contend that there is that confidence amongst the working classes in the administration of justice in our Courts of Petty Sessions which they ought to feel. I do not think that the decisions of the Great Unpaid are universally respected, and my desire is to inspire public confidence in these Petty Sessional Courts by introducing the principle of election. I base my argument on the broad principle that the present principle of nomination is inconsistent with the free and democratic institutions of this country, and is a mere relic of the old days of jobbery and patronage. Our old constitutional principle is that a man should be tried by his Peers, but that is not done in our Courts of Petty Sessions; for men of the working classes are tried by those who are commonly regarded as a superior class, above them, and I do not believe there are half a dozen Justices of the Peace belonging to the working classes in the whole country. The present system has the effect of setting class against class, and favours the exploded idea that it is the special function of owners of property to rule, and the fate of the poor to be ruled. There is amongst the people at large a perpetual soreness upon this point which must continue so long as the present system exists, so long as Benches, consisting entirely of men of property, decide questions affecting property, and game preservers are permitted to adjudicate upon cases of breach of the Game Laws. I am no advocate for electing Judges of the Superior Courts. They require special qualifications, and have to determine questions of law involving rights of property. But in criminal cases they are assisted by a jury. Justices of the Peace discharge the functions of both Judge and jury, and should be selected from all ranks of the people, and by men elected by the people, and in whom they have confidence. I know that many regard our social fabric as a building with its upper and lower floors. I would ask them to remember the Tower of Babel, and what became of it, when the gentlemen in the upper story ceased to understand the men on the ground floor. There is nothing in my Bill which militates against the appointment of paid Magistrates, and I should like to see our Borough and County Councils have power to appoint paid Magistrates for their own districts. I will, however, call attention to some of the evils in connection with the present system. The idea of election is not new, for at the present time elected Mayors are Justices, as are elected Coroners, elected Baillies, and in some boroughs Aldermen and Port-reves. In boroughs our Justices are now elected, but by whom? By the political wire-pullers of the particular Party which happens to be in power at the time. Their names are sent by the wire-pullers to the Lord Lieutenant, and by him forwarded to the Lord Chancellor, who goes through the decent farce of submitting the names to the Town Council. Poole was a peculiar place. It had 31 Magistrates and 14 policemen, yet the present Lord Chancellor added 4, on the ground that his predecessor had added 3, although it was not pretended that more Magistrates were required. In the case of Winchester, where there were 22 Magistrates and 19 policemen, a list of names so submitted was objected to, and, in reply to a question, the Home Secretary said that the Town Council exceeded its duty in so replying to the question asked by the Lord Chancellor. A Return presented to the House some time ago showed that throughout England the number of Justices who during the previous year had virtually abandoned their duties amounted to about 23 per cent. In Wiltshire, 25 per cent. were non-resident during the year, many permanently so; altogether about 36 per cent. of useless men were on the Commission. In that particular county, in 1886, the Lord Lieutenant appointed 77 Justices of the Peace, of whom 70 were members of the Political Party to which he belonged. It seems to me that the chief qualification necessary to obtain the dignity is to accept office in the Primrose League. In Wales few of the Justices are able to speak Welsh, and, though the great body of the inhabitants are Nonconformists, not 2 per cent. of the Justices are Nonconformists. It is true that one or two working men have been appointed Justices; but when, in 1886, the Attorney General was asked to nominate more he replied that he was not prepared to advise the Lord Chancellor to recommend one class more than another. That is just what I complain of. Gentlemen recommended for the Bench are entirely of one class.

MR. MATTHEWS: That is not what I desire to see.

*MR. SEALE-HAYNE: In Flintshire, where 97 per cent. of the inhabitants are Nonconformists, there is not a single Dissenter on the Bench. On that point, in answer to a question, the Home Secretary said that Justices were appointed without regard to their religious views, and that the Lord Lieutenant could not discover a single Nonconformist who possessed the necessary qualification. We should like to take it out of the power of the Home Secretary to make such a reply in the future. At Hanley six Justices were appointed in spite of the Petition of the Mayor and Corporation to this House; and in reply to the hon. Member for Sheffield the Minister replied that it was not the duty of the Secretary of State to interfere with the Lord Chancellor, the meaning of which was, apparently, that this House has no control over the Lord Chancellor in any way. In several places there are many more Magistrates than there are policemen, notably in Poole. I will now turn to the Bill. It provides for the retirement of Justices who do not attend to their duties for the space of one year, and that, Mr. Speaker, is desirable in order that more active gentlemen may be appointed to fill their places. It proposes also that Chairmen of Boards of Guardians, who, as a rule, are men thoroughly well known and respected in their districts, shall be Justices. When we have the long promised District and Parish Councils, the Chairmen of those Bodies, in the same way as elected Mayors, should have the powers of County Magistrates. In regard to election by the County Council, it may be objected that the elections will degenerate into a Party fight. It may be so in some instances, but the nominations at the present time are made for political purposes, and are frequently the subject of a backstairs contest. If we are to have a political contest it had better be in the open. I think the County Councils may be trusted to elect the best men in their localities, and I believe this would be a reform demanded by the working classes. Far from in any way weakening the administration of justice, if we introduced into municipal and county benches men on the elective principle, they would be held in greater respect, especially in the country districts, than at the present time. I beg to move that this Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Seale-Hayne.)

*(5.15.) MR. G. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): It is a fact that the experiment has been made of appointing a few working men as Justices, but we want a thorough revision of the mode of the appointment of Justices. We have no guarantee whatever that the person appointed is at all fit for the position he is called upon to occupy. No one can know anything of Justices of the Peace in many parts of the country without knowing that many of them are less learned in the law than prisoners who are brought before them. I think the time has come when an effort should be made to make the Bench of England worthy of the position it occupies. I admit that in popular elections we may not always get the best men to occupy the best positions, yet, speaking generally, we should have a better chance that the men would be fit for their positions than we have under the present system. The worst form of appointment is by the nomination of wire-pullers, it matters not to me whether by the Primrose League or by a Radical Association. I contend that the principle is wrong, and that men should be elected to that high and honourable position by reason of fitness. There are thousands of instances in which Justices have been interested in the cases which have come before them, and in which sentences have been inflicted far beyond their deserts. This has, however, been somewhat modified by the growth of public opinion. In the rural districts there have been cases of men found with ground game in their possession and tried by game-preserving Justices, and the wonder is that the people have not been entirely driven out of these rural districts by the way the Game Laws were administered. The Returns also will, I think, show that in some of our ports sailors have been sent to prison by Justices more or less connected with the shipping interest. It is hardly reasonable to think that these Justices would not look upon such cases with some degree of prejudice. The Criminal Law Amendment Act, passed in connection with the Trade Union Act and subsequently repealed, afforded other illustrations, where employers of labour sent to prison men brought up under that Act. In the case of the Labour Laws, the then Home Secretary (Viscount Cross) endeavoured to prevent a miscarriage of justice by sending out some notes on the administration of the Law. It seems to me almost impossible that under the present system of appointment these preferences, partialities, and prejudices shall not come into play. I desire that the Law of England shall be administered in the most enlightened spirit by men competent to administer it, and I call in question the competency of a great number of the men who now sit on the Bench. There are many points in the Bill which may be amended in Committee, and, as this is the first attempt in which we have been successful in bringing the Bill before the House, I support the Second Reading of the Bill.

enough to grasp the very simple principles of our law and to apply them with an unwavering desire to do justice. It has been said that the present system does not lead to the appointment of as many Non-conformists and as many working men as hon. Members desire. I have myself urged the Lord Lieutenants in Wales to do their best to appoint qualified members of the Nonconformist Body who might be recommended to the Lord Chancellor.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: Quite in vain.

*MR. MATTHEWS: No, not quite in vain, though not so many have been recommended as I could wish. The appointment of working men as Magistrates does not fairly arise on this Bill, so that it is not necessary to embark on the enormous change that this Bill proposes in order to modify the qualifications, so as to make it more easy for working men to be appointed to the Commission. Instances have not been infrequent, however, where in boroughs working men have been placed on the Commission. The hon. Member for Bethnal Green talked about Judges interested in a conviction adjudicating in a case. Of course that is very much to be lamented, that we ever should have a Judge sitting to try a case in which his interests incline either to one side or the other; and in our recent legislation we have endeavoured, so far as we could, to prevent that. It is prohibited by provisions in the "Mines Regulation Act," and in many similar Acts of that sort. For my part, I should be extremely glad to see those provisions extended to all cases in which that sort of interest prevails; but I assure the hon. Gentleman that it would not be easy to remedy that state of things by taking Judges from a class from which they have not been hitherto taken. Your *employé*s will not have less interest than your employer, and you will have the same objection with regard to working classes as with regard to employers. That is inevitable, I think. These prejudices and these prepossessions will occur as objections to the working man just as much as to the employer.

Mr. H. Matthews

MR. GEORGE HOWELL: If the right hon. Gentleman remembers I put it in that form—that prejudices were inevitable.

MR. MATTHEWS: Then we agree. These prejudices are inevitable. It is one of the infirmities of human nature. But this Bill will not cure, and your elected borough and county Justices will be no more free from it than the existing Justices.

*(6.25.) COLONEL W. CORNWALLIS WEST (Denbigh, W.): As some remarks have been made with regard to Wales I desire to say a few words with reference to the appointment of Magistrates. I can only say that it is wrong and unfair for any insinuation to be thrown out in this House that the Lords Lieutenant of Wales are actuated solely by Party feeling in the appointments they make. I can only say for myself, as one of those officials, that I have endeavoured to the best of my ability to discover gentlemen to be added to the Commission who differ from me in politics and religion, and I have asked persons cognisant with the county to give me the names of any Nonconformists who ought to be put in the Commission of the Peace. When I discovered these gentlemen I appointed them. But I assure the House that so long as the property qualification remains it is almost impossible to find Nonconformists with the necessary qualification. I acknowledge that, and I, for one, would have no objection to see the property qualification either considerably reduced or done away with. I have been fortunate enough to find some gentlemen able to qualify in my county who are Nonconformists, and they make excellent Magistrates; but, at the same time, I do not consider whether a man is a Nonconformist or a member of the Church of England—I never take the slightest regard as to what his religious opinions are, and I believe that the majority of the Lords Lieutenant do the same. If we know that a man is a just man, a man of ability, a man of education, we say that that man will, in all probability, obtain the confidence of the community, and it is unfair to say that we are actuated in the appointments we make solely from political and religious motives. Now with regard to this Bill, I will not detain the House by criticism, but I confess that I look with the greatest possible mistrust on any suggestions made for the election of Magistrates. I myself believe that in a country like Wales, where Party spirit runs very high, if you are going to give the appointment of Magistrates to the County Councils you will find gentlemen of means and position who do not happen to be members of the dominant Party excluded altogether from the business of the county in which they take a great interest. Now that I think is a decided objection; and I say further that, even now they are largely excluded from the County Councils, that they do not take that interest in the county they used to take, and numbers of them are actually going away. For my part, I would prefer to retain that class of persons in the county and not to deprive them of what I consider they do now extremely well, namely, the judicial business connected with the neighbourhood in which they reside. I can only say that, so far as the county with which I am connected is concerned, I believe that the Magistrates are actuated by a desire to do justice to all, and as a matter of fact I believe that there is not, at the present moment, any actual dislike or suspicion whatever against the Magistrates in the counties; but unfortunately there are those who are actuated with political objects, and who raise a suspicious feeling against them with the desire of excluding them not only from judicial work, but every other work if they can, in the county.

*(6.30.) MR. MANFIELD (Northampton): I should like to say, Sir, that I am in favour of the elective principle being adopted in the matter of the appointment of Magistrates. In the borough which I represent it has been customary for the Town Council to recommend the Magistrates, and we have never had a single complaint during the whole time that system has been maintained. There have been cases where by backstairs influence a list has been sent to the Lord Chancellor who has very much disapproved them. I am in favour of the people having the power of electing those who are to govern them, and I believe from my experience that if they make a mistake they will rather bear the burden of that mistake than have a person put in authority over them with whom they have no sympathy, and in whose election they have had no voice. All that is wanted in a Magistrate is that he should be a fair-minded and just man, a man of common sense, who will judge fairly and honestly the people who come before him, and who will temper justice with mercy.

*(6.33.) MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I do not think, Sir, that the question which is raised in this Bill is one that can be adequately discussed or properly settled by means of a private Members' Bill. One of the chief objections to the Bill in its present shape is this—that no evidence at all has been shown of any dissatisfaction with regard to the action of the Magistrates.—[Opposition cries of "Oh, oh!"]—The exclamation "Oh!" does not answer my argument. Sir, no one having any experience of country life can fail to see that there are many and grave objections to having popularly elected Magistrates. I notice that the attacks on the present magisterial system generally come from those who would like to write the letters J.P. after their names, and when they are allowed to do that, the occasions are rare when J.P. does not appear in largest possible type after their names. The chief objection to electing Magistrates by the popular vote is this—that it will at once bring to the front all the faddists. Some would not be voted for unless opposed to vaccination, or the liability of poor people to contribute to the maintenance of their parents, or against convictions for non-attendance of children at school—no man would be elected unless he agreed to do these. Then the liquor trade would come to the front, and I would ask hon. Gentlemen how the work of the counties is to be carried on if all these faddists have their way. Freedom of action by Justices would be rendered impossible where pledges had been imposed and given. Complaint, Sir, has been made that Magistrates did not attend regularly to their duties.

Attend to what? There are, of course, some men who do not sit regularly on the Bench at Petty Sessions or Quarter Sessions, but they do other work, certainly not less important or useful, such as work in connection with Boards of Guardians, Highway Boards, and Assessment Committees. If Magistrates are to be elected for one year, how they are to render effective service in such matters I do not know. There are certain people who are in favour of an alteration of the qualification necessary for Magistrates. I will not go into that now, but I think it might be considered. The whole question ought, indeed, to be considered seriously, and not at the initiative of a private Member. The question, in my opinion, is brought forward more as an electioneering move than as a serious proposal. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

MR. BAUMANN (Peckham) : I beg to second that.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Llewellyn.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire) : Sir, I do not think that the argument which has been used by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down is a very honourable argument. The hon. Gentleman says that the objections to the present system of selecting Magistrates come, more or less, from those who are anxious to write the letters "J.P." after their name, and that, I think, is not in itself an argument of a very honourable kind to throw out against hon. Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House.

MR. LLEWELLYN : I must really be allowed to explain. I did not say it was because hon. Gentlemen were not Magistrates that they complained, but that the objections which were raised very often came from those who were not Magistrates.

*MR. T. ELLIS : I am very glad that the hon. Gentleman has withdrawn an

Mr. Llewellyn

insinuation which, I am bound to say, the whole House understood to be applied to Members sitting on this side. Now, with regard to the speech of the hon. Member for West Denbighshire, the House is aware that the hon. Gentleman is the Lord Lieutenant of the county. And, on turning to the list of the Magistrates of the county, I find that one of them is a clergyman for an adjoining county, another a Baronet in Scotland, another a gentleman from Chester, another a Lieutenant-General from Somersetshire.

COL. CORNWALLIS WEST : I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but the probability is that the names he has read out are those of gentlemen who once resided in the county and have since left.

*MR. T. ELLIS : If these gentlemen are only on the list, and never come to the county for effective magisterial purposes, then one useful object will be served by this Bill by the removal of their names. The hon. Gentleman the Member for West Denbigh seemed to think he had placed on the Bench every Nonconformist who was qualified. Sir, the Chairman of the County Council of the County of Denbigh, as in several other counties, has had to be made a Magistrate by the operation of the Local Government Act.

COL. CORNWALLIS WEST : May I be permitted to say that the Chairman of the County Council has been offered the position of a Magistrate two or three times, and he has always refused.

*MR. T. ELLIS : I admit candidly that I did not know that he had refused, but I can quite understand that he refused to be made a Magistrate according to the present system. I have myself had the honour of being offered the office two or three times, but I refused, because I did not possess the necessary qualification, and because it would not be possible for me to discharge the duties while sitting in this House. In Flintshire the Chairman of the County Council is a Magistrate simply because of his election to the chairmanship. There very few Liberals on the Bench, the Lord Lieutenant has used persistently to put any Nonconformist on the Bench whether he had the necessary qualification or not. In the county of Gloucester the Chairman of the County Council is only Magistrate ex officio, and, if this were not enough, the Home Secretary must needs go to Wales for illustration. In Cardiganshire the chairman of the Quarter Sessions is a Worcestershire barrister (Mr. Willis Ward), who happens to own a fishing lease in the county, and the chief part has taken in the work of the Bench as a member of the Joint Police Committee, on which he has used his authority as a lawyer to frustrate the wishes of the County Council. In Carmarthenshire the Nonconformists form overwhelming majority (75 to per cent.), and yet there is only Nonconformist on the Bench, he was appointed after he became Liberal Unionist. The Lord Lieutenant, the Earl Cawdor, following the example of the Lord Lieutenant of Shropshire, refused to place any Nonconformist on the Bench, therefore his Lord Emlyn was driven from the representation of his county, and is now obliged to go to Manchester in order to try and get a seat in this use. There is nothing against him personally, but he represents a system which boycotts the majority of the people of the county. The result of the County Council elections in Carmarthenshire and Flintshire is largely owing to deep discontent felt with the present system of electing Magistrates. The hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary tried to picture the terrible evils of the system of elective Magistrates in America. He did not know the system itself, and he used the argument most unfairly. He used the American bogey instead of the provisions of this Bill, which enables County Councils to elect Magistrates, whereas in reality

American system is one of direct popular election. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Somersetshire said, If you agree to this Bill, you have Magistrates elected solely by faddists and the anti-vaccinationists: but these persons have and ought to have very little power, unless at a General Election. When that is over, they have little influence upon the proceedings of the elected council. The hon. Gentleman said if this Bill passed, it would exclude the minority altogether. I venture to say that I do not believe any County Council in England or Wales would be guilty of such a proceeding; and I have no doubt that county gentlemen, clergymen, and others, would be put upon the Commission of the Peace, from time to time, by the Councils of counties where Nonconformists may be in a large majority.

(6.55.) MR. STORY-MASKEYLYNE (Wilts, Cricklade): Sir, I believe this Bill to be one that can very easily be put in shape in Committee, and I think it ought to be read a second time. A great deal has been said about the question of election, and something was said about the faddist who would be brought into the field to put this and that person on the Bench, but it seems to be forgotten that what is proposed by this Bill is a system of election carried out not by the people, but by a grave and thoroughly representative body, namely the County Council. To such a body I can see no objection, not to giving the whole of the magisterial appointments to them, but to giving them a portion. This Bill proposes that one Magistrate should be appointed for each Petty Sessional Division. The election of a Magistrate is a very different thing from the election of a Judge by popular vote. In the one case you have to take into consideration that the man who is to be appointed Judge has already shown great judicial capacity and knowledge of Law, but the individual Magistrate is only one of several who act together, and if he can bring to the Bench the necessary time and the necessary knowledge, I think it would be a very good thing if he were appointed in the way proposed by this Bill.

(6.58.) MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): Sir, I agree with the hon. Member for Somersetshire that this is a crude and a badly drawn Bill, but I am not prepared to condemn it in the wholesale fashion adopted by the Home Secretary, and in voting against the Bill I must not be taken as endorsing everything that the Home

Secretary said. I am decidedly in favour of doing away with the property qualification, and I am also in favour of striking off the list those magistrates who have not attended to their duties for the last three years. I think one year is too short.

(7.0.) MR. A. E. GATHORNE-HARDY (Sussex, East Grinstead) : I only wish to point out that the property qualification is not removed by this Bill, which merely removes it in the case of the new members to be elected. If it had been simply a question of the property qualification, I should have been very much inclined to agree with the last speaker; but the principle of this Bill appears to be that of electing Magistrates, and to that I am opposed. For that reason I intend to give my vote against the Second Reading.

Question put, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

The House divided:—Ayes 125 ; Noes 168.—(Div. List, No. 3.)

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) ACT (1890) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 129.)

SECOND READING.

(7.15.) Order for Second Reading read.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) : I bring in this Bill at the request of the Municipal Corporations Association, which consists of the municipal boroughs of the United Kingdom, including both county and non-county boroughs; and a Resolution in favour of this Bill was passed unanimously by that Association after a discussion, in which the interests of both county and non-county boroughs were represented. The bill also bears the endorsement of men of all political parties. By the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Act of 1890, large funds are placed at the disposal of County Councils for the purposes of technical education. The administration of those funds vests in the County Council themselves, and the claims of municipal boroughs, which are non-county boroughs, to have the administration of them are not recognised, except permissively under a provision of the Local Taxation Act, by which non-county boroughs may be permitted by the County Council to distribute their own share of the grant. Now, in many cases, this permission has been refused by the County Council, and in some other instances, notably in Lancashire, when permission has been granted, conditions have been fixed which are at variance with the principles of local self-government, and subordinate, in many respects, the non-county borough to the views and instructions of the County Council. The County Council has, in some cases, even attempted to impose conditions as to local government within the borough itself as a condition of the administration of any part of the technical education grant. The grounds on which a change is now proposed in the law are: first, that a provision that the right of administration should not be permissive, but obligatory on the part of municipal boroughs, would be for the advantage of local self-government. The municipal boroughs have set both a precedent and example for county administration. The County Councils of which no one has any jealousy, and certainly not I, but much the contrary, for I heartily supported the County Councils Act of 1888, are a newer institution, and those who are members of them are necessarily wanting yet in the long acquired experience which has been obtained by members of municipal corporations. Then I contend that the proposed change will be an advantage to technical education itself, and I need not remind the House of the variety of forms which technical education necessarily assumes. It has to be adapted to many trades, to many occupations, and to many surroundings. For instance, the County of York is one of the chief governmental areas in England, and the avocations of its people are very various, so that in administering the education grant, an account must be taken of an almost infinite variety of circumstances. It is almost impossible to secure in one Central County Council, men of the varied capacities required in many districts in such a large area for dealing with technical education. And, apart altogether from the question of local self-government, technical education demands local application, and it is only through some local system that it can be made thoroughly effective. The object of this Bill is to make obligatory what, in some counties, has been refused, and in others granted only under disparaging conditions. The Bill will enable any non-county borough having less than 50,000 inhabitants, to require, by notice to the County Council, that its share of the grant shall be placed at its own disposal for the purpose of meeting the wants of that particular locality. The manner in which the Bill is to be worked is indicated by Section 3, in which the share of a borough in the money received by the Council of the county is to be ascertained for the purposes of this Act, according to the proportion which the rateable value of the borough bears to the rateable value of the whole administration of the county ; and when that proportion has been ascertained, then the transfer of the fund will be made, and it will in future be administered in the locality according to its requirements. There are one or two precedents which materially bear upon this question. In the first place, in the discussion in this House on the Transfer of Powers Bill, the autonomy of the non-county boroughs was distinctly recognised by the President of the Local Government Board ; and there is another precedent even more in point, for in the Technical Education Act of 1889, powers are given to any local authority to provide for technical instruction, and the definition of "local authority" is, that it means the Council of any county or borough, and any Urban Sanitary Authority within the meaning of the Public Health Act, the latter two of which are distinctly local bodies and bodies of small area ; and it is obvious that it is undesirable there should be a want of conformity between the sources and areas for the provision of technical instruction. I will only deal finally with one objection which I think may be raised to this Bill, and that is that the passage of the County Councils Bill has been so recent as to create an indisposition to effect an alteration in it without giving the Act some reasonable trial. My answer is that some years have now elapsed since that measure was passed, and that, undoubtedly, while its general scope and operation has been beneficial to the community, there are minor defects in practice that suggest themselves for remedy, and which, being redressed, will give greater strength to the provisions of the Statute. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir A. Rollit.)

(7.30.) THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. W. H. LONG, Wilts, Devizes) : I am sure, Sir, the House will admit very readily the full right of my hon. Friend to propose a measure of this kind, and to represent, on such a question either Municipal Corporations or the subject of technical education itself. But I want to point out that there are two questions which we have to consider when we approach this Bill. The first is, What would be the effect on Local Government of such a measure ; and the second is what would be the effect of the Bill on Technical Education itself ? As far as local government goes I am not prepared to say for one moment that the effect would be in any way injurious. At the same time it must be evident that it departs to some extent from the conclusions arrived at by the House when it passed the Bill of 1888, and, later on, when it passed the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Act of 1890. This question of the subordination of boroughs of less than 50,000 inhabitants to the County Council in the matter of technical education was thoroughly and amply discussed in Committee on both these Bills. The boroughs found able advocates on both sides of the House, but the House came to the conclusion that in the interest of local government the County Councils should be as large and powerful as was possible. Whether it would be wise or not in the interests of technical education to reduce the powers enough to grasp the very simple principles of our law and to apply them with an unwavering desire to do justice. It has been said that the present system does not lead to the appointment of as many Nonconformists and as many working men as hon. Members desire. I have myself urged the Lord Lieutenants in Wales to do their best to appoint qualified members of the Nonconformist Body who might be recommended to the Lord Chancellor.

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: Quite in vain.

*MR. MATTHEWS: No, not quite in vain, though not so many have been recommended as I could wish. The appointment of working men as Magistrates does not fairly arise on this Bill, so that it is not necessary to embark on the enormous change that this Bill proposes in order to modify the qualifications, so as to make it more easy for working men to be appointed to the Commission. Instances have not been infrequent, however, where in boroughs working men have been placed on the Commission. The hon. Member for Bethnal Green talked about Judges interested in a conviction adjudicating in a case. Of course that is very much to be lamented, that we ever should have a Judge sitting to try a case in which his interests incline either to one side or the other; and in our recent legislation we have endeavoured, so far as we could, to prevent that. It is prohibited by provisions in the "Mines Regulation Act," and in many similar Acts of that sort. For my part, I should be extremely glad to see those provisions extended to all cases in which that sort of interest prevails; but I assure the hon. Gentleman that it would not be easy to remedy that state of things by taking Judges from a class from which they have not been hitherto taken. Your employés will not have less interest than your employer, and you will have the same objection with regard to working classes as with regard to employers. That is inevitable, I think. These prejudices and these prepossessions will occur as objections to the working man just as much as to the employer.

Mr. H. Matthews

MR. GEORGE HOWELL: If the right hon. Gentleman remembers I put it in that form—that prejudices were inevitable.

MR. MATTHEWS: Then we agree. These prejudices are inevitable. It is one of the infirmities of human nature. But this Bill will not cure, and your elected borough and county Justices will be no more free from it than the existing Justices.

*(6.25.) COLONEL W. CORNWALLIS WEST (Denbigh, W.): As some remarks have been made with regard to Wales I desire to say a few words with reference to the appointment of Magistrates. I can only say that it is wrong and unfair for any insinuation to be thrown out in this House that the Lords Lieutenant of Wales are actuated solely by Party feeling in the appointments they make. I can only say for myself, as one of those officials, that I have endeavoured to the best of my ability to discover gentlemen to be added to the Commission who differ from me in politics and religion, and I have asked persons cognisant with the county to give me the names of any Nonconformists who ought to be put in the Commission of the Peace. When I discovered these gentlemen I appointed them. But I assure the House that so long as the property qualification remains it is almost impossible to find Nonconformists with the necessary qualification. I acknowledge that, and I, for one, would have no objection to see the property qualification either considerably reduced or done away with. I have been fortunate enough to find some gentlemen able to qualify in my county who are Nonconformists, and they make excellent Magistrates; but, at the same time, I do not consider whether a man is a Nonconformist or a member of the Church of England—I never take the slightest regard as to what his religious opinions are, and I believe that the majority of the Lords Lieutenant do the same. If we know that a man is a just man, a man of ability, a man of education, we say that that man will, in all probability, obtain the confidence of the community, and it is unfair to say hat we are actuated in the appointments we make solely from political and religious motives. Now with regard to his Bill, I will not detain the House by criticism, but I confess that I look with the greatest possible mistrust on any suggestions made for the election of Magistrates. I myself believe that in a country like Wales, where Party spirit runs very high, if you are going to give the appointment of Magistrates to the County Councils you will find gentlemen of means and position who do not happen to be members of the dominant Party excluded altogether from the business of the county in which they take a great interest. Now what I think is a decided objection; and I say further that, even now they are largely excluded from the County Councils, that they do not take that interest in the county they used to take, and numbers of them are actually going away. For my part, I would prefer to retain that class of persons in the county and not to deprive them of what I consider they do now extremely well, namely, the judicial business connected with the neighbourhood in which they reside. I can only say that, so far as the county with which I am connected is concerned, I believe that the Magistrates are actuated by a desire to do justice to all, and as a matter of fact I believe that there is not, at the present moment, any actual dislike or suspicion whatever against the Magistrates in the counties; but unfortunately there are those who are actuated with political objects, and who raise a suspicious feeling against them with the desire of excluding them not only from judicial work, but every other work if they can, in the county.

*(6.30.) MR. MANFIELD (Northampton): I should like to say, Sir, that I am in favour of the elective principle being adopted in the matter of the appointment of Magistrates. In the borough which I represent it has been customary for the Town Council to recommend the Magistrates, and we have never had a single complaint during the whole time that system has been maintained. There have been cases where by backstairs influence a list has been sent to the Lord Chancellor who has very much disappointed them. I am in favour of the people having the power of electing those who are to govern them, and I believe from my experience that if they make a mistake they will rather bear the burden of that mistake than have a person put in authority over them with whom they have no sympathy, and in whose election they have had no voice. All that is wanted in a Magistrate is that he should be a fair-minded and just man, a man of common sense, who will judge fairly and honestly the people who come before him, and who will temper justice with mercy.

*(6.33.) MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I do not think, Sir, that the question which is raised in this Bill is one that can be adequately discussed or properly settled by means of a private Members' Bill. One of the chief objections to the Bill in its present shape is this—that no evidence at all has been shown of any dissatisfaction with regard to the action of the Magistrates.—[Opposition cries of "Oh, oh!"]—The exclamation "Oh!" does not answer my argument. Sir, no one having any experience of country life can fail to see that there are many and grave objections to having popularly elected Magistrates. I notice that the attacks on the present magisterial system generally come from those who would like to write the letters J.P. after their names, and when they are allowed to do that, the occasions are rare when J.P. does not appear in largest possible type after their names. The chief objection to electing Magistrates by the popular vote is this—that it will at once bring to the front all the faddists. Some would not be voted for unless opposed to vaccination, or the liability of poor people to contribute to the maintenance of their parents, or against convictions for non-attendance of children at school—no man would be elected unless he agreed to do these. Then the liquor trade would come to the front, and I would ask hon. Gentlemen how the work of the counties is to be carried on if all these faddists have their way. Freedom of action by Justices would be rendered impossible where pledges had been imposed and given. Complaint, Sir, has been made that Magistrates did not attend regularly to their duties.

Attend to what? There are, of course, some men who do not sit regularly on the Bench at Petty Sessions or Quarter Sessions, but they do other work, certainly not less important or useful, such as work in connection with Boards of Guardians, Highway Boards, and Assessment Committees. If Magistrates are to be elected for one year, how they are to render effective service in such matters I do not know. There are certain people who are in favour of an alteration of the qualification necessary for Magistrates. I will not go into that now, but I think it might be considered. The whole question ought, indeed, to be considered seriously, and not at the initiative of a private Member. The question, in my opinion, is brought forward more as an electioneering move than as a serious proposal. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

MR. BAUMANN (Peckham) : I beg to second that.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Llewellyn.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire) : Sir, I do not think that the argument which has been used by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down is a very honourable argument. The hon. Gentleman says that the objections to the present system of selecting Magistrates come, more or less, from those who are anxious to write the letters "J.P." after their name, and that, I think, is not in itself an argument of a very honourable kind to throw out against hon. Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House.

MR. LLEWELLYN : I must really be allowed to explain. I did not say it was because hon. Gentlemen were not Magistrates that they complained, but that the objections which were raised very often came from those who were not Magistrates.

*MR. T. ELLIS : I am very glad that the hon. Gentleman has withdrawn an

Mr. Llewellyn

insinuation which, I am bound to say, the whole House understood to be applied to Members sitting on this side. Now, with regard to the speech of the hon. Member for West Denbighshire, the House is aware that the hon. Gentleman is the Lord Lieutenant of the county. And, on turning to the list of the Magistrates of the county, I find that one of them is a clergyman for an adjoining county, another a Baronet in Scotland, another a gentleman from Chester, another a Lieutenant-General from Somersetshire.

COL. CORNWALLIS WEST : I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but the probability is that the names he has read out are those of gentlemen who once resided in the county and have since left.

*MR. T. ELLIS : If these gentlemen are only on the list, and never come to the county for effective magisterial purposes, then one useful object will be served by this Bill by the removal of their names. The hon. Gentleman the Member for West Denbigh seemed to think he had placed on the Bench every Nonconformist who was qualified. Sir, the Chairman of the County Council of the County of Denbigh, as in several other counties, has had to be made a Magistrate by the operation of the Local Government Act.

COL. CORNWALLIS WEST : May I be permitted to say that the Chairman of the County Council has been offered the position of a Magistrate two or three times, and he has always refused.

*MR. T. ELLIS : I admit candidly that I did not know that he had refused, but I can quite understand that he refused to be made a Magistrate according to the present system. I have myself had the honour of being offered the office two or three times, but I refused, because I did not possess the necessary qualification, and because it would not be possible for me to discharge the duties while sitting in this House. In Flintshire the Chairman of the County Council is a Magistrate simply because of his election to the chairmanship. There are very few Liberals on the Bench, and the Lord Lieutenant has refused persistently to put any Nonconformist on the Bench whether he had the necessary qualification or not. In the county of Anglesey the Chairman of the County Council is only Magistrate ex officio, and, as if this were not enough, the Home Secretary must needs go to Wales for his illustration. In Cardiganshire the Chairman of the Quarter Sessions is a Worcestershire barrister (Mr. Willis Bund), who happens to own a fishing lodge in the county, and the chief part he has taken in the work of the Bench is as a member of the Joint Police Committee, on which he has used his ingenuity as a lawyer to frustrate the wishes of the County Council. In Carmarthenshire the Nonconformists form an overwhelming majority (75 to 35 per cent.), and yet there is only one Nonconformist on the Bench, and he was appointed after he became a Liberal Unionist. The Lord Lieutenant, the Earl Cawdor, following the example of the Lord Lieutenant of Flintshire, refused to place any Nonconformist on the Bench, therefore his son Lord Emlyn was driven from the representation of his county, and is now obliged to go to Manchester in order to try and get a seat in this House. There is nothing against him personally, but he represents a system which boycotts the majority of the people of the county. The result of the County Council elections in Carmarthenshire and Flintshire is largely owing to the deep discontent felt with the present system of electing Magistrates. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary tried to picture the terrible evils of the system of elective Magistrates in America. He did not know the system himself, and he used the argument most unfairly. He used the American bogey against the provisions of this Bill, which enables County Councils to select Magistrates, whereas in reality the American system is one of direct popular election. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Somersetshire said, If you agree to this Bill, you will have Magistrates elected solely by the faddists and the anti-vaccinationists: but these persons have and ought to have very little power, unless at a General Election. When that is over, they have little influence upon the proceedings of the elected council. The hon. Gentleman said if this Bill passed, it would exclude the minority altogether. I venture to say that I do not believe any County Council in England or Wales would be guilty of such a proceeding; and I have no doubt that county gentlemen, clergymen, and others, would be put upon the Commission of the Peace, from time to time, by the Councils of counties where Nonconformists may be in a large majority.

(6.55.) MR. STORY-MASKELYNE (Wilts, Cricklade): Sir, I believe this Bill to be one that can very easily be put in shape in Committee, and I think it ought to be read a second time. A great deal has been said about the question of election, and something was said about the faddist who would be brought into the field to put this and that person on the Bench, but it seems to be forgotten that what is proposed by this Bill is a system of election carried out not by the people, but by a grave and thoroughly representative body, namely the County Council. To such a body I can see no objection, not to giving the whole of the magisterial appointments to them, but to giving them a portion. This Bill proposes that one Magistrate should be appointed for each Petty Sessional Division. The election of a Magistrate is a very different thing from the election of a Judge by popular vote. In the one case you have to take into consideration that the man who is to be appointed Judge has already shown great judicial capacity and knowledge of Law, but the individual Magistrate is only one of several who act together, and if he can bring to the Bench the necessary time and the necessary knowledge, I think it would be a very good thing if he were appointed in the way proposed by this Bill.

(6.58.) MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): Sir, I agree with the hon. Member for Somersetshire that this is a crude and a badly drawn Bill, but I am not prepared to condemn it in the wholesale fashion adopted by the Home Secretary, and in voting against the Bill I must not be taken as endorsing everything that the Home

Secretary said. I am decidedly in favour of doing away with the property qualification, and I am also in favour of striking off the list those magistrates who have not attended to their duties for the last three years. I think one year is too short.

(7.0.) MR. A. E. GATHORNE-HARDY (Sussex, East Grinstead): I only wish to point out that the property qualification is not removed by this Bill, which merely removes it in the case of the new members to be elected. If it had been simply a question of the property qualification, I should have been very much inclined to agree with the last speaker; but the principle of this Bill appears to be that of electing Magistrates, and to that I am opposed. For that reason I intend to give my vote against the Second Reading.

Question put, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

The House divided:—Ayes 125; Noes 168.—(Div. List, No. 3.)

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) ACT (1890) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 129.)

SECOND READING.

(7.15.) Order for Second Reading read.

*SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I bring in this Bill at the request of the Municipal Corporations Association, which consists of the municipal boroughs of the United Kingdom, including both county and non-county boroughs; and a Resolution in favour of this Bill was passed unanimously by that Association after a discussion, in which the interests of both county and non-county boroughs were represented. The bill also bears the endorsement of men of all political parties. By the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Act of 1890, large funds are placed at the disposal of County Councils for the purposes of technical education. The administration of those funds vests in the County Council themselves, and the claims of municipal boroughs, which are non-county boroughs, to have the administration of them are not recognised, except permissively under a provision of the Local Taxation Act, by which non-county boroughs may be permitted by the County Council to distribute their own share of the grant. Now, in many cases, this permission has been refused by the County Council, and in some other instances, notably in Lancashire, when permission has been granted, conditions have been fixed which are at variance with the principles of local self-government, and subordinate, in many respects, the non-county borough to the views and instructions of the County Council. The County Council has, in some cases, even attempted to impose conditions as to local government within the borough itself as a condition of the administration of any part of the technical education grant. The grounds on which a change is now proposed in the law are: first, that a provision that the right of administration should not be permissive, but obligatory on the part of municipal boroughs, would be for the advantage of local self-government. The municipal boroughs have set both a precedent and example for county administration. The County Councils of which no one has any jealousy, and certainly not I, but much the contrary, for I heartily supported the County Councils Act of 1888, are a newer institution, and those who are members of them are necessarily wanting yet in the long acquired experience which has been obtained by members of municipal corporations. Then I contend that the proposed change will be an advantage to technical education itself, and I need not remind the House of the variety of forms which technical education necessarily assumes. It has to be adapted to many trades, to many occupations, and to many surroundings. For instance, the County of York is one of the chief governmental areas in England, and the avocations of its people are very various, so that in administering the education grant, an account must be taken of an almost infinite variety of circumstances. It is almost impossible to secure in one Central County Council, men of the varied capacities required in many districts in such a large area for dealing with technical education. And, apart altogether from the question of local self-government, technical education demands local application, and it is only through some local system that it can be made thoroughly effective. The object of this Bill is to make obligatory what, in some counties, has been refused, and in others granted only under disparaging conditions. The Bill will enable any non-county borough having less than 50,000 inhabitants, to require, by notice to the County Council, that its share of the grant shall be placed at its own disposal for the purpose of meeting the wants of that particular locality. The manner in which the Bill is to be worked is indicated by Section 3, in which the share of a borough in the money received by the Council of the county is to be ascertained for the purposes of this Act, according to the proportion which the rateable value of the borough bears to the rateable value of the whole administration of the county; and when that proportion has been ascertained, then the transfer of the fund will be made, and it will in future be administered in the locality according to its requirements. There are one or two precedents which materially bear upon this question. In the first place, in the discussion in this House on the Transfer of Powers Bill, the autonomy of the non-county boroughs was distinctly recognised by the President of the Local Government Board; and there is another precedent even more in point, for in the Technical Education Act of 1889, powers are given to any local authority to provide for technical instruction, and the definition of "local authority" is, that it means the Council of any county or borough, and any Urban Sanitary Authority within the meaning of the Public Health Act, the latter two of which are distinctly local bodies and bodies of small area; and it is obvious that it is undesirable there should be a want of conformity between the sources and areas for the provision of technical instruction. I will only deal finally with one objection which I think may be raised to this Bill, and that is that the passage of the County Councils Bill has been so recent as to create an indisposition to effect an alteration in it without giving the Act some reasonable trial. My answer is that some years have now elapsed since that measure was passed, and that, undoubtedly, while its general scope and operation has been beneficial to the community, there are minor defects in practice that suggest themselves for remedy, and which, being redressed, will give greater strength to the provisions of the Statute. I beg to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Heneage

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir A. Rollit.)

(7.30.) THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. W. H. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): I am sure, Sir, the House will admit very readily the full right of my hon. Friend to propose a measure of this kind, and to represent, on such a question either Municipal Corporations or the subject of technical education itself. But I want to point out that there are two questions which we have to consider when we approach this Bill. The first is, What would be the effect on Local Government of such a measure; and the second is what would be the effect of the Bill on Technical Education itself? As far as local government goes I am not prepared to say for one moment that the effect would be in any way injurious. At the same time it must be evident that it departs to some extent from the conclusions arrived at by the House when it passed the Bill of 1888, and, later on, when it passed the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Act of 1890. This question of the subordination of boroughs of less than 50,000 inhabitants to the County Council in the matter of technical education was thoroughly and amply discussed in Committee on both these Bills. The boroughs found able advocates on both sides of the House, but the House came to the conclusion that in the interest of local government the County Councils should be as large and powerful as was possible. Whether it would be wise or not in the interests of technical education to reduce the powers deliberately conferred on County Councils by these Acts I will not now stop to consider. How can we regard the Bill from the point of view of technical education? My hon. Friend told us that there were some cases in which County Councils had rather restricted their action. I do not imagine they have been absolutely free from blame in the matter, but anybody who has noted their action on the Bill of 1890 will agree that they have taken enormous pains to give practical effect to that Bill, and devoted themselves to it with a rare ability and spirit, which does them credit, and it would be a mistake to do anything in a hurry and without grave consideration, which might result in restricting their action, and thereby setting back to that extent technical education throughout the country. My hon. Friend, in anticipating some of the objections which might be raised against the Bill, said that some years had elapsed since the two Acts were passed. That term, some years, is capable of very elastic interpretation. The County Councils had only been in existence three years—in fact, the three years since their first election have not yet expired—and the Local Taxation Bill was passed in 1890.

SIR A. ROLLIT: I did not refer to that.

MR. LONG: Both measures are comparatively new, and deal with very important questions. I hope I have said nothing which would appear to oppose the Bill or the principle it upholds. It may be that it is a good measure, and that its principle is good, but the House must bear in mind that the possibilities to which I have referred do exist, and I would recommend the House, remembering these facts, and also that the Bill was only printed and circulated this morning, and also the largeness of the question, not to proceed to decide aye or no on this Bill to-night, if my hon. Friend and his supporters will consent to the adjournment of the Debate, for these brief reasons—that the County Councils, which will be seriously affected, may have time to consider the measure; and that those who are interested in technical education may decide whether the measure is one to find favour with them. At present both these bodies are in the same position as the House with regard to the Bill and its proposals. Then, when the House and the Government are seized of this information, they will be in a better position to decide whether the principle should be carried, or whether local government and the promotion of technical education should be left as it is. I venture further to add this: The House will regret as much as I do the absence of the President of the Local Government Board through illness, and is, I am sure, sensible of the loss sustained by his absence. If my hon. Friend and his supporters will consent to the course I suggest, when the Bill comes on again the House will, I hope, have the benefit of the presence and counsel of my right hon. Friend, who has been so closely identified with the measures with which this Bill deals. I beg to move the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Debate be now adjourned."
—(Mr. Long.)

SIR A. ROLLIT: I do not think, Sir, I can resist the appeal of my hon. Friend, and, with the concurrence of my hon. Friends, I accede to it.

Motion agreed to.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

Accounts presented,—for the year ended 31st March 1891, with report of the Comptroller and Auditor General thereon [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

SIAM (No. 1, 1892).

Copy presented,—of Report on a Journey in the Mé-Kong Valley by Mr. W. J. Archer, First Assistant in Her Majesty's Consular Service in Siam (with a map) [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS (1878 to 1890).

Copies presented,—of an Order, dated the 5th February 1892, and the Animals (Amendment) Order of 1892, No. 2 [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Eight o'clock.

SE OF COMMONS,

esday, 17th February, 1892.

ouse met at Twelve o'clock.

) Notice taken, that 40 Members not present; House counted,
Members being found present,

BANK OF ENGLAND.

laid upon the Table by the
the House.

all applications made by the First the Treasury and the Chancellor of quer to the Governor and Deputy of the Bank of England for ad-
Government authorised by Parlia-5th January, 1891, to 5th January, et.]

R IN DIVISION LIST, No. 2.

. ROBINSON (Gloucester): I to call your attention to the
it in the taking down of es for the Division List lay last my name has been as having voted against the ent of the hon. Member for lfast (Mr. Sexton). I beg to as not in the House, and did on that occasion.

PEAKER: The correction has been made. The hon. Mem-observe an erratum in the issued to-day, the name of Member for Dudley (Mr.
Robinson) being inserted in that of the hon. Member.

TERS OF THE DAY.

MUNICIPAL FRANCHISE (IRELAND)

BILL.—(No. 34.)

SECOND READING.

for Second Reading read.

) MR. CONDON (Tipperary, rising to move that this Bill ead a second time I have the confidence in the result, believing justice of the claim embodied easure will command itself to led men in all parts of the

The main provisions of the simply an embodiment of the
that the municipal franchise in Ireland should be assimilated to the same franchise as England. We have noticed in the Speech from the Throne that Her Majesty's Government intend to propose legislation

"For applying to Ireland the general principles affecting Local Government which have already been adopted in Great Britain."

And the proposition we now submit is that the principle shall be applied to the municipal franchise. This Bill has been discussed in this House over and over again, and the consensus of opinion, even in times not quite so advanced as the present, has been in favour of the principle of the Bill. I assume that there are a great many Members in the House acquainted with the extraordinary position Ireland occupies in relation to this matter as compared with England; but, still, I think it my duty to lay before the House a few points of dissimilarity in the position of our country. There are four classes of municipal towns in Ireland, each class having a different franchise. There are the municipal corporations of Dublin, Cork, Limerick, Waterford, Londonderry, and so on, eleven in number, and in these towns the municipal franchise is of the most prohibitive character. It is a £10 qualification, and any hon.
Member who is acquainted with Ireland will acknowledge that a £10 rating qualification means almost disfranchisement to the population generally. In the second class are the towns incorporated under the Act 9 Geo. IV.; in the third class are the towns under the Towns Improvement Act of 1854, and these are 77 in number; and, lastly, there are the townships with special Acts, such as Blackrock and others. In the first group we have mostly a £10 rating qualification. Dublin and Belfast are exceptions, and Belfast occupies a distinct position, owing to the Act which was passed in recent years at the instance of my hon. Friend (Mr.
Sexton). Though Dublin has nominally a household franchise, yet it is in reality a rating qualification of £8; that is to say, a man must have been resident for three years, or be rated at £8. I need not go into particulars of other towns in the third and fourth classes. In the third class a £4 rating qualifies for the franchise, which means in some of the small towns practical disqualification for the bulk of the inhabitants. Our contention, I say, is, as we put it forward in this Bill, that Ireland and England should be on the same footing as regards the municipal franchise. We hope and believe that the House will agree with us in this contention, that the House will affirm the principle, that the people of Ireland are as much entitled to the use of the municipal franchise as are the people of England, and I say they are as qualified to exercise the right of citizens in every respect as are the people of England. I have some figures here, which I have taken from the latest statistics I have at hand, which will show the House with what gross unfairness we are treated in this matter. There are 11 corporate towns in Ireland governed by Mayors, Aldermen, and Councillors, and I will quote figures in relation to six of these. I could quote the figures for all if it were necessary to do so, but I do not think it is desirable. Those I give will be sufficient to illustrate my contention. I begin with Dublin, and I will show you the population, the numbers on the burgess roll and on the Parliamentary register, because I have a word or two to say upon the difference between the Parliamentary and the municipal franchise; and I will afterwards institute a comparison between these towns and towns of an equal population in England, to show what an anomaly exists. I take the City of Dublin, the metropolis of Ireland. It has a population of 249,000, a burgess roll of 6,644, and a Parliamentary register of 30,000. Well, it appears to me, and I feel sure that no Member of the House will contest the proposition, that the affairs of the nation, as discussed in this Imperial Parliament, are not of less importance than the affairs with which a corporation has to deal; and if Parliament in its wisdom admits 30,000 of the population of the City of Dublin to the Parliamentary franchise, then surely, at least, an equal proportion should be permitted to exercise the municipal franchise. Yet here we find that the Parliamentary franchise exceeds by almost five times the municipal franchise. In the City of Cork there is a population of 80,000, and I find on the burgess roll 2,059 names, and the Parliamentary register has 11,500, and my remark applies equally to Cork. The City of Limerick is a more notable instance in the same direction. With a population of 38,000, Limerick has a burgess roll of 457, whereas on the Parliamentary register there are 4,827 of the inhabitants. Well, of course, if there were nothing else to attract the attention of hon. Members as something demanding remedy, Limerick would be sufficient upon which to base my claim for reform. Waterford has a population of 22,000, burgess roll 679, and the Parliamentary franchise in the hands of 4,000. Londonderry, with a population of 29,000, has a burgess roll of 799, and a Parliamentary register of 4,200. From the extraordinary differences in the figures relating to the two franchises, as by Law established, it must strike hon. Members as being of such a character as to demand immediate attention at our hands. I stated a while ago that in the Speech from the Throne the Government have signified their intention of meeting out equal justice in the matter of local government to England, Scotland, and Ireland; and now I invite attention to figures as they affect towns in England of about the same size as the Irish towns I have mentioned, to show the discrepancy, the injustice, of the franchise law under which our people suffer almost municipal disfranchisement. First, I take, as comparable with Dublin in population, the English town of Bristol. Dublin has a population of 249,000, Bristol has somewhat less in population, 206,000. But while Bristol has this smaller population, it has a burgess roll of 27,600, as against 6,644 in Dublin. Certainly an extraordinary difference between the two. Then Cork has its 80,000 inhabitants, and 2,059 on its burgess roll, and I take the town of Cardiff as about the same size, a population of 82,000, that is 2,000 more than Cork. Let Cardiff have all the benefit it is entitled to from this extra population. Still, that does not explain why Cardiff should have a burgess roll of 11,400 and Cork only 2,059. Surely, revision is wanted here. Now, Limerick affords a most remarkable example of the extraordinary condition of municipal affairs as between England and Ireland. The City of Limerick, as I have said, has a population of 38,000, and I take the English town of Cambridge for the sake of comparison. Cambridge has a population of 35,363, or, in round figures, 3,000 less than Limerick. But while the burgess roll in Limerick numbers 457, Cambridge, with its population 3,000 less, has 5,400 burgesses on its roll. Well, then, I say, if we are to have anything approaching equal treatment in these matters, Limerick demands attention. Waterford has 22,000 inhabitants and 679 on its burgess roll; and I find in England, Canterbury, with almost the same population—within a few hundreds—has a burgess roll of 3,090. Londonderry comes next, population 29,000, burgess roll 799; and the town in England I compare with it is Colchester, with upwards of 28,000 inhabitants and a burgess roll of 4,500. In the town of Clonmel there is a population of 9,300, and its burgess roll numbers 275, while the English town of Harrogate has a population of 9,400, but 1,700 burgesses. These figures will show the House how unfairly Ireland is treated in its municipal representation in an equal number of English and Irish towns. While in Ireland, out of a population of 427,000, there are something less than 11,000 of the inhabitants on the burgess rolls, in England, with a population of nearly 383,000, there are 53,700 on the burgess rolls. In other words, the proportion of burgesses to population in England is seven times greater than is the case in Ireland. The Parliamentary franchise in Ireland is a household franchise, and through that franchise householders have the power to elect representatives of Irish interests in this Imperial Parliament. But do you consider the national affairs to be of secondary importance to parochial and municipal matters—that you require a higher qualification for the municipal franchise? Such a contention would not bear discussion. Then, do you think that the hundreds of thousands who enjoy the Parliamentary franchise are more intelligent or better able to exercise that franchise than the educated intelligent artizans and traders in Irish towns, who are debarred from exercising any influence in the management of the towns where they have the greatest interest? Speaking from personal knowledge and experience among the artizan and trading classes in Ireland, I claim to say that there is no class of the community better qualified to exercise any franchise. There is gross inconsistency and injustice in this display of mistrust towards these masses of the Irish people. While they are entitled to vote for a Member of this House, and in a great many cases for Poor Law Guardians, they are debarred by Statute from voting for a member of a Town Council, and in regard to matters in which they have the most direct interest. The Bill I confidently recommend to the House is to remedy this anomalous state of affairs. Municipal boroughs in Ireland since Reformation days, and especially in latter times since they became popularised and nationalised, have given proof of their capacity to govern themselves efficiently, intelligently, and economically. We ask for nothing under this Bill beyond what the English people enjoy, and we appeal to the fair minds of English Members to give to the people of Ireland those rights—we do not call them privileges—those rights to which they are honestly entitled. I hope that if any opposition to the Bill should arise it will not emanate from any Irish Member, no matter what shade of politics he may represent here. Even should there be some opposition I feel that the justice of our claim must enlist the sympathy of the House generally on behalf of the Bill, the Second Reading of which I have now the honour to move.

(12.57.) MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): In rising to second the Motion for Second Reading, I think I may congratulate the new Chief Secretary for Ireland on the opportunity offered him to inaugurate his term of office by effecting this useful and long desired reform. I will not insult him or his Party by assuming for a moment that he, or they, have any intention to defend the monstrous state of things disclosed by the facts put forward in the speech of my hon. Friend, in a Session such as this, when we are promised a measure of County Government, framed, broadly speaking, on equal lines with the measure which has become law in England in the last few years. It would be absurd, indeed, to begin a Session of this kind with a defence from the Government Bench of such a state of things as my hon. Friend has described in his speech. The law relating to Municipal Corporations in Ireland is simply an anachronism which it is impossible to defend, and which I do not believe there will be any attempt to defend. We all know that when Sir Robert Peel consented to reform Municipal Corporations in Ireland, he, instead of meting out to that country the same beneficial treatment which had a few years before been applied to English Corporations, accompanied and clogged the benefit conveyed to Ireland in a number of ways. One of these was the abolition of a large number of Municipal Corporations, which had up to that time existed; and, secondly, there was the setting up as between England and Ireland of an invidious distinction; for whereas in England every occupier of rated premises had a municipal vote conferred upon him, there was set up in Ireland a £10 franchise, which has existed from that day to this. The law in Ireland in this matter remains exactly what it was 50 years ago; while for England Statute after Statute has been passed, broadening the franchise and extending popular rights and privileges, the law for Ireland remains substantively as it did when Her Majesty came to the Throne in 1837. Now, my hon. Friend has told the House that while in England every householder occupying rated premises exercises the municipal franchise, in Ireland that is so far from being the case that a £10 qualification is required. That naked fact does not disclose all the enormity of this absurd state of things, for let me call attention to the fact that in Ireland there is a great difference between rate and valuation. I occupy in the City of Cork rated premises valued at £10, the rent of which is £50. Now, I should like to hear any English Member in any part of the House getting up and attempting to defend a state of things of that kind as applied to England. Well, in the result, we have this extraordinary variation my hon. Friend has described as between the municipal and Parliamentary franchise, and as between the municipal franchise in England and in Ireland, and we have the extraordinary anomaly set up that, while for Parliamentary purposes you have a franchise existing in Ireland which one of the loyal minority described at the time it was extended as the "mud hovel franchise"—which confers a vote on the occupier of a mud hovel in Ireland—that while a man may be entitled to give a vote on questions of Imperial importance, on a question of peace or war, of Home Rule—on any question concerning the nation at large; when it comes to a question of the repair of the streets of the town in which he dwells, or the enforcement of sanitary regulations or other matters of municipal government, then Parliament shuts him out from any exercise of the franchise. Not only so, but other anomalies follow. My hon. Friend has mentioned that this state of things was so gross that when Parliament came to deal with the municipal affairs of Belfast the House felt itself compelled, before passing a scheme involving an expenditure of many hundreds of thousands of pounds in that city, to make provision to enable burgesses to express their opinion by an extension of the franchise. So you have arrived at this state of things, that while in the City of Dublin you have some 6,000 burgesses on the roll, in Belfast you have 30,000. So you have the anomaly as between the Parliamentary and municipal franchise, as between the municipal franchise in England and Ireland, and even among the 11 municipal boroughs of Ireland to which my hon. Friend referred, you have three different municipal franchises in existence. Who can defend a state of things of this description? I am sure the Government will not attempt it. Then, again, in Ireland we are in the unfortunate position that, not merely are we crippled by the Municipal Law, but also by the Act in reference to the collection of rates; and that which is conferred by the one Act is taken away by the other. For Dublin, Parliament passed a special Act conferring the right to vote on every householder, distinguishing the inhabitants of Dublin from the rest of the community. But then the Act for the collection of rates stepped in; the effect of which was to impose a qualification of £8 valuation. So, in Dublin, after Parliament had passed an Act conferring a vote on every householder, the effect of the Collection of Rates Act was to restrict that franchise to premises valued at £8. In a similar way, in small towns, the effect of restricting the franchise to £4 valuation is to shut out from the municipal vote that very class which I venture to say has the highest title to it and the most need for it. Who are the people most affected by the government of the small towns in Ireland? Who are most in need of sanitary matters being looked after? Those who occupy insanitary houses—the poor, the indigent, the needy. But these are of the very class Parliament has deliberately shut out from the exercise of the municipal franchise. I am sure, if we succeed in inducing the House to amend the law as regards the larger towns, the Government will show no disposition to limit the reform, but will extend it to the 79 towns governed under the Act of 1854. I assume that no one will attempt to defend the anomaly whereby in one small town the qualification for a vote is a £5 valuation, and in another small town five miles off a £4 qualification obtains. This matter of the municipal franchise has very largely attracted the attention of the working classes during the last two or three years, and anyone who has read the newspapers will know that it is a matter in which the artisans in the larger towns, such as Dublin and Cork, take the greatest interest. Naturally they think it is a very strange state of things that after Parliament has passed a great reform, and every householder has a vote for Parliamentary purposes conferred upon him, he should find himself excluded from a share in the municipal franchise. I assume the Government will announce an intention of putting an end to such an absurd state of things. But, if that should not be the case, then I am afraid we shall be obliged to draw some very strange conclusions as to the proposals the right hon. Gentleman intends to make when to-morrow he rises to announce reforms in the system of County Government in Ireland. But I will not insult the right hon. Gentleman by assuming he has any disposition to defend the present state of things. This Bill is intended to equalize the law between England and Ireland in the matter of the municipal franchise, and, after the repeated declarations in this House as to the necessity for governing Ireland by equal laws, I assume that the opportunity has now come for giving effect to those good intentions, and that a Second Reading will now be given to this Bill. If this Bill is required in the present day, it is simply because Parliament has not been able to attend to Irish matters. To-day, for about the twentieth time, the Irish Members introduce this measure; and I hope now, at the eleventh hour, the House will be induced to accept a Bill which will place the Irish people on a scale of equality with the people of England.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Condon.)

(1.15.) MR. DUNBAR BARTON (Armagh, Mid): The hon. Member who introduced this Bill said that no Member of the House could find fault with it. He referred to certain statistics and published figures, which I would remind the House had reference only to the municipal corporations; but he did not introduce any statistics with reference to the far larger, and by far the most far-reaching part of the Bill, to which I take strong exception. Sir, I take exception to this Bill on three grounds. In the first place, it is a misleading Bill. Its title would mislead anybody acquainted with Ireland or with Irish municipal law. I did not rely upon it, though it did mislead me. When I heard that a Municipal Franchise Bill was to be introduced in this House, I at once assumed it referred only to the municipal corporations, and I will show hon. Members opposite that I was right in assuming that. I have followed, although I was not in Parliament at the time, the Bills hon. Gentlemen opposite introduced in 1889 and 1890. I have these Bills with me, and I must say that they are very different indeed from this Bill; and one question which I should like to ask some of the hon. Gentlemen who will follow me in this debate is, Why is it that in these two Bills, which I have read most carefully, they studiously confine them to the municipal corporations, and that this year, in this Bill, the volume has grown, so that instead of a Bill dealing with 11 municipal corporations this Bill deals with 116 towns and townships? Why is it, Sir, that without any notice whatever this Bill has been extended in this way, so that, having been twice introduced in a form which made it applicable only to eleven municipal corporations, it is now to be extended to these 116 towns and townships? The Irish people have no knowledge of that change. The statistics of the hon. Gentleman opposite have reference to the municipal corporations; and in so far as those correspond with the municipal corporations in England under the Act of 1882, hon. Members opposite have much to urge, with justice and plausibility, with reference to this Bill. When they speak of assimilating the Law of England to the Law of Ireland, they want to assimilate it to the Municipal Corporations Act of 1882. But, Sir, if that is so, they should confine their Bill to the limits of the Act of 1882. I am bound to say I am not offering any narrow opposition to this Bill, and I am certainly not going to say anything disrespectful of my fellow-countrymen, but I do say that this is a Bill which, under a disguise, proposes to effect a change of which Ireland knows nothing. Now, what are the towns which will be affected? There are 12 towns and townships under a special Act of their own, and I should like to ask the representatives of North and South Dublin and of the St. Stephen's Green Division whether they are aware what the Bill proposes, and whether they know that the Bill contains provisions which were not in the Bills of the last two years I have mentioned? Within the last three weeks I saw a discussion that took place in the Blackrock township with reference to a Sewage Bill, and the question of the franchise being altered was then discussed, but no mention was made, or hint given, during that discussion by the people of that county that they were aware that a Bill was in preparation or about to be introduced to alter the municipal franchise. These towns and townships will be surprised to hear to-morrow that this House has been occupied to-day in discussing this matter, upon a Bill which seeks to effect so large a change. When the House was asked the other night to confirm a Resolution that it was incapable of governing Ireland, I think we are entitled to put forward this Bill as a specimen of what Irish Members would do in an Irish Parliament. I want to know whether these towns and townships are aware that a Bill of this kind has been introduced into this House? In Ireland the franchise varies. In Blackrock the franchise is £8, in Bray £7, in Dalkey £4, in Kingstown £4. Under the Act of 1828 there are eight towns, including Armagh, which I have the honour of representing, with a £5 franchise. Hon. Members seem to think that towns like Armagh should have their constitution altered without the Town Council or anybody else being consulted. There are 84 towns under the Act of 1854 which have a £4 rating franchise that will be entirely altered by this Bill. I ask, have any of these towns been consulted? If not, then I submit that my constituents should not have their franchise altered without full notice and adequate opportunity of discussion. Now, I must refer for one moment to the Bill itself. I observe that the term of residence proposed by this Bill is six months. In England the period fixed by the Municipal Corporations Act of 1882 is 12 months.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): No; rating 12, residence 6.

MR. BARTON: I do not think that six months is the period of the English Act. However, passing from that, I find a remarkable change in this Bill as compared with the Bills which were introduced in 1889 and 1890. I find that the rates to be discharged in order to qualify a voter are only the rates paid by the Governing Body — the borough rate.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): That is in accordance with Irish law.

MR. BARTON: The English law requires that the poor rate, as well as the borough rates, should be paid, in order to enable a householder to qualify, and in the Bills of 1889 and 1890 a provision of that kind was found. The change this year is so remarkable as to justify me in asking hon. Gentlemen opposite for some explanation. Then, Sir, there is an extraordinary omission to which I would like to call attention, namely, the absence of any proviso relating to the disqualification of voters, which is in the Belfast Act and the English Act. Do hon. Members mean to repeal this disqualification and to enfranchise those who are in receipt of poor relief? Now, Sir, the last two sections of the Bill are very remarkable sections, because, unlike anything I have ever seen in an Act of Parliament, the Bill proposes that the duty of making and issuing claims, revising the lists, hearing the claims, and so forth, should be left to the Local Government Board, to which they also give the wide discretion of enumerating the Acts, which they thought, judicially or otherwise, were repealed by this Act. The ordinary course is to set forth carefully in a Schedule any Acts which are altered, so that hon. Members may know which are repealed and which are not. Here the Local Government Board are left to do the work. I am glad that hon. Members have such confidence in the Local Government Board. It is certainly most suggestive, now that we are about to be asked to establish County Government in Ireland. When it is urged that there is necessity in Ireland as in England and Scotland for a Central Authority to control the County Boards, it will not lie in the mouths of hon. Gentlemen opposite to deny that the Irish Local Government Board can be safely entrusted with such controlling power, because they have given to the Local Government Board in their own Bill powers of modifying and repealing Acts of Parliament far wider than anything that Irish Members sitting on this side of the House would suggest with reference to Local Bodies in Ireland. I do not blame hon. Members much for this Bill, because we have it on the authority of a Dublin newspaper, the Evening Press, that this is a hurriedly-drafted Bill, introduced for the purpose of catching this Wednesday. Nor, Sir, do I think

Mr. Dunbar Barton

hon. Members can blame me as the Representative of a constituency, three or four towns of which will be affected, if I take objection to their privileges and their constitution being altered by a Bill drawn in this hasty way. It is disrespectful to the Municipal Authorities. I will ask, Do hon. Gentlemen seriously invite the House to endorse this Bill, which their own newspaper says has been hastily drafted, and which they cannot say adequately deals with the subject? If they want to assimilate the law of England and Ireland, let them bring in a Municipal Reform Bill, as was done in the Municipal Corporation Act of 1882—one of those great codifying Acts which have placed the various branches of the English law upon a clear and simple basis. I do not believe that the other Corporations desire to have their franchise reduced. In the City of Armagh, my own constituency, those who are rated under £5 have no votes; but they pay no rates, and when it was proposed to make a reduction, there was no desire for it. But whether they want it or not, whether it is right in principle or not, I venture to submit that nothing should be done which would bind this House to any interference with the franchise of the towns and counties of Ireland outside the Municipal Corporations Act.

*(1.44.) MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): We have heard many objections to the municipal franchise in Ireland; but I think the weakest reasons ever offered in opposition to this Bill have just been advanced by the hon. and learned Member for Mid Armagh. He has not been very long in this House; but I must congratulate him upon having, within the space of one week, acquired all the stock of cut-and-dried objections to Irish reform. This measure has always been, in the opinion of Gentlemen opposite, too small or too big, and the hon. and learned Gentleman considers it too small.

MR. BARTON: My observations had reference to the eleven municipal corporations. With reference to them, I know of no ground of opposition to the Bill, though I would rather like to have them dealt with as a whole.

With regard to other towns, I strenuously object to this Bill.

*MR. CLANCY: Then it appears I was wrong, and that the hon. and learned Gentleman's objection is that the Bill is too big. But I am afraid that if it were smaller his objection would still remain, for somehow or other the Conservative Party have always found objections to this measure, and we have never got the slightest assistance from the "loyal minority" of Ireland in striving to reform the franchise. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that this was a misleading Bill; but I do not understand the meaning of that objection, for municipal franchise certainly refers to the franchise in towns and townships, and I am surprised that such an objection should have been made. This reform is required in towns and townships, even more than in the cities of Ireland. The facts put forward by the Mover of the Bill are undeniable and overwhelming; but if my hon. Friend had gone into the case of the towns and townships, he would have shown even a stronger case for reform. The hon. Member referred to Blackrock, in the County of Dublin, and no more striking example of the need of reform in townships could be given, for our case may be based on that instance alone. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to think there had not been any agitation on this matter in Ireland. What was the meaning of that objection? Does he want agitation? Is no reform to be obtained for Ireland without a Land League, a National League, or a House League, or some other league which may perhaps throw society into disorder? If he does want agitation on this subject he may have it, and I warn him that it will probably extend to the northern parts of Ireland, for the Orangemen will clamour for this Bill as much as the Nationalists in the rest of the country. I do not need to refer at any great length to what I may call the pettifogging objections made by the hon. and learned Gentleman to the provisions of the Bill, for most of them have no relation whatever to its principle, and may be properly discussed in Committee. He asked about the repeal of certain Statutes, and I invite him when we go into Committee to propose an Amendment specifying those Statutes, for I am sure if he does so there is no Member on this side who will not support him. He objected that we left out some of the disqualifications existing in regard to the Parliamentary franchise, but this Bill does not deal with the Parliamentary Franchise.

MR. BARTON: I beg pardon, but I refer to the municipal franchise, and to the Poor Law qualification.

*MR. CLANCY: This municipal franchise does not depend upon the Poor Law rating, and unless we dragged into the Bill that which has nothing to do with the subject, we cannot act upon his suggestion. I should have supposed from his speech the other night that the hon. Gentleman was something of a Tory Democrat, and I advise him to remember that there will be more Tory Democrats coming into this House in future, and that proposals for the restriction of the Parliamentary or municipal franchise will be just as hotly resented by those representatives of the working men of Great Britain as by any Liberal politician. I am glad we have not had from the hon. Gentleman any reflection upon his fellow-countrymen, and I hope his example will be followed in that respect by other Members from the North of Ireland, for it has been too much a habit with them in recent years to attack their fellow-countrymen. It has been said that provision should be made for men of position administering the local affairs of Ireland; but I do not believe in their administration. We have had experience of them for the last 90 years, and we find they have landed the country, on every opportunity, in a mess. Thus, at the present day, where we have men of position entrusted with the local affairs of Ireland, we find that there it is, and there only, that scandals in the administration of the law occur. I need not refer to the Grand Juries, because they are doomed, and I believe their execution will be begun to-morrow night. But with regard to Boards of Guardians, it is notorious that the ex officio members habitually neglect their duty, and never attend except when there is a job on. It would be false policy even for a Conservative Government any longer to maintain the present restriction of the franchise; for wherever it has been extended, the result has been unmixed good to the community. There is not much interest taken now in some parts of Ireland in municipal affairs, because the mass of the people are shut out from the vote; but wherever in England the municipal franchise has been extended there has been a vast increase in the interest taken in the work of the municipalities. Before the extension of the suffrage, very little was thought of the interests of the working man in this House. We had no Agricultural Holdings Bill in those days. We had no Bills for improving the condition of the labouring classes in England, Scotland, or Ireland; but since the extension of the suffrage we are bristling all over with energy for improving the condition of the labouring classes. It is an instructive object lesson in the matter of Home Rule for Ireland to look at the present condition of the empty Benches opposite. The hon. Member who introduced the Bill adduced overwhelming arguments in its favour; but if a Division should be taken Members will come in on the other side to vote who never heard that speech, and a vote given in ignorance is an outrage on justice. This reform has been refused by the House of Commons for 50 or 60 years, and if the case of Home Rule depended on that fact alone, it would be complete.

Mr. Dunbar Barton

*(2.25.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): The Mover of the Bill expressed the hope that no opposition would come from any Irish Member. Perhaps that was too much to hope for, but if a Division be taken to-day very few Irish Members will vote against the Bill. It has been completely proved to-day that the Irish law so far as the franchise is concerned is in a state of hopeless confusion; that the Irish franchise is not the same as that in England; and that it differs in different towns. I should like to ask, Sir, why the Irish householder should not have the same rights as the English householder; he has precisely the same rights as far as the election of a Member of Parliament is concerned. Why is the Irish householder to be held capable of voting for a Member of Parliament, and yet held to be incapable of voting for a Town Councillor? Why should the Belfast artizan have municipal rights which are denied to the artizan of Cork? There is another strong ground in favour of this Bill, namely, the sanitary state of many of the small towns in Ireland. There is no authority whatever, and if there were no other ground for this Bill I should support the Second Reading. I think the objections made by the hon. Member for Mid Armagh were lawyer's objections, and did not go to the principle of the Bill. The view that the townships which would be affected by the Bill are not seized of its contents is not an objection, inasmuch as the townships are represented here, and the Members representing them are seized of knowledge of what is within the four corners of the Bill. I think my hon. Friend had the idea that advertisements of the Bill should have been inserted in the papers as in the case of a Private Bill. But who is there to object if even that had been done? Is my hon. Friend the Member for South Belfast going to object?

MR. W. JOHNSTON: No, certainly not.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I thought not. It may be thought that the privileged corporations are going to object, but I do not think the House ought to reject the Bill on that ground. I do not think that on the eve of a Local Government Bill, which is to follow English lines and have the widest possible franchise, that the claims of a privileged few should be set up to the injury of the smaller townships. I support the Second Reading of the Bill.

*(2.35.) MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): After the speech of the Mover of the Bill, I think, Sir, the wonder is that the present state of things has existed so long. The fact that a somewhat similar Bill has been introduced year after year shows the difficulty of getting legislation admittedly desirable for Ireland passed through this House. The hon. Member for Mid Armagh said he should oppose the Bill, and I must congratulate him on the ingenuity with which he put the very bad case he made out. He propounded the extraordinary constitutional theory that the House was not competent to deal with the question without the consent of those who already possessed the franchise. I agree with the hon. Member for South Tyrone that the question is of more pressing importance to the small towns than to the municipal boroughs, as their sanitary and other arrangements are far behind the times, and that state of things is not likely to be altered till those who have to live in unsanitary houses are directly represented on the Boards of Town Commissioners. In one town of 3,000 inhabitants in the North of Ireland 119 burgesses return nine Commissioners. In another of the same size nine Commissioners are elected by 75 burgesses. In the City of Limerick there are 457 burgesses out of a population of 39,000. They are divided into wards, one of which has 27 electors and returns four Councillors and an Alderman, or one representative to 4½ burgesses; another ward has 30, and the largest has only 83. The Bill really does not meet with any very great opposition in Ireland. Nor do I think that it will make any considerable change in the representation in a political sense. In the town of Belfast the number of electors have increased from 6,000, or thereabouts, before the passing of the Municipal Franchise Act to 33,000, and yet the effect of that extension of the franchise has been that it has not made any change whatever in the state of political parties in the Corporation of Belfast. In Dublin the representation is something like 43 Nationalists to 7 Conservatives, and I think that the extension of the franchise would not make any great difference in Dublin. At the present moment there are in Dublin only two or three hundred electors in each ward, and a man can practically get himself elected by requisition before the election takes place at all; and I think if the franchise were extended a great many people of a higher status would come forward and show interest in the matter than they do at the present time. The immediate cause of the claim for the extension of the franchise in Belfast was a proposal for the expenditure of a large sum of money on main drainage; and the hon. Member for West Belfast showed the unreasonableness of such an enormous expenditure by those who represented such a small number of the ratepayers, and this was the immediate cause of the extension of Belfast franchise. In the City of Dublin we are upon the eve of an expenditure of the same character and the same arguments may be used in regard to it. As regards the towns that are adjoining the City of Dublin, such as where I reside, Rathmines and other places, I can say that the majority of the inhabitants without representation under present franchises. The system prevails in Rathmines and elsewhere in co-opt members when a vacancy occurs in their body. That, I believe, is a state of things which should not exist. If a vacancy takes place in the representation of the municipality the ratepayers have a right to return a man whom they think should fill the vacancy, and I say that it is contrary to all our modern ideas to hold that the remaining members should have the power to co-opt those members. I do not think that I can add anything more to what has been said by the hon. Member who has preceded me, and I can only conclude with expressing the hope that the House will see its way to allow the Bill to pass its Second Reading.

(2.45.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim S.): I think the hon. Member who has just sat down has taken everybody by surprise; he has launched us into a discussion in which he has dealt with the constitution of Grand Juries and the Boards of Guardians, and has said that the Bill now before this House is only a continuation of the Bill of last year. Now this is the first time that the Bill has been introduced into this House, and I can only account for the confusion of the hon. Gentleman's mind by the agitated condition of the atmosphere in Upper O'Connell Street for the past few months. I am not making that as an accusation against the Bill; I am inclined to ask anyone to oppose it because hon. Members think the Bill is wide in its scope. So far the operations of the Bill are concerned.

of its powers in dealing with s that were included in former res brought forward by hon.
ers opposite, my attitude in this must be governed by what I stated discussion which took place on lfast Drainage Bill. I then said l the Bills brought forward which cover the principles contained in easure would have my support, erefore I have no objection to cond Reading of this Bill. But ; to the question of townships,
n. Member has made a considerint about it. I do not altogether with the views he has placed the House. I do not believe, speak of that portion of the y which I know best, that there considerable desire expressed part of the people that there be any alteration in the condition gs under which the governing of Town Commissioners are
; and I find that a Committee of the before which every one of these was represented, came to the ious Report that—

ough the desirability of the reduction municipal Franchise has been frequently d to your Committee, the subject does er to have attracted a great amount of terest, while no desire has been y smaller towns,"

on. I think I may say that no as been shown in the County of for this alteration. I have not f any such desire, nor has it it forward for the purpose of ; votes at municipal elections
ay change should be made manner in which members ected. It appears to me the Government are pledged duce a measure dealing with overnment in Ireland, the case smaller towns could more pro-e dealt with in that measure, ould like, so far as these Town missioners are concerned, to rey liberty of action. Having y position clear, I do not intend,
; to ask the House to give any opposition to the Bill. But I ne hon. Member, in referring case of small towns, has into one or two mistakes

which I should like to correct.
Answering the able speech of my hon. and learned Friend on this side of the House, it was stated that this measure had been always opposed by the Conservative Party in this House.

MR. T. M. HEALY: And so it was.

MR. MACARTNEY: This is the first occasion on which the measure has been introduced.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Last year.

MR. SEXTON: It stood for second reading—Bill 27—last year.

MR. MACARTNEY: I have not looked the matter carefully up, and I suppose the Bill escaped my notice. At all events, it is not correct to say that the Conservative Members for Ireland or that the Conservative Body opposed any similar Bill in the past to the extent that the hon. Member has led the House to believe. The hon. Member also states that no interest is taken in municipal affairs in these small towns.
I do not know what may be the case in the other three provinces of Ireland, but I know that it is not so in regard to Ulster. In Ulster the greatest possible interest is taken.

MR. SEXTON: What I stated was that if no interest was taken it was due to a restricted franchise.

MR. MACARTNEY: I say that the greatest possible interest is taken in those municipal elections in Ulster, and so far as the particular argument goes it can have no force in regard to Ulster in supporting a proposal for a reduction of the franchise. With regard to the drafting of the Bill, I do not wish to criticise it; but I cannot say very much of the Bill as it is drawn, and undoubtedly if it ever gets into Committee it will have to be seriously considered, and a great many important alterations will have to be made in it.
I shall reserve to myself the right to consider those matters, and on this condition I am prepared to assent to the Second Reading.

*(2.57.) MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (College Green, Dublin): The hon. and learned Member for Mid Armagh has said in the course of his speech that the people of Ireland would have some reason to complain when they read to-morrow about this Bill. He seemed to think that there was something in it that would alarm them, and spoke as if we were making a raid upon certain classes of the people of Ireland ; making an invasion of some precious constitution. He said the people would have reason to complain of the surprise practised upon them, just as if some of their constitutional rights were being invaded by the provisions of the Bill. One would have thought from that speech that, instead of proposing to extend the municipal franchise, to extend municipal rights, in Ireland, we were proposing to rob the people of Ireland of some municipal privilege. I do not think the Irish people, or any section of the Irish people, will entertain that view of the case. The terrible proposition contained in the Bill brought forward as "a surprise," and supported by the wicked Nationalist Members, simply amounts to this—that, as regards their municipal rights and privileges, the people of Ireland should be put upon the same level as the English people. I am surprised at the statements made by the hon. and learned Gentleman in regard to this question, statements which were manifestly absurd. I want to know from the hon. and learned Member, or from any hon. Member of this House, what benefit can come from keeping those restrictions upon the municipal franchise in Ireland ? We have had a great extension of the Parliamentary franchise with great benefit to the people of this country ; what harm can come from extending the municipal franchise in Ireland ? I cannot for a moment suppose that it would be an offence to any persons in Ireland to say that they should be put upon the same level as the English people in the matter of the municipal franchise. Speaking as one of the Representatives of the City of Dublin, I wish to bear emphatic testimony to the fact that there is a very great desire among the working people of Dublin for this reform ; and there is a very great desire for the extension of the municipal franchise in that city. Last year the Trades Council, which is authorised to speak for the working classes of the City of Dublin, passed a resolution asking the Irish Representatives in this House to do their utmost to bring about such a reform as is now before the House. I hold the resolution passed by that body in my hand—

"Resolved, that the Dublin Trades' Council thinks that the time has arrived when the question of assimilating the Parliamentary and Municipal Franchise should be taken up by Parliament, and we hereby ask our Parliamentary representatives to take means whereby such a reform shall be speedily accomplished. The masses of the people have an interest in the prosperity of the towns and cities in which they live, and I think it is important and very desirable that these people should have a voice in the election of municipal representatives and in the government of their cities. I feel perfectly certain that the same views are shared throughout the length and breadth of Ireland. I shall not go into statistics upon the subject, they have already been quoted in the course of this discussion ; they are, I think, astonishing, and I believe the English people will be amazed, when they come to read of it to-morrow, of the difference that exists between the two countries, notwithstanding the suggestion that is so often made that we in Ireland are in enjoyment of the same rights and privileges as the English people. We fail to see any reason why any Party should desire the perpetuation of this state of things. When people have to pay rates, and when they are so deeply interested in such matters as sanitation, the condition of the public ways, and questions of that kind, it is most desirable that they should be allowed to have a voice in the election of their municipal representatives. I believe there is almost unanimity of opinion upon this subject in Ireland, and I rose to testify to this fact, that the people of the City of Dublin are keenly alive to the necessity of such reform as is referred to in this Bill, and in proof of that I refer again to the testimony I have quoted coming from a representative body of Dublin tradesmen upon the subject. These men are an intelligent portion of the people of Dublin, their opinions are bound to carry weight it is my duty to give expression to our views in this House.

(7.) MR. A. BLANE (Armagh).—Perhaps this House will be astonished to know that in the City of Armagh we live under a Municipal Act which is no less than 63 years old. According to hon. Members in this House who returned to this House upon a franchise 63 years old, I can well conceive that a very considerable portion of the eloquence of this House would set to us. This Act was passed in the year 1829, and since that day till one-half of the inhabitants of that corporation have not had the slightest interest in that corporation. We sometimes hear from hon. Members upon the opposite Benches of what we would do if we had power; during all those 63 years there has rarely been a single Liberal on that Town Council; there has rarely sat a single Catholic, and not a single Nationalist.

Parliamentary franchise is just one-fifth of the municipal franchise. It takes five times the qualification to make gentlemen to the Municipal Boards that it does to qualify a voter for a Member of this House. He may take part in the government of the town, but of a sewerage rate he has the slightest thing to say. The speech made by the hon. Member for Armagh was very nearly on a par with the speech made in 1829 in support of the system by which Beresfords nominated 12 burgesses annually, and the 12 burgesses nominated the Member for the borough. There was a sort of mutual admiration society, and I assure this House that it scarcely differs to this day. There was not a single Catholic that municipality represented at Town Council, no Nationalist, in a town of 10,000 population. Catholics have a slight majority, of any one denomination of Protestants put together, but of the whole disjoined. What was the scandal that saw in that corporation? A meeting was held purporting to take the nominations of the Town Commissioners. That was in the year 1878, every year in which this House passed the 41 & 42 Vict., which is the Public Health Act. A number of citizens were anxious that certain reforms should be made in the sanitary arrangements and inspectorships. They had the nominations made; they went before one of the chief Orangemen of the county, the Chairman of the Town Commissioners, to hand in the nomination papers. The nomination papers were handed in by me. He refused them. In the case of 21 Town Commissionerships we only put forward one-third—though we were entitled to one half—and the seven nominations were sent back to us. I thought it was a case worth trying, and I brought this Chairman of the Conservative Association at Armagh, the head of the Orange Party, before the Superior Courts in Dublin. I got some wooden-headed barristers that brought him before the Courts in Dublin, and, poor as the wooden-headed barristers were, they effected my purpose. The Judges declared that the nominations were accurate, that they were in due time, and they should not have been refused; but still I was prevented having my costs, and I had to pay the costs of my own wooden-headed barristers as well as I could. I merely mention that for the purpose of showing how hard it is for poor men, and humble men in the ranks of the people, to go into the Superior Courts and fight the Chairman of the Masonic Institution of the County Armagh, and Chairman of the Town Commissioners, who is also Chairman of the Conservative Association. It is exceedingly difficult. The Judges declared that these nominations should have been taken, and directed a new election to take place; but, in the meantime, the Chairman of the Town Commissioners had exceeded his term of office; he had gone out according to law. He held a new election slightly different from the other. We again contested only one-third of the seats. Did this man accept our nominations? Not a bit of it. The same Chairman of the Town Commissioners whose term had expired, and who was practically defunct, held a new election. He defied us again. I brought this Chairman of the Town Commissioners to the Superior Courts in Dublin with the assistance of some of my fellow-citizens—I was not rich enough myself to bear the expense. Well, we contested this matter in Dublin. We found that our wooden-headed barristers had brought us into the wrong Court; instead of bringing us into the Queen's Bench on a quo warrantum, or something of that kind, they brought us into the Common Pleas Division, and the Common Pleas Division threw us out with costs, plus the costs of the enemy. I mention this thing to show the House how difficult it is for any poor working man in the North of Ireland—in that Ulster they speak about—men who are not ornaments of society, but working fellows, useful men, not ashamed of their work—they are absolutely deprived, these men in the North of Ireland, from having a solitary thing to say with reference to the Corporation. Now, let me say this. The day is not far distant when you will have to abolish qualifications in respect to the election of Members of this House—the day is not far distant, I believe, when we shall have manhood suffrage. It is irresistible, though we do not go so far in this Bill, and we are entitled to merely mention it for the purpose of showing that we are not very extravagant in our demands. The speeches that have been made, and that can be made, against a measure such as this, have been trotted out one hundred times against every reform—either municipal, poorlaw, or Parliamentary—that has been brought before this House; they are old and venerable visages. They had done duty when the Act of 1829 was passing through this House. In the days of Peel the same speeches were made. I hold that people who pay rates indirectly, pay rates in the worst possible way. I say that they pay cent. per cent. more than they pay directly; and if you place any rate on any men, that rate will filter down till it reaches the workers; because, no matter how many ornaments of society they have, these men never pay any rates themselves. They take the rate collector in the right hand and the working-men in the left. They are ornaments of society, but not useful members. If you take the City of Armagh, there are three principal landlords in that City. One is the Church Temporalities Commission; another, I think, is Lord Tramoran; and the third is Lord Dartford. The property of the City of Armagh is built upon the lands of these men. They do not contribute one penny towards municipal rate, poors rate, county cess, or any other rate. All the taxation falls upon what are called the occupiers, the immediate lessors. They do not pay anything to the municipal rates. Why should not they? All the municipal rate is expended on sanitary appliances, enhancing the letting value of the landlord's land and if any of these unfortunate occupiers or lessors leave one town and go to another—if they leave Armagh to go to Belfast—they do not take the sanitary appliances with them; it is left behind to enhance the ground landlord's value, and if it enhances the ground landlord's value, what is the reason the ground landlord is not taxed? It is because property, as it is called, is organised and is able to defend itself against the poor; and in this House the number of advocates of the poor, the number of advocates for strict justice, are certainly not very numerous. But I think, at all events, the Members for Ireland have done their duty with reference to this Bill, and with reference to other Bills coming before the House. We have done our humble best to improve as far as we can the condition of affairs in our country; and it appears to me that if we had the management of the affairs of our own country in our own hands we would not be now dealing with a Municipal Act 6 years old. This, after all, is not a Party question, because the cleansing of sewers is of as much interest to an Orangeman as it is to us. When fever raged in Armagh it carried off as many respectable Protestants as it did Catholics. I think we might fairly claim that the Attorney General for Ireland, who is a great power in this House, and who is also I think a countryman of my own—a native—I think of the outskirts of the City of Armagh—I think that we might forcibly seize him for the purposes of this Bill. I think this is a Bill that he might support without any danger to the Empire. And if he gives us his assistance in this case I can assure him I will please as many of his Conser-ive friends in Ireland as it will own friends.

(3.27.) COLONEL WARING (Down, ) : I must compliment the hon. gentlemen who have just sat on the extraordinary burst of eloquence to which they have treated upon the matter before the House. It really I feel some difficulty in understanding whence all this eloquence comes, and why it is expended upon a matter which, as the hon. Member for City of Dublin said, appears to command the general approval of Irish representatives on both sides of the House. I look on the Notice Paper, & I see that there is another Irish Bill standing next for Second Reading, namely, the Labourers' (Ireland) Bill. Hon. Members opposite have a difficulty in proceeding with the next bill on the Paper in consequence of divisions in their ranks, and are anxious to concentrate all their eloquence upon a Bill. I have no objection to the principle of the Bill at present under discussion, or the one that follows it, therefore I do not propose to unduly prolong the present Debate by any remarks of mine. But though I shall vote for the Second Reading of this Bill, I shall reserve to myself a very considerable power indeed of criticising in Committee. I think that when this Bill comes up for consideration in Committee hon. Members will find that it would have been better if they had spared their time and trouble in constructing a new Bill. I think there is good deal in what has been said, & this Bill does come as a matter of surprise to the smaller townships in Ireland. Now, it concerns very largely, I hope, a number of small towns in my constituency, and I have not had opportunity of ascertaining whether or not they desire this reform, which appears to me to be a reasonable one. I do think it is greatly to be desired that I should have an opportunity of ascertaining what their views on this matter are, and that we should enter into this business with full information as to their views regarding the provisions of the Bill affecting the different localities to which it is to be applied. For the reasons I have stated we decided to vote for the Second Reading of this Bill, but I certainly do not intend to allow it to pass without a very considerable amount of correction in Committee.

*(3.30.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. H. MADDEN, Dublin University) : I have listened with very great interest to this Debate, and I think it has been conducted throughout in a thoroughly business-like manner, and with the utmost good humour on both sides of the House, and a number of most important facts in connection with this question, submitted by one side or the other, have been brought under our consideration. Now, before I formally state the attitude of the Government in regard to this Bill I would recall to the recollection of the House the history of this measure. It has been, or, rather, a Bill bearing the same title as the present Bill was introduced, if not earlier, in the year 1889-90. My recollection is not clear upon that point. Possibly it may have been the year before that, but that Bill dealt, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid Armagh has pointed out, exclusively with the Municipal Corporations of the 11 cities. Now I do not in the least complain that hon. Members opposite have introduced in the present Session a different Bill. That would be no ground for complaint, but I must say that the argument of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid Armagh is deserving of consideration at the hands of this House. I do not understand him to quarrel with the title of the Bill, but, as I understand the very clear statement of my hon. and learned Friend, he points out that there have been already Municipal Corporations Bills brought before this House—that this Bill was brought out yesterday or the day before as a Municipal Corporations Bill, and the natural inference of course was that as it was introduced by the same Members it was the same Bill—but that on examination it was discovered that this Bill under the same title is not the same Bill, but a very different Bill, as it deals with very different subject-matters from the Bill of 1889-90.

MR. SEXTON : Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman allow me to make one remark? The hon. and learned Gentleman said to-day that the population of Ireland were taken by surprise because this was not a Bill of the same sort as was previously introduced. Now, the Bill, No. 29, of last Session, was presented to the House on the 26th November, 1890, under the title "Municipal Franchise (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill, 1891," and Section 17 was identical with the section in this Bill.

*MR. MADDEN: The hon. Member will not understand me as quarrelling with the way in which the Bills have been introduced, but I must point out that that was the only Municipal Corporations Bill that has been introduced up to the present date.

MR. SEXTON: No, no; this very Bill.

*MR. MADDEN: I think that Bill was entitled "The Franchise Bill," and it never having come to a Second Reading, having been withdrawn before the Second Reading—

MR. SEXTON: We gave the Bill the title, "The Municipal Franchise Amendment Act Bill." The clerks at the Table, according to the usage of the House, put the short title "Franchise (Ireland) Bill" upon the back of the Bill. We are not responsible for that.

*MR. MADDEN: No. I am not quarrelling with that; but when a Bill having the same title as the former Bills is introduced, it is natural to suppose that it deals with the same subject-matter. The attitude taken up by the Government and on this side of the House has been that, in regard to the Bill dealing with these 11 cities, which occupy plainly a distinctive position—a different position from the towns and townships which this Bill proposes to deal with—the question would be one to be dealt with by the Local Government Bill about to be introduced. Now, as the hon. Member is aware, that Bill is to be shortly introduced, and I do not intend to anticipate any of the disclosures of to-morrow. But I want to make it perfectly clear to hon. Gentlemen opposite that the attitude so taken up by the Government was taken up not in regard to the new Bill, or the Bill of last year, but in regard to the Bill introduced in 1889-90, dealing with the 11 cities. The question then arises, What position should the Government take up with regard to this Bill? Now, I am not prepared, I am not authorised, to make any statement whatever in regard to the portions of this Bill which were not in the Bill introduced in 1889-90. That is a matter which will come before the House in due course. It is a matter deserving of the greatest consideration. But the question at once arises, Does the fact that these clauses have been introduced into this Bill—is that any reason why the Government should oppose the Second Reading of a Bill which contains provisions that are in addition to the Bill of 1889-90? It appears to the Government that is not a sufficient reason for opposing the Second Reading of this Bill. It appears to the Government that the proper course to take is to state to the House that, so far as the scope of what I shall call the original Bill is concerned, we adhere to the opinion already expressed that these cities and large towns occupy a distinctive position as regards local government, and that the time has now arrived for dealing with this question; that probably the House will find that the more convenient and the best course would be to deal with that question in connection with the Bill to be brought before the House tomorrow, but that this consideration does not afford sufficient reason for opposing the Second Reading of this Bill. Therefore, with these observations as to the views of the Government, I am prepared to give my assent to the Second Reading of this Bill without going into any discussion of its provisions in detail at present. I rose to make the attitude of the Government as regards this Bill perfectly clear to the House, so that there might be no misunderstanding with regard to the matter.

(3.35.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I hope the citizens of this country will take note of the declaration of the Government. There is a canal in Dublin called the Royal Canal; it separates Dublin from Rathmines. According to the declaration of the Government the citizens on one side of this canal will enjoy a municipal franchise of the same nature as the Parliamentary franchise, but the moment they cross the bridge then they will be under a £4, or £8, or £10 franchise, under the principle laid down by the right hon. Gentleman so clearly. And yet this House of Parliament is anxious to remove every Irish grievance and to place Ireland on a par with England in regard to all contentious questions. Now, Sir, anything more scandalous, or anything that ought to more shock the Tory conscience, I never heard put forward with so much cynicism by a Member of Her Majesty's Government. And, for my part, I rejoice that now, naked and unashamed, on the very eve of the Dissolution of Parliament, the Government have taken up this view; that so far as the citizens of Dublin are concerned, within the Canal they may have British rights, but those outside it may be subjected to Conservative outlawry, because in some mediæval time in the past there were eleven towns endowed with corporate privileges. And these towns—take, for instance, the town of Clonmel, a small borough in the County of Tipperary: it is to enjoy this privilege; but all the townships around Dublin that have suddenly sprung up into life, and are nearly as much a portion of the City of Dublin as Grafton Street or O'Connell Street itself—though they do not, perhaps, enjoy so much of the distinct civic life of the town—are to be excluded from it. For all practical purposes the view of the Government is this: that all these townships are to be excluded, and are to remain under the old heavy franchise, and those within the city ambit are to have the new franchise with the assent of the Government. Now, that is a position which I think no English Minister—no Minister in the English Government—has ever taken up before; and I hope the Conservative Party will rejoice in being able to defend the principle of the Canal Bridge. It may be interesting to the House to know that even in certain portions of Dublin there is not even a canal, so that the dividing line will be the middle of the street. In the case of the North Circular Road, which bounds the city in that direction, for instance, the inhabitants on one side from one window will be looking at the inhabitants on the other under different franchises; and that is the great situation now created by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. You would believe from the tone and demeanour of the Attorney General that we should go down on our knees and thank the Government for the very moderate attitude it has assumed with regard to this Bill. I say the attitude of the Government is an inconclusive and indefensible attitude. While the Orange Party, as represented by the hon. Member for Antrim and the hon. and gallant Member for Down, are unable to attack this Bill in any way, the Attorney General proposes to confine the franchise to these eleven towns. Why, even the hon. Member for South Tyrone is with us on this question. The Member for South Tyrone made a speech in favour of the passing of this Bill as a whole; and now Her Majesty's Government are going to the country on this principle: that so far as these eleven towns are concerned, they may have the franchise, but as regards 200 towns, they shall not. As I have said, I regard this extraordinary decision, which I suppose the First Lord of the Treasury is responsible for, as the most valuable expression of the views of the Conservative Party. No exception as to draughtsmanship has been taken to the Bill. No point is taken exception to except that the eleven towns are fit for the franchise, and all the rest of the community is not. We are, happily, I believe, on the eve of a Dissolution. This Bill is a Bill just the same, practically, in all its effective provisions as the Bill introduced by us so far back as the month of November, 1890. I shall just give the House one example of the working of the proposal of the Government. Within the last two months a dispute has arisen in the town of Maryborough as to whether a man rated at £4 was entitled to the franchise or not. There was no list of voters in existence except that prepared by the Town Clerk. The Town Clerk rejected the man's claim to the vote, and there was no appeal. An Election Petition was presented to settle the question, and considerable expense was incurred. So that, therefore, to contest the question of the right to vote in these 200 towns there is no other legal machinery than a cumbrous and expensive Election Petition. That is the position taken up by the Government. That, in my opinion, is a scandal. The case of Dublin is a pressing one. In some of the townships around Dublin the franchise is £5, and in others it is £6, £8, and £10, and we ask the House to assimilate the franchise there to that which prevails in England.

*SIR J. MCKENNA (Monghaan, S.): I rise, Sir, in order to dissociate myself in toto from the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down. The object of the hon. and learned Gentleman was to discredit any advantage that might accrue to Ireland from a Conservative Government. Personally I am prepared to acknowledge gratefully any benefit tendered to Ireland from whichever Party in the House it may come, and I now thank the Government for acceding to the Second Reading of this Bill, notwithstanding the observations of the hon. and learned Member.

MR. LEAMY (Sligo, S.): I think, Sir, the House should now come to a vote on the Second Reading of the Bill, seeing there is no opposition to it.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I fully acknowledge, Sir, the merits of the Bill have been pretty fully discussed, but I wish to draw attention to the fact that throughout this Debate the Ministers responsible for the Queen's Speech have been conspicuous by their absence. Even the right hon. Gentleman who is now responsible for the affairs of Ireland has only been present during a small part of the Debate.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The Chief Secretary for Ireland has been called away quite suddenly. It was his intention to have remained and taken part in the Debate.

MR. SEXTON: I do not think, Sir, that the Chief Secretary should have allowed any duty to take him away from this House during this Debate on the first Irish Bill since the right hon. Gentleman took Office. We are told in the Queen's Speech that the Local Government Bill for Ireland will be framed on the same general principles as in the case of England and Scotland, which means that the occupiers of houses in every city and town will have the right to vote on the question of determining the composition of the local governing body. Where in the Queen's Speech is it suggested that the Government are entitled to make one law for 11 cities and towns, and another law for 200 towns? It is in the small towns that the reforms are most needed, for there the misconduct of the Local Government Board is not so liable to observation as in the cities. What is the work of these Local Boards to be but paving, lighting, and sanitation. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had opposed this Bill, I can assure him that the Motion for the introduction of the Local Government Bill to-morrow would not have passed uncontested. The Irish Members were entitled to say that the Government having declared in the Queen's Speech that the principles of Local Government in England should be extended to Ireland have taken the first opportunity that has arisen to abandon their position.

Mr. T. M. Healy

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I hope, Sir, that there will be no more talk, and that we shall proceed to the Second Reading of the Bill, and then to the Labourers (Ireland) Bill, in which great interest is taken.

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am sorry, Sir, that I was unable to be present to announce the views of the Government, but from what I have heard from the Attorney General for Ireland I do not think it is necessary to detain the House. I will only say one word in answer to the remarks of the hon. Member for West Belfast. He speaks of this Bill as though this were the same Bill as was before the House on several previous occasions. That is not the fact.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman has not been present during this Debate, and does not know that a Bill practically similar to this was read a second time 15 months ago.

*MR. JACKSON: The Government is, of course, bound to deal with the question of Local Government in Ireland, and although we do not propose to offer any opposition to the Second Reading of this Bill the Government must not be taken as bound to support the Bill in its present form in its later stages. Hon. Members will have very soon an opportunity of seeing the Irish Local Government Bill of the Government, and of hearing the views of the Government on the question of Local Government for Ireland.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) BILL. (No. 39.)

SECOND READING.

(4.5.) Order for Second Reading read.

MR. J. NOLAN (Louth, N.): It fortunately happens, that whatever the hon. and learned Member opposite may think as to the differences amongst the Irish Members on this side of the House, none exist amongst them as to the desirability of improving the position of the labourers of Ireland. In my opinion, it does not matter whether the labourers be Protestant or Catholic, Liberal, Tory, or Whig, Parnellite or Anti-Parnellite, for whatever they may be, I sincerely desire to see them taken out of insanitary dwellings, and placed in a decent home. I hope, therefore, that this Bill will be read a second time, with the unanimous consent of all Parties in the House. I do not pretend that it is perfect, or goes so far as I should like, but I think it will be agreed that it goes in the right direction, and if it should reach the Committee stage, I shall be ready to accept Amendments. I do not wish to belittle existing Acts, but we have ample proof in Ireland that further progress is required. We find in Ireland that year after year the people are flying from the country in thousands, and that at the same time the industries of the country are languishing for want of the very labour which is thus going away. A Bill has already been read a second time this week, which admits that the half-acre allotment is not sufficient, and one of the provisions of this Bill is, that allotments should be increased from half-an-acre to an acre, and I propose to make that provision retrospective. The 2nd section of the Bill proposes to empower the Local Sanitary Authority to purchase, so as to remove an obstacle in the way of providing labourers with suitable cottages and allotments. I do not suggest that compulsion should be used upon the farmer, but it will be found that there are cases in which the tenants are willing to sell their interests, and the landlord is willing to sell his, and I wish the Local Sanitary Authority to be empowered in such a case to make the necessary purchase, and divide the farm into suitable allotments. I trust that the Sanitary Authority will also provide some instruction in cottage gardening, for it is too much to expect an ordinary field hand to at once develop into a successful cottage gardener. I hold that, as a general rule, the labourers of Ireland are capable of great improvement. An hon. Member of this House wrote a remarkable work about the Irish in America, showing to what great power and wealth they attain; and an hon. Friend of mine has pointed out to me that it was not the cultured people, but the hardy and thrifty working men of Ireland who built up large fortunes for themselves in America. The same state of things prevails throughout the Colonies of this country, and I therefore maintain that the Irish labourers, if they only got an opportunity, would, on a similar scale, do for themselves at home in Ireland what their countrymen have done in America and the Colonies. In regard to the 3rd section of the Bill, which gives power to the Congested Districts Board to provide labourers' cottages and allotments, it will be evident that where the Local Sanitary Authority is not sufficiently powerful and rich to undertake this work, it is well it should be done by the Congested Districts Board. The 4th section provides for the inspection of labourers' dwellings during the course of construction. In my own part of the country that work has been done in a substantial manner, but I hear that in other parts of Ireland there is jerry-building in the construction of these cottages. I hope that all Parties of the House will agree that the sooner this Bill is passed into law the better it will be for all classes; and, in view of the past treatment and the present position of the labourers of Ireland, it is desirable that this House should endeavour to improve their position. I beg to move the Second Reading of this Bill.

(4.23.) MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): In rising to second the Motion, I wish to point out that it is merely an effort to improve, in some few particulars, Acts already in existence in Ireland. As regards Clause 1, the House has practically assented to it already this Session, and the only difference between the clause of the Bill which was read a second time a fortnight ago and the 1st clause of this Bill is that it is retrospective. The 2nd clause of the Bill will enable Boards of Guardians to purchase land under the Land Purchase Act of last Session. As to congested districts, it might strike some hon. Members that in them labourers' cottages are not required, but there are districts, in the North of Kerry and elsewhere, where the exercise of such a power as is proposed to be conferred upon the Congested Districts Board would be extremely useful. Very often the authority knows nothing of the material or quality of the house; it simply sends round an Inspector when the house is built, to see that it has been erected on a certain site. The Board of Guardians is supposed to carry out an inspection of its own, but the result in many cases has been very inferior building. The Boards of Guardians think the responsibility is taken off their shoulders by the Board of Works, and the latter refuses to accept the responsibility, so, between the two, buildings are not properly inspected. The Bill proposes that there should be a regular inspection made by the Board of Works, and that payments to contractors should be on a certificate from their Inspector. I cannot imagine any objection from the Government Benches to that proposal. The Board of Guardians generally have treated the labourers in a very fair spirit, still we ought not to leave the labourers too much in their hands, as they are not directly represented on the Board. Therefore, as regards the question of the actual construction being efficiently carried out, it is essential that there should be some outside authority. Some hon. Members may object to the Board of Works as at present constituted, but we are looking forward to a re-construction of that body. I am not aware that any complaint has ever been made of construction under the Labourers' Acts when inspected by the Board of Works. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I second the Motion for the Second Reading, hoping that the Bill may pass through the House without much discussion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. J. Nolan.)

(4.35.) MR. T. W. R U S S E L L (Tyrone, S.): I am sorry, Sir, I shall not be able to give the same support to this Bill as to the previous one; it is founded on strictly Socialistic principles, and is of a far-reaching character. My chief objection to it is that it seeks to divert the money ear-marked by the Land Purchase Act for the purchase of holdings. It proposes to undo on a Wednesday afternoon practically the labours of a whole Session. The Land Purchase Act allocated the money for a specific purpose, and occupied nearly a whole Session in its passage through the House; and now the House is asked to undo the well-considered work of that time. It may be said that the Land Purchase Act is not working, but I cannot agree that it has failed. I believe all the money will be required for the purposes of that Act, and therefore I am not prepared to support the diversion of any part of it. If anything is to be done for the labourer—and I am the last man to say it ought not to be done—the funds must come from elsewhere. I am still more astonished at the 3rd section. If there was one part of the Land Purchase Act which commended itself to the perfect support of the House, it was that dealing with the congested districts. One and a half millions of Irish money was allocated to dealing with these districts, to be used in ways enumerated in the Act; to those objects and to the work of the Board the House is now asked to add that of house jobbing. Well, Sir, I think that is a business which the House should not cast on the Congested Districts Board. I think the hon. Member for Meath saw the difficulty. The people living in these districts are nearly all small farmers, and not labourers. If you are to take the £1,500,000 voted for the purchase of their holdings to the building and repairing of their houses, it will not go very far. As the Board has not been at work very long, it is too soon to convert its entire functions. There is another point. Suppose the House adds this to the Board's other functions and they build and repair houses, and then the rents are not paid? Are you going to place this philanthropic Board in the position of having to evict the tenants for non-payment of rent? Under this Bill they would be bound to do so. I hope the House will not impose on the Board either the duty of building cottages or repairing them. Besides, I am not certain that the Labourers' Acts have worked so satisfactorily that the House should add to them without close inquiry. I know there has been great tyranny in connection with them. I know that plots have been taken against the wishes of tenant farmers; very inconvenient land has been taken compulsorily. As I think that the money set aside for land purchase will be insufficient, I am not disposed to take anything from it, and if the labourers are to be assisted, to which I do not object, other money must be found for the purpose.

Mr. J. Nolan

(4.42.) MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I think, Sir, the hon. Member who has just sat down raised a number of hobgoblins. He says we propose to divert certain money now in the hands of the Congested Districts Board to build labourers' cottages. The Bill is as plain as possible, and says that a discretionary power should be given to the Board to apply the money in this way if they think it would be the best way to use it. It does not compel them to spend one single penny now at their disposal in the way suggested by the Bill. How this can be so terribly socialistic and revolutionary I cannot imagine. The hon. Member says that the rents may not be paid; they may not be paid to the Board of Guardians or to individual landlords. We have chosen to run the risks in the Labourers' Acts, and I am unaware that anything has happened to condemn that course. The rents have been paid with great regularity. I think the Board will be sensible enough to use the power wisely if it is conferred, and then the rents will be paid regularly. We are continually hearing of the tyranny of these bodies. This is a question in which Party passion should not be allowed to enter; it certainly confuses the issue and the principle of the Bill to drag in controversies which may be right enough under other circumstances, but are out of place in the discussion of such a Bill. I would suggest that we take a Division as soon as possible after the Chief Secretary has told us whether or not he agrees with the hon. Member for South Tyrone.

(4.48.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I do not feel the same alarm as the hon. Member for South Tyrone as to the Socialistic tendency of this Bill. All the clauses are not of the same character, and two of them require careful consideration. I will deal first with Clause 3, which affects the householders of the congested districts. I do not know whether there would be great opportunities for the Board to put the Bill into operation; but I cannot agree that it is altogether outside the scope of their duties, because the Land Act in the sub-section of Section 39 says that the Board may take such steps as they think proper in aiding and benefitting agriculture in the congested districts. If there be parts of those districts where the labourers would be benefitted under this Bill, why should the Board, which has very large powers conferred upon it for raising the condition of the population, be debarred from the duty of aiding agriculture by building cottages? I see, therefore, no reason for conferring on the Board the authority to employ a portion of the money given by the Land Act. I think Sub-section 2 of the clause should be left out, as it might embarrass the Board. I will explain what I mean. By previous Acts, great powers are conferred on those dissatisfied with the action of the Local Authority in building cottages, and much trouble was caused by their action being supervised by the Local Government Board. I do not think it would be right that the Congested Districts Board should be put into the same category as a Local Sanitary Authority, and be subjected to like harassing conduct on the part of those who are dissatisfied. Then I come to Clause 2, which is undoubtedly a very important one, as it may be open to the objection taken that it diverts part of the money applied under the Land Act. Undoubtedly it does propose to divert a portion of it. The question is, Will such diversion injure the mass of the population of Ireland, or will it be for the general benefit? There are three classes whom this clause affects: the labourers, the rate-payers, and those tenant farmers who are not ratepayers. There is no doubt it would confer some benefit on the labourers. I do not think it will injure the ratepayers. It will enable money to be borrowed a little more cheaply for the building of labourers' cottages, and so would be a relief to the ratepayers. As to those who are not ratepayers, they may say that the Bill does not benefit them; but it does not injure their property. If there is to be a great rush, and if there is any chance of the portion of land purchase money devoted to each county being applied for to purchase holdings, we should have no right to consent to any other class of people coming in and interfering with the operation of last year's Act. Therefore I should like to reserve the right to endeavour to amend that clause in Committee. Subject to that limitation I do not see any ground for offering opposition to the Bill. I know that naturally the views held by the Government may be influenced by other considerations than those which influence private Members. They are responsible for the Land Purchase Act, and they may say that this Bill would interfere with the carrying out of that Act; but I believe that the main objection of the hon. Member for South Tyrone can be met by Amendment in Committee, which would restrain the Commissioners from assenting to any application which would be an inroad; but with these limitations I am prepared to support the Second Reading of the Bill.

(5.) MR. EDMUND LEAMY (Sligo, S.): The hon. Member who has preceded me has said the money would be expended in building houses for small farmers if this Bill were passed into law; and he also spoke about farmers being content to give sites for labourers' cottages. Now, I regret to say that in a great many parts of Ireland, tenant farmers are not very willing to give any sites at all for labourers' cottages, and it is in fact in consequence of that that it is necessary to allow representations for such cottages to be made by the labourers' themselves. We know that Inspectors have in many cases refused to sanction the sites at all. It has been said that some of the best land has been selected for the purpose of labourers' cottages. I know from experience that in many cases the very worst patches of land have been offered to the labourers by the farmers. I think if half-an-acre of land is to be given at all—and half-an-acre is not much—the labourers should get the best part of the land. But, in my opinion, the very worst has been given. We on this side of the House are very glad of the support which the hon. Member opposite has given to this Bill, and to the Bill which has preceded it, and we hope the Government will follow the same course, and assent to the Bill being read a second time.

(5.3.) COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I wish to say, as briefly as possible, that I sympathise with the objects of the Bill. I do not entertain the views, or the fears, of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, as to the communistic character of the Bill. The hon. Member seems to think that there might be a difficulty in regard to the payment of rent of these small holdings; but I wish to point out to him, and to the House, that by Clause 4 of the Bill the operation of the collection of rent would be very much facilitated. I heartily concur with the objects of the measure, and I shall vote for it if it go to a division.

(5.5.) MR. P. A. CHANCE (Kilkenny, S.): Now that both sections of the Irish Representatives are in complete accord—for the hon. Member for South Tyrone cannot be considered as representing anybody, since he speaks neither as an Orangeman nor as a Nationalist—I hope that the House will permit this Bill to be read a second time. The hon. Member, if he refer to the Act, will find that the Congested Districts Board has done a large traffic in land. Therefore, this Bill does not introduce any new principle, and it cannot be seriously said that there is any great fear of the Board having to call into use the powers of eviction. In addition to that, the hon. Member for South Tyrone will find that there have been exceedingly few cases in which the labourers have been prosecuted and evicted for non-payment of rent. The labourers are too anxious to get possession of a holding, in fact, to risk the losing of it by the non-payment of rent. I think there is one matter upon which all the Irish Leaders are agreed, and that is that the expense of carrying out the Irish Labourers' Act is altogether disproportionate. Possession cannot be got without many formalities being gone through, and in ten cases out of twelve almost 50 per cent of the expenses goes into the pockets of the lawyers and printers. That is a very important matter. I believe it is a serious omission, and I hope that if this Bill goes into Committee the hon. Gentleman who has brought it in, and the Government, will introduce a clause simplifying and cheapening the procedure of putting the compulsory clauses of those Acts into force. I hope that the Government will give expression to the wishes put forward upon both sides of the House; and I am sure if they do, they will be meeting the desires of a very large section of the Irish people.

(5.9.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think that the discussion upon this Bill illustrates the kind of danger which the House is sometimes subjected to upon Wednesday afternoons. The discussion upon this Bill in fact only began an hour ago. Several supporters of the measure have delivered very brief speeches, and very moderate speeches; but there appears to be no suspicion upon the part of the great majority of the House that this Bill really raises a most important issue in connection with the Land Purchase Act. In fact issues which the House of Commons were engaged night after night in discussing last Session, and issues which the House took months to determine are now proposed to be upset in the course of an hour's conversation. Broadly speaking, the Bill aims at adding to the existing duties of the Congested Districts Board by empowering it to buy land for the purpose of erecting labourers' cottages, and it proposes the allocation of some of the money deliberately voted last Session for an altogether different purpose; for the purpose of creating small freehold occupiers, and to enable Local Authorities to buy land at a cheaper rate for the purpose of erecting labourers' cottages. I would earnestly ask the House to pause before it assents, in a light-hearted manner, to either of those proposals. Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that the duties the Congested Districts Board has to discharge are already weighty and multifarious. It is exposed to applications of the most miscellaneous kind; applications from every district within the congested area, all pressing the Board to expend the money allocated to it by Parliament in every possible manner, for the various purposes which, legitimately enough, that Board has got power to deal with. Now it is proposed to add to this already vast catalogue of functions the additional duty of dealing with labourers' cottages along the west coast of Ireland. Now, is it not true that there is, broadly speaking, no class of labourers along the west coast of Ireland at all? I take an agricultural labourer to mean a man who works for weekly wages for a farmer. Does such a class exist in any appreciable quantity along the west coast of Ireland? The hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion pointed to one or two places in which it was alleged there were a certain number of agricultural labourers. If that is so, it only arises from the fact that it is impossible so to draw the outline of the congested districts as to wholly exclude, here and there, minute fragments of land which might not be properly described as congested districts. Is it not perfectly clear to the House, if there were a place in which there were farmers so considerable that they were in a position to have dependent on them a large number of labourers on weekly wages, the district is not a congested district in the strict sense of the word; it is not a district in which the £1,500,000 allocated by Parliament should be properly applied. I would therefore recommend the House not to pass the Bill, certainly in so far as Clause 3 is concerned. There remains the question of the more general powers sought to be embodied in this Bill. In Clause 2 it is provided that the Local Authorities, instead of going to obtain loans for labourers' cottages to the Board of Works, should go to the Land Commission and get some of the £33,000,000 allocated. Some hon. Gentlemen may say that there is no fund out of which we can provide money for plots for labourers' cottages. Why, the amount of money at the control of the Local Authorities is absolutely unlimited. The State at present provides, at the ordinary rate of interest current in such cases, as much money as can be taken up, and as much as the Local Authorities require, for the carrying out of the purposes of the Labourers' Acts, and all this Bill, therefore, does is to enable Local Authorities to obtain this money at as low or at a lower rate of interest than they otherwise could do. And where does the money come from? It comes from a strictly limited fund, allocated by Parliament last year for the purpose of creating freeholders in Ireland. This Bill does not create freeholders. I will not travel out of my way to deal with the contention of the hon. Member for West Belfast with regard to the failure of the Land Purchase Act. It may be thought that the money would not be wanted in Ireland for the purpose of purchasing freeholds, because the Act of last year was a failure. It is absurd to judge of that Act, obviously imperfectly understood in Ireland, an Act which has been in operation for only six months, and which, during those six months, had for its rival another Act giving money upon terms more agreeable to the tenants than the Act of last year, combined with the low price of Consols, which necessarily compelled this country to charge more for the loans for the purchase of land than it otherwise would. It would be absurd to argue from those circumstances, or to found the conclusion upon them, that the Act of last year has been, or that it is likely to be, a failure. And I am convinced that if the tenants—especially in the North of Ireland—really supposed that anything had been done to diminish a fund deliberately given them by Parliament by an Act passed after the most elaborate discussion, and ratified by the House after full debate—if they thought that this fund was to be taken away from them at the conclusion of a one-and-a-half-hours' debate on a Wednesday afternoon, I think they would consider us to be very poor trustees of the interests confided to us. The Government object to the two main clauses of this Bill—the clauses which unnecessarily and inadvisedly diminish the funds allocated by this House for that purpose. I earnestly trust that the House will not come to any conclusion which would thus hastily and recklessly interfere with the deliberative Act which we undertook to carry out in the last Session of Parliament.

(5.23.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast W.): The right hon. Gentleman has asked the House to reject the Bill on the Second Reading on account of the objections which he takes to two clauses. But there are other clauses in the Bill to which he takes no objection. To the 1st clause of the Bill there can be objection, because the House has already affirmed the principle

"Notwithstanding," it says "anything contained in Section 6 of the Labourers (Ireland) Act 1883, and the Acts amending or extending the same, a Sanitary Authority shall have power to provide for a plot of garden not exceeding one statute acre being allotted to each labourer's dwelling whether erected before or after the passing of this Act."

I shall now come to the two objections of the right hon. Gentleman. H objects to increasing the duties of the Congested Districts Board; but the Bill leaves any increase of duties to their own discretion, and if the demands of the people in the congested districts have been met already, then the Congested Districts Board can have no increase of duties. As to the diversion of the funds, not only has there been an entire indifference shown by the great body of the tenants of Ireland, but out of the £30,000,000 provided only £80,000 has been applied for in the year, and there is no reason whatever to expect that the greater part of the balance is likely to be applied for, so that, therefore, there can be no danger whatever in diverting a small portion this money for this purpose. I regret the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. I think it was delivered without having taken the feeling of the whole of the House.

*(5.28.) SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I cannot agree with what has fallen from the hon. Member opposite, that it is desirable to increase universally throughout Ireland the number of labourers' cottages and plots. The real difficulty in the congested districts is this, there you have no demand for labour at all. The people there are really all labourers with allotments, and there is no demand for their labour, and I would call the attention of the House to the fact that this Bill only gives discretionary power in the congested districts to the Congested Districts Board.

MR. J. E. REDMOND: I beg to move that the Question be now put.

MR. SPEAKER: Considering that this Debate has only lasted for one hour since the time when the hon. Member who introduced the Bill sat down, and other hon. Members have risen to speak on both sides of the House, I think further time should be allowed for the discussion of the Bill.

*SIR JOHN COLOMB: The effect of the Bill would be to duplicate the machinery in the congested districts. The Poor Law Boards have already power to erect labourers' cottages, and now you are to ask the Congested Districts Board to do what is in the power of the Poor Law Boards. Therefore, I oppose the Second Reading of this Bill, because it shifts on to a Government Department a duty that essentially belongs to the Board of Guardians itself. It has been said that there has been great jobbery perpetuated in the construction of labourers' cottages by these Boards. I say it is the business of these Boards to check that jobbery and see that the work is done, and I object to the work being shifted to another Department. I think it is a very material change which is proposed by this Bill. I do not see that it is a desirable principle to adopt, and on that ground also I should oppose the Second Reading of this Bill. I think, on the whole, therefore, it would be unwise and impolitic to pass such a measure as this. I think it would frustrate and impede the action of the Congested Districts Board—

It being half an hour after Five of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed To-morrow.

CONVEYANCING AND LAW OF PROPERTY ACT (1881) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 110.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Matthew J. Kenny.)

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I beg to appeal to the hon. Member not to persevere with his objection. There is a general consensus of opinion in favour of this Bill, not only on these Benches but on all sides of the House.

DR. CHARLES K. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw his objection. From what I have heard of this Bill, it is not one which should be opposed.

663 Feus and Building Leases {COMMONS} (Scotland) Bill.

MR. M. J. KENNY: I beg to withdraw the Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill reported, without Amendment.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS (ESTIMATES, 1892-3).

Copy presented,—of Estimates for Civil Services and Revenue Departments for the year ending 31st March 1893 [by Command]; Referred to the Committee of Supply, and to be printed. [No. 48.]

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS, 1892-3 (MEMORANDUM ON ESTIMATES).

Copy presented,—of Memorandum of the Financial Secretary to the Treasury relating to the Civil Service and Revenue Departments Estimates, 1892-3 [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS (APPROPRIATION ACCOUNTS).

Copy presented,—of Appropriation Accounts, 1890-91, with Reports of the Comptroller and Auditor General thereon [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

NAVY (APPROPRIATION ACCOUNT).

Copy presented,—of the Appropriation Account for the Navy for 1890-91, with Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS (IRELAND).

Copies presented,—of Treasury Warrants, dated the 26th January and the 5th February 1892, appointing Francis A. Fanning, esquire, to be First Assistant Registrar, and William H. Drennan, esquire, to be Second Assistant Registrar, in the Registry of Deeds (Ireland) [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

BANK OF ENGLAND.

Paper laid upon the Table by Clerk of the House:—

Copy of all Applications made to the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the Governor or Deputy Governor of the Bank of England for Advance of Government authorised by Parliament, from 5th January 1892 to 5th January 1892 [by A

MOTIONS.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC LOCAL VETO (WALES) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Bowen Rowlands (Cheshire), Bill to enable owners and occupiers of Wales to have effectual control over Liquor Traffic, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bowen Rowlands, Mr. Samuel Smith, and Mr. Phillips.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (LAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Robert Reid (Dundee), Bill to enable Local Authorities to a Land, ordered to be brought in by Mr. J. Reid, Mr. Arthur Acland, Mr. Broadbent, Mr. Winterbotham, Mr. Easlemon, and Mr. Compton.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill

CASUALTIES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Robert Reid (Dundee), Bill to abolish Casualties by Purchasing Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Robert Reid, and Dr. Hunter.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill

FEUS AND BUILDING LEASES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Donald Crawford (Aberdeen, N.E.), Bill to amend the Law relating to Feus and Leases for Building in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Donald Crawford, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Munro Ferguson, and Mr. Phillips.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Six o'

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 18th February, 1892.

SAT FIRST IN PARLIAMENT.

The Earl of Portsmouth—after the death of his father.

Daniel Lewis, Lord Bishop of Bangor was (in the usual manner) introduced.

QUEEN'S SPEECH—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD CHAMBERLAIN (the Earl of Lathom) reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address as follows:—

"I return you My sincere thanks for your dutiful and affectionate Address, and for your sympathy with Me and My Family in the grievous loss which I and My people have suffered by the death of My beloved Grandson. The assurances of your participation in My personal sorrow have given Me very great satisfaction."

The Address and Answer ordered to be printed and published.

EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES

BILL [H.L.]—(No. 4.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Halsbury) : My Lords, I have a difficulty in suggesting to your Lordships anything new to say upon the subject of this Bill ; it has been so completely before your Lordships, and, so far as I know, the universal opinion has been in its favour. I do not think I remember any dissentient voice upon the general principle of the Bill, given the conditions of the law of evidence as it at present stands. As your Lordships are aware, in a certain number of offences the law at present is that a person may give evidence on his own behalf if he elects to do so ; and I am bound to say that, since your Lordships passed this Bill last year, one or two cases have occurred which certainly give a very strong illustration of the mode in which the present law of evidence may be worked. There was one very striking case, in which I think an hon. Member of the other House was engaged as counsel, in which a man was charged with one of those offences about which he could be examined. He gave evidence, and, by reason of the evidence that he had given, he was acquitted before a jury. For some reason or another that I am unable to understand, which I suppose may or may not have been the act of the prosecutor, he was indicted for perjury given on the occasion upon which he was examined as a witness, and I need not tell your Lordships that under those circumstances (although the jury had acquitted him when they heard his story, and he was indicted afresh for perjury for saying the same thing) on that occasion of course his evidence was not receivable. Fortunately, as I think, he was again acquitted ; but, had he been convicted, I really do not know what would have been the condition in which any Home Secretary would have been. That condition of things seems to me almost to speak for itself. The other case occurred during last year after the discussion in your Lordships' House. There was an old gentleman, I think 80 years of age, who had been tried and convicted, and had suffered punishment for an offence in respect of the sale of a vessel. The same question was raised by an action, and he was then, but he could not have been on the previous occasion, examined as a witness, and, by consent of counsel on both sides, and with the full opinion of the learned Judge, who tried the case, in his favour, it was admitted that he had actually proved his innocence, and there could have been no doubt that the former conviction, under which he had suffered imprisonment, was wrong, and that, had he been capable of giving the same evidence on the criminal trial, the result would have been different. These, my Lords, are two out of many cases ; and I confess myself I am a little startled to find that when the opinion has been so all but universal, and so many times the Bill has passed your Lordships' House to enable all persons to have what most person's sense of justice must regard as the right to give evidence in their own cases, for some reason or other this Bill has been unable to pass the other House. I do hope, my Lords, at all events, that this Session an effort will be made that it should pass, and that that right should be given which the universal sense of justice assents to, I think, as being the right of every person who is now accused. The only argument, my Lords, that I have heard against the Bill is one founded, as it appears to me, upon the notion that no person ought to be examined as a witness who is charged with any criminal offence. Whether rightly or wrongly, that is not the view of the Legislature. All the arguments appear to me now to be absolutely inconsistent with the action of the Legislature, which in, I think, 20 or 30 classes of offences has now distinctly admitted persons to be examined. Under these circumstances, my Lords, I do not think I can add more to what has been said on the subject. I can well remember a very great Judge, Lord Campbell, on one occasion adopting an expedient which I thought at the time exhibited a zeal a little beyond the law. There were cross indictments between two persons for assault, neither of whom, of course, was admissible as a witness in the case in which he was himself indicted. Lord Campbell swore both juries at once; and the result was that both the accused then became capable of being examined as witnesses. And I remember well thinking—it was when I was very young at the Bar—that, if that was right which Lord Campbell said was to be done, it was rather an indirect expedient for doing that which the law now would permit to be done universally. My Lords, I have only one more observation that I wish to make. The substantial provisions of the Bill are the same as those which your Lordships have more than once passed through the House. There are the safeguards to which I have referred, of the consent of the husband and wife, respectively, being required as the necessary condition of either being examined against the other. And, my Lords, I have to-day received a very singular communication from a very able County Court Judge, who tells me that in, I think he says, four cases this singular condition of things has arisen—which might perhaps throw some doubt upon the propriety of the provision with reference to the consent of the husband and wife respectively. I only throw it out with reference to the passing of the Bill, and whether some provision might be made in Committee. It appears that an adulterous wife has procured a person to personate her husband and forge his signature, and the wife has been incapable of being prosecuted for forgery—the actual forger having escaped. The wife cannot be prosecuted, inasmuch as she certainly would not consent to the husband being examined to prove that the document in question, a promissory note, was a forgery; and the result is that she is perfectly independent of the law, and able to forge as many times as she can get the adulterer to aid her. Under those circumstances, my Lords, it may be a question whether there ought not to be some provision to meet such a case as that with regard to the consent being essential for the husband and wife, respectively, being examined. I think, with that exception, my Lords, I have nothing further to add, and I have now to ask your Lordships to read the Bill a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I need hardly add anything to what the noble and learned Lord has said in favour of this Bill, because I have already on many occasions expressed my view to your Lordships' House that this measure ought to be passed into law. I only rise for the purpose of expressing the hope that the Government will now press forward this Bill, so that it may pass into law. So far as I know, the Bill might have been on the Statute Book by this time if it had not been for the apprehension with regard to its provisions which exists in the minds of some of the Irish Members, who do not desire it to be extended to Ireland. Now, of course, if the Government have time to deal with the question so as to pass it into law, notwithstanding opposition, well and good; but I would earnestly urge this: that, if that be found impossible, on account of difficulties of time, at all events a measure which is desired for England, and which everybody feels to be desirable for England, should not be delayed; because, if it passes into law here, and works, as I believe it will, satisfactorily, that will greatly diminish, and not in any way add to, any difficulty of hereafter extending it to Ireland.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (according to order) and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Five o'clock.

---

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 18th February, 1892.

---

QUESTIONS.

---

INTERNATIONAL SANITARY CONFERENCE AT VENICE.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the draft of the Protocol submitted on behalf of England to the International Sanitary Conference at Venice, which had to be withdrawn in favour of propositions submitted by the French delegates, was drawn with the assent and aid of the Medical Department of the Local Government Board, or of any other competent official medical advisers of the Government; and, if not, whether the Foreign Office will in the future provide itself with responsible medical advice before proceeding to draft and issue diplomatic proposals on questions of hygiene, depending for their acceptance upon the accuracy and value of the information on which they are founded?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): The Protocol referred to did not contain any new medical regulations or proposals on questions of hygiene, and it was not, therefore, necessary to consult the Medical Advisers of the Local Government Board thereon. The Protocol was not withdrawn, as stated in the hon. Member's Question. The proposals submitted by the French delegates were submitted as amendments to the Protocol. All the Departments of Her Majesty's Government interested were consulted in the preparation of the instructions given to the British delegates.

FISH LANDED AT BRIXHAM.

MR. MALLOCK (Devon, Torquay): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade from what source the Board of Trade obtains the statistics relating to fish landed at Brixham, given in the Return "Sea Fisheries (U. K.)," Paper 1891 (128), page 20, and how these statistics are verified; if he is aware that all fish landed at Brixham (except an insignificant amount) is sold there, and a toll thereon paid to the Harbour Commissioners; and that the Harbour Commissioners accounts show that the value of the fish landed at Brixham in 1890 amounted to £51,553, whereas the above mentioned Return puts the value at £87,007; and if he can account for this discrepancy?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I will cause strict inquiry to be made at Brixham into the cause of the difference between the value of fish landed at that place as returned to the Board of Trade and to the Harbour Commissioners. The total of each of these Returns is correctly stated by the hon. Member. The Board of Trade statistics are collected by a person specially employed for the purpose, who is himself a member of the Harbour Board. Those of the Commissioners are stated to be the total of the Returns made to them by the licensed salesmen for the purpose of fixing the amount of tolls payable by them to the Commissioners. The question, of course, is whether there is any considerable quantity of fish which, although landed at Brixham, does not come into the market there, and so far my information as to this point is at variance with the statement in the second paragraph of the Question.

IRISH CATTLE TRUCKS

MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Board of Trade has decided to recommend the adoption of the same rates for cattle trucks in Ireland and England; and, if so, whether his attention has been called to the fact that cattle trucks in Ireland are smaller and capable of containing fewer cattle than cattle trucks in England, and that therefore the effect of a similar rate per truck for the two countries would be to impose a higher rate for the transit by rail of cattle in Ireland than is at present in operation in this country?

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.), had notice of the following Question:—To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, as the difference of gauge between the Irish and the English railways necessitates a corresponding difference in the construction of their cattle trucks, resulting in the Irish trucks being incapable of carrying with safety the same number of cattle as the English, he will consider the advisability of fixing the rates proportionally?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH: I will answer the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for Down County at the same time as this. I do not consider that it was proved at the recent inquiries as regards Railway Rates in Ireland that Irish cattle trucks generally are smaller than English cattle trucks. On the contrary, the greater breadth of gauge in Ireland has a tendency in the other direction; but the maximum rates for the conveyance of live stock in Ireland must be fixed by considerations too numerous to refer to in an answer to a Question, and of these the size of the trucks is only one. Of course, it would be my desire that, under similar circumstances, the charges should be no higher in Ireland than in England.

LABOURERS IN THE ORDNANCE STORE DEPARTMENT.

COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can state the number of labourers employed in the Army Branch of the Ordnance Store Department of the Royal Arsenal, Woolwich; and how many of those earn 17s. a week, and how many 18s. and 19s. respectively?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The labourers employed are 865. Of these, 175 are paid 17s. a week, 372 at 18s., 159 at 19s., and the remainder are paid at a higher rate. The men receiving the lowest rate of pay receive an increase at the end of 12 months.

DR. THOMAS GALLAGHER.

MR. FLAVIN (Cork): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Dr. Thomas Gallagher, undergoing a sentence of penal servitude for life in Chatham Prison, has become insane?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The medical officer of Chatham Prison reports that the convict Gallagher is in good bodily health, and exhibits no indications of mental unsoundness, but appears quite rational.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Dublin, College Green): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman the date of that information?

MR. MATTHEWS: The information is quite recent; it was supplied in consequence of the Notice of this Question appearing on the Paper.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The last visit the prisoner received was from a lady from America in 1890, and since that year no letter has been received from the prisoner by his friends or relatives. In reply to inquiry made in 1890 the Governor of the prison said Gallagher would write soon. He has not written since, and I now ask the right hon. Gentleman, seeing that there is a very general impression amongst his friends in America that the convict has become insane, will he allow an independent inquiry to be made by a medical officer nominated for the purpose?

MR. MATTHEWS: I must ask the hon. Member to give me notice of this Question. At present I see no ground for distrusting the Report of the medical officer of the prison.

THE CASE OF JAMES WALL.

SIR EDWARD REED (Cardiff) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of James Wall, sentenced at Cardiff Police Court to one month's imprisonment with hard labour on the 6th inst., for non-maintenance of his wife and child; whether he is aware that the wife deserted her home and husband; and whether he will inquire into all the circumstances of the case with a view to the remission of the sentence?

MR. MATTHEWS : I have received a report from the Magistrate's clerk, and also a Petition with reference to this case. The facts alleged in the Petition differ essentially from the account given by the Magistrate's clerk, from which I gather that the prisoner constantly and grossly ill-treated his wife; and that, in consequence of his conduct, she went in fear of her life, and ultimately left him and went to live with her mother until after her confinement in September last, and maintained herself so long as she was able to work. The prisoner sold off his furniture and left his home in Cardiff in April last, making no provision for his wife, although, as I am informed, he had means to do so, leaving her ignorant of his place of abode. When he was brought before the Court on the charge of neglecting to maintain his wife, it appears that he offered to live with her, but as he had no house or home to which to take her, the Magistrates did not believe his offer was bona fide, and they sentenced him to a month's imprisonment with hard labour. The conviction was under the Vagrant Act, under Section 14 of which it was open to the prisoner to appeal. Upon this state of the facts, I am not prepared to advise any interference with the sentence.

RAILWAY TRAVELLERS AND THE NAMES OF STATIONS.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Dublin, College Green) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether in view of the difficulty experienced by railway travellers, especially at night, in ascertaining the names of the stations along their routes, he would endeavour to induce the Railway Companies to make provision for displaying in each carriage during the journey the name of the station at which the train will make its next stop?

*SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH : I have no power to call upon the Railway Companies to make any such arrangements as the hon. Member suggests; nor have any mechanical means been brought under my notice by which the result could be effected.

MR. CHARLES F. STEWART, J.P., OF HORN HEAD.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has been directed to the fact that, early in this month, Mr. Charles F. Stewart, J.P., of Horn Head, was summoned by the Earl of Leitrim to a Court of Petty Sessions, held at Dunfanaghy, County Donegal, before Colonel Bowley, R.M., and Mr. Charles A. Ramsay, J.P., for illegally altering the position of a licensed leap net off the Horn Head coast; whether the Lord Chancellor's attention has been further called to the fact that after witnesses, including the Earl of Leitrim, had been brought to Dunfanaghy on three several occasions, and after it had been proved that, out of 3,482 fish, the total number caught for last season, 829 were taken in the illegal leap net between 10th June and 29th August, Mr. Stewart, on the advice of Mr. Mackey, the Crown Solicitor, who defended him, pleaded guilty to the charge, whereupon the Magistrates decided that the case was one for a substantial penalty, and fined Mr. Stewart £10, and £1 for the 37 days on which it was proved that he fished illegally; and whether it is the intention of the Lord Chancellor, having regard to these circumstances, to retain Mr. Stewart in the Commission of the Peace?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) : I understand it is the case that Mr. Charles F. Stewart was summoned to a Court of Petty Sessions as mentioned in the Question. I understand Mr. Stewart admitted that he had made the alteration in the position of the net, and explained that he did so in ignorance of the law on the subject. I am not informed as to the intention of the Lord Chancellor.

MR. MAC NEILL : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. Stewart's solicitor asked that, under the circumstances, a nominal fine should be imposed; whether the Magistrate said that a nominal fine would not meet the case, and a penalty of £50 was imposed. Now, is Mr. Stewart to be retained in the Commission of the Peace or not?

MR. JACKSON : I cannot add to my answer. I am not aware of the details to which the hon. Member refers.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) : Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire if, at the trial, Mr. Stewart was not required, under writ of subpæna duces tecum, to produce certain documents, which, being obtained, were then withheld and not produced in Court?

MR. JACKSON : If the hon. Gentleman will give notice of that Question, I will endeavour to answer it.

KILLYBEGS HARBOUR.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, during the tour of the present First Lord of the Treasury in Donegal, applications were made to him to promote the construction of a pier or quay at Killybegs, and that Mr. James Walker urged on the First Lord the necessity of having a Carnullagh boat-slip on the east side of Killybegs Harbour repaired before it became absolutely useless; whether he is aware that, although in reply to Mr. Warren's repeated applications he received a letter from the Under Secretary stating that the case was "one that would be submitted for the consideration of the new Congested Districts Board" nothing whatever has been done for the locality; and, whether he can now announce that any steps will be taken by the Congested Districts Board in the direction indicated?

*MR. JACKSON : The question of proceeding with a pier at Killybegs has been considered several times. I do not know what decision the Board may come to ultimately, but probably it will be wise to wait until the completion of the railway and see what necessity arises for the construction. The repair of the boat-slip is, I believe, under consideration.

THE FALKLAND ISLANDS.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Secretary of State for the Colonies has received several Petitions and Memorials from the inhabitants of the Falkland Islands, urging that, as the leases of Crown lands for grazing purposes are now falling in, provision should be made that no individual or company should hold land exceeding a certain definite limit; whether he can inform the House of the circumstances under which an Ordinance was passed by the Legislative Council on the 29th September, 1890, authorising the sale of certain lands; what was the constitution of the Council on that occasion; and, whether, having regard to the fact that the present Governor, Sir R. Goldsworthy, possesses the confidence of the colonists, the Secretary of State for the Colonies will grant the inquiry which has been so frequently demanded into the administration of the affairs of the Falkland Islands?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth) : The Secretary of State has received one Petition, but not several Petitions, from certain inhabitants of Stanley in the Falkland Islands, alleging that the holders of leases of Crown lands for grazing purposes are occupying more land than is comprised in their leases, some of which are falling in, but are subject to rights of renewal; and praying that such surplus land may be secured for the benefit of colonists other than the existing lessees. The object of the Ordinance referred to in the second paragraph of the Question which was passed on the 29th December, 1890, was to enable the Government to sell to the Falkland Islands Company, certain lands of which they were lessees, at the rate of 3s. per acre instead of 4s. per acre, the rate fixed by a previous ordinance as the selling price of country lands. The Council consisted of the Governor, the Colonial Secretary, the Colonial Surgeon, and two unofficial members, Messrs. Cobb and Felton. The statement of the hon. Member in the concluding portion of his question that the Governor possesses the confidence of the colonists, disposes of his suggestion that an inquiry into the administration of the colony is necessary.

Mr. Jackson

MR. MAC NEILL. The right hon. Gentleman will allow me to explain that I did not refer to the administration as conducted by the present Governor, but under the late Governor. May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to say how many of the members of this Executive Council who sold at under value these Crown lands to the Falkland Islands Company are shareholders in that Company?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Member must give me notice of that question.

THE ROYAL CHAPELS, WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works why the Royal chapels at Westminster Abbey were closed on Monday, 8th February, although Mondays are free days of the Abbey?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information he desires, and I understand the right of regulating the admission of the public to Westminster Abbey rests with the Dean and Chapter. I have no official authority in the matter whatever.

CONTRACTS FOR ARMY SOCKS.

MR. LOGAN (Leicester, Harborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he is aware that contracts for Army socks are being described by the men employed in making the articles as "a curse to the trade;" that an average workman engaged on that class of goods at a handframe earns less than 12s. per week of 70 hours; and if he will inform the House what were the comparative prices for Army socks in 1885, and in 1891, and 1892?

MR. E. STANHOPE: My attention has been called to a statement of this kind made before the Labour Commission. How far, if true, it is due to improved machinery or to preventable causes is a matter upon which I hope light will be thrown by the Report of the Committee. It is not usual to publish contract prices of this sort, but I have no objection to state that since 1885 there has been a fall of nearly 17 per cent.

THE CLOGAN GOLD MINE.

MR. T. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can state how many tons of gold ore have been treated at the Clogan Gold Mine, near Dolgelly, from 1st November 1891 up to the present time; what has been the average value of such ore per ton; and what royalty is claimed by the Crown on the product of this mine. Whether he is aware that the royalty exacted compels the lessees of the mine to discard and waste large quantities of low grade ore, and prevents them from erecting machinery and employing labour to treat such ore; whether under the existing terms imposed upon this mine by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, for £100 worth of gold, won at a cost of £80, the Crown takes £15 as royalty, thus leaving £5 to the adventurers for the risk of mining; and whether the Government purpose taking any steps to re-adjust Crown royalties, with a view to the fuller development of the mines of the Crown and the increased employment of labour? I find I have made an error in the terms of the notice in describing the royalty as £15.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I thought the hon. Member had fallen into the error of confusing the 1-15th royalty with 15 per cent. According to the returns furnished from the Clogan Mine, 30 tons 12 cwt. 16lb. of vein stuff were treated for the extraction of the precious metals between October 24th and the 4th inst., and produced 1,023 oz. 3 dwts. 12 gr. of bullion, giving an average yield of 33·43 oz. of bullion per ton of vein stuff treated during the period. The royalty on this product is at the rate of 1-15th of the value. There is no evidence that the royalty exacted compels the lessees of the mine to discard and waste large quantities of low-grade ore, and prevents them from erecting machinery and employing labour to treat such ore. No complaint about the royalty has been received from the lessees, and the present manager has stated that he sees nothing, as to royalty or anything else, to complain of. Notwithstanding this, the royalty has recently been reduced to one-half (namely, 1-30th) on low-grade ores, with a view to encourage the treatment of such ores; and there is no reason to doubt that the low-grade ores at Clogan will be treated as soon as the rich ore falls off in quantity, as in the case at the Morgan mine. There is no reason whatever for supposing that every £100 worth of gold at Clogan is won at a cost of £80; and it is certainly not the fact that the Crown takes £15 as royalty. The Crown royalty on £100 worth of rich ore at Clogan amounts to £6. 13s. 4d., and on low-grade ore to £3 6s. 8d. The fact that the royalties at Clogan mine have been re-adjusted in the manner stated shows that the Government are anxious to encourage the development of this industry. Re-adjustments have been offered in other cases, and in some they have been accepted.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman having regard to the fact that it is desirable to increase the metallic reserves of the country would he not allow £100 of gold to be produced at a cost of £90 without taking two-thirds of the profit?

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member must give me notice of a further question.

THE DISMISSAL OF G. L. JEFFRIES FROM ENFIELD FACTORY.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will inquire into the reasons why George L. Jeffries, employed at the Royal Small Arms Factory at Enfield, as writer, was dismissed at a moment's notice, and without a week's wages in lieu of notice, for writing to Mr. John Black, Civil servant, a letter complaining of favouritism, and petitioning for a rise of wages, which letter Mr. Black is said to have qualified as offensive; and whether it is usual to prevent a man, discharged from one department, procuring a situation in all others?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes; I will inquire into this case. I have not yet had time to do so.

THE CASE OF MR. JOBSON.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can now give an answer as to the case of Mr. Jobson?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I have nothing to add to a reply I made to the hon. Member for Camborne (Mr. Conybeare) on the 12th of August last.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I think the right hon. Gentleman then said he would consider the question?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Yes; and I am afraid I can only say that, having considered it, I have nothing to add to what I then said.

CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES.

MR. JENNINGS (Stockport): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if the Government have received any information of a conference recently held at Washington, between Canadian and United States Commissioners, for the "arrangement of the basis of a reciprocity trade agreement between Canada and the United States"; if it be true that the basis of such an agreement has been settled; and if Sir Julian Pauncefote gave to Mr. Blaine the assurance ascribed to him in the despatches to the Times of the 15th instant, to the effect that "Lord Salisbury would consider favourably any request within the bounds of reason which the Commissioners might make?"

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Informal communications have recently taken place at Washington between delegates from Canada and Mr. Blaine, Secretary of State of the United States, regarding the trade relations of the two countries. It was previously stipulated by Mr. Blaine that the meeting should be altogether informal. The Canadian delegates have now returned to Ottawa. As regards the last two questions, we have not yet received a Report from Sir Julian Pausefote, but I may say that we have no reason to suppose that any such assurance as that referred to has been given.

THE CORK BANKRUPTCY COURT.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Cork) : I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland has been called to the repeated representations of the commercial public of Cork as to the necessity for extending the jurisdiction of the Cork Local Bankruptcy Court, so as to include within its powers the adjoining counties with which the City of Cork is in close commercial relations; and whether, in view of the satisfactory and efficient manner in which the Court has worked up to the present, and having regard to the great economy effected by it, as well in the interest of creditors in dealing with insolvent estates as in the general administration of the Irish Bankruptcy Law, he will now recommend the Lord Lieutenant to exercise his powers of enlarging the jurisdiction of the Court?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University) : I am informed that representations have been submitted to the Lord Chancellor as to the extension of the jurisdiction of the Cork Local Bankruptcy Court. He is giving the matter careful attention before offering the Lord Lieutenant advice on the subject.

MR. T. M. HEALY : I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that representations have been made during several years. Could he not fix some definite term within which the Lord Chancellor might decide whether there should be an extension or not?

MR. MADDEN : I am only able to give the hon. Member the answer supplied to me, that the Lord Chancellor is giving consideration to the matter.

CORK MAILS.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Cork) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the complaints of the commercial public of Cork as to the shortness of the interval allowed for answering letters between 12.45 or 1 p.m. when the English mail arriving in the City at 11.45 is delivered, and 1.40 p.m., the post hour for the mail leaving by the 2.10 p.m. train; whether the English mail has recently been accelerated so as to reach Belfast at 9.30 a.m. and Londonderry correspondingly early, and whether it is proposed to confer similar advantages on Cork; whether the Great Southern and Western Railway have offered to make arrangements by which the morning mail would reach Cork about 11 a.m., and the afternoon post would not leave Cork till 3 p.m.; and, whether it is intended to carry out some arrangement of this kind?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.) : Attention has been called to this matter the details of which are described with substantial accuracy in the question, and the scheme referred to is now receiving careful consideration.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Can the right hon. Gentleman say when he will be in a position to announce his decision as to the proposed arrangements?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON : It is a matter that concerns more than one Department, therefore I am unable to say when the matter will be settled.

MR. T. M. HEALY : I shall repeat the question.

IRISH CIVIL BILL OFFICERS.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Cork) : I beg to ask the Attorney General whether, in the measure which he proposes to introduce for the improvement of the Irish County Court system, he will make some provision to improve the position of the Irish Civil Bill officers by increasing the very small salary they are now entitled to?

MR. MADDEN : This matter is rather different from the suggestion brought before me, and with regard to which my former statement was made. I cannot give any undertaking or say more than that I will bring it under the attention of the Government.

IRISH RESIDENT MAGISTRATES.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, on the 31st December, 1891, five vacancies occurred in the staff of Resident Magistrates in Ireland by reason of the operation of the Civil Service rule requiring public officials to retire on their attaining 65 years of age; how many of such vacancies have been filled up by the appointment of District Inspectors of the Royal Irish Constabulary, or members of the Irish Bar; how many had any legal training, and how many were Roman Catholics?

*MR. JACKSON: Four vacancies have, up to the present, actually taken place among the Resident Magistrates in Ireland by the operation of the age rule. Two of these vacancies have been filled by the appointment of two District Inspectors of the Royal Irish Constabulary, a third by a member of the Irish Bar, and the fourth by a gentleman who had already experience as a Justice of the Peace. The last-named is a Roman Catholic.

BOILERS IN HER MAJESTY'S SHIPS.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can state the cause of the failure of the boilers of Her Majesty's ships Thunderer, Vulcan, Blake, Blenheim, and other vessels; whether it is due to the adoption of double-ended boilers, with single combustion chambers and cramped arrangement of the boiler-tubes; whether this type of boiler has proved safe and suitable for the application of "forced draught"; is the same system being adopted for all or any of the vessels now building; if so, will he say how many; also, how many are afloat fitted with this type of boiler; and whether the boilers of the Thunderer and other ships are to be replaced with others; if so, will he state the probable cost of the alterations?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. Forwood, Lancashire, Ormskirk): In the unavoidable absence of my noble Friend, perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer. The boilers of the Thunderer, the Vulc, the Blake, the Blenheim, and other ships have not failed in indicated in the hon. Question; but the ant designer, that they would in to their size give an ex-indicated power for short periods under forced draught, have not in all cases been realised. The trials of the Blenheim are not, however, yet completed. The battleships and cruisers constructed under the Naval Defence Act have boilers of a larger proportionate size, and those already completed have passed their trials with perfectly satisfactory results. It is not possible within the limits of a Parliamentary answer to explain or discuss the various theories or considerations of a highly technical character in connection with the construction of the boilers for the Navy, but a full statement on the subject will be made in the Navy Estimates. I may state, further, that experiments and investigations, with a view to overcome the difficulties, are still being made, and until these are complete it is not possible to say what ships will be re-boilered, and the cost thereof.

CIVIL SERVANTS OVER SIXTY-FIVE.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer would he give a Return showing the number, and names, and positions of Civil servants over 65 retained in the Service?

MR. GOSCHEN: In the Circular which was sent to the different Departments by the Treasury on December 12th, 1890, together with copies of the Order in Council of August 15th, 1890, it was stated that it was the intention of the Treasury to lay yearly before Parliament a Return of officers whose tenure of service is prolonged after they have reached the age of 65, together with the reasons upon which the Department have asked for and obtained such prolongation.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman what is yearly? Is it this year or next year? We want to call attention to the invidious way in which the rule has been exercised—retiring Sir Thomas Brady, an old and useful public servant while retaining other Civil servants according to some system of favouritism by the T.

HEN Let me remind Gentleman tha y which exercise each Department the Order in Council it is for heads of Departments to state whether they consider services should be continued or not. The Treasury has no power even if there were the desire, to do in the manner suggested.

T. M. HEALY: Will the right Gentleman state when we shall have this information; then we can have our comments?

GOSCHEN: The information will be forthcoming in the ordinary course.

T. M. HEALY: Can the right Gentleman give us any idea

GOSCHEN: I have promised to turn, and it will be given shortly. Let me say more.

RURAL POSTMEN.

SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashfield): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will take into consideration the case of rural postmen, in the established staff, with a view of giving them concessions equivalent to those granted to the London postmen in July last; and whether he will inform the House why some postmen, who attain the rate of 13s. a week, are established and are not?

JAMES FERGUSSON: I am of opinion that I cannot encourage an extension that rural postmen will be placed on the same footing as the metropolitan; but there are now in the market sundry applications for payment in individual cases, in regard to which I shall shortly decide. I am of the opinion that the only cases in which postmen, receiving 13s. a week, are on the establishment, are those in which they are debarred from it on account of age or of some other qualification.

AGRICULTURAL RETURNS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the Agricultural Returns collected in June have been issued in October, and whether the Returns collected last June have been issued nearly three months earlier than the time; and the fact that Returns delayed for several months will have lost much of their value as aids to agriculturists, he can arrange in future for the issue of Returns within two months after collection?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that it was arranged that the Agricultural Returns collected in June, 1891, should be issued in three stages instead of two as heretofore. A preliminary summary was issued as usual in August, and in October a complete abstract was published showing the acreage under each kind of crop, and the number of animals under each head in each division of the United Kingdom. This statement contains the chief information which agriculturists and others require for practical purposes, and by this means I have been able to place the particulars referred to in their hands at a much earlier date than for many years past. I am afraid that it would be impossible to issue the complete Returns within two months after collection as suggested by the hon. Member, but no pains will be spared to accelerate the issue of the summaries and abstracts referred to, as well as of the annual volume.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he has received any conclusive information as to the origin of the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease at Cowsted Farm, Isle of Sheppey; and whether any other sources of infection than the imported cattle in the metropolitan markets have now been discovered, and are being dealt with? I would also ask the right hon. Gentleman if he can give the House any information as to a reported outbreak of the disease at Hayward's Heath?

MR. CHAPLIN: I have no evidence which I consider to be conclusive as to the origin of the outbreak in the Isle of Sheppey. It is known that animals, which were in the London market immediately before the outbreak was discovered, were sent to Sittingbourne, whence frequent communication takes place with the Isle of Sheppey. But whether the disease was conveyed to the island by animals or human beings I am not in a position to say. No sources of infection have been discovered other than the outbreak of disease, which was detected in the Metropolitan Market on Thursday, February 4th. And I have not the slightest doubt that all the outbreaks which have since occurred in the metropolitan district and elsewhere must be traced to that Market. I regret to say that it is the case that an outbreak was reported to us last night as having occurred upon a farm at Cuckfield, near Hayward's Heath, in Sussex. Six cattle and fifteen sheep were found to be affected. I have ascertained this morning that the disease was introduced by some 20 sheep sent to Hayward's Heath from the Metropolitan Market before the disease was discovered last week. Every precaution has been taken, and will be taken, to prevent the disease spreading from that locality; but I am afraid we must still expect to hear of further outbreaks in the country from the same cause—namely, from animals having been sent into the country from the Metropolitan Market before we became aware of the existence of the disease.

PRINTING OF "THE ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT, 1891."

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether it is a fact that, in the first issue by the Queen's Printer of "The Elementary Education Act, 1891," in Section 5 certain words were printed which in subsequent issues were left out; whether he can state on whose authority the alteration was made in the Queen's Printer's text without an Act of Parliament; and whether he can state fully the circumstances of the case?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Certain words, which were struck out, when the Lords' Amendments were under consideration in this House, appeared in the first issue of the Act by the Queen's Printer, and the action of the Department which I represent was confined to calling attention of the Principal of the P Bill Office in the House of Lord the mistake that had been inadvertently made.

MR. A. O'CONNOR. When Lands Clauses Consolidation Act passed two or three words were obviously inserted by mistake, they were corrected by a subse Act. I should like to know by authority the words in this case eliminated.

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The referred to were inserted by a pri error. The words were in a co the Bill sent by the draftsman to the printer, and they were ins inadvertently. A proper copy of Act, as passed by both Houses, specially sent to the Queen's pri It was as a printer's error only, the correction was made.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Mr. Spe I would wish to ask you, Sir, in case of varying and doubtful t or an official issue being mad certain words, it is competent any Department to direct the pri to alter the text without the auth of an Act of Parliament?

MR. SPEAKER: I think the p test to apply would be whether i were any error either here or in House of Lords. There has bee error. The Clerk in this House an Clerk in the House of Lords mad proper entry, and the defect purely from an error of the draft which perhaps he had been led The true record is the signed co the Act, which is perfectly correct.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, Is the right hon. Gentleman a that the same thing happened last in the case of the Land Purchase a copy having been issued conta words that were not inserted e here or in the other House?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I was aware of it.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, Coll Will steps be taken to destroy all printed erroneously?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: That be done.

L GUN PRACTICE OFF PLYMOUTH.

MILDmay (Devon, Totnes) : I ask the President of the Board whether he is able to state fully when the Court of Inquiry into the practice of firing in the neighbourhood of Plymouth will hold sittings in Plymouth for the purpose of the evidence of the fishermen, whether the composition of the is finally settled?

MICHAEL HICKS BEACH : I no doubt that this Committee will sit at Plymouth, but I cannot any definite time at present.

A delay has occurred in this, in consequence of the resignation of Sir Charles Hall of the Chairmanship of the Committee upon his retirement as Recorder of London. I appoint his successor with as delay as possible.

E GLASGOW POST OFFICE.

GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glas-Bridgeton) : I beg to ask the Master General what are the powers of internal administration on the Glasgow postal authorities henceforward communicate through Edinburgh authority ; whether the fees which from time to time are in the delivery of letters, in the management of district post offices, in work and pay of the employees of issues, and in the provision of local facilities, will be made on the responsibility of the Glasgow post office acting directly under the Postmaster General, or whether arrangements in these matters will be left to an intermediate authority at Edinburgh ; and whether the master at Glasgow will have general charge of financial matters in the district of which he is master ?

JAMES FERGUSSON : The effect is that Reports from now concerning the business of Department will be sent to London through the Surveyor General of Scotland, as used to be done to the appointment of the postmaster. The Postmaster General will be thus informed simultaneously when necessary, as is the practice in like cases in other cities or districts in Scotland, instead of by the correspondence which has lately been necessitated. A closer supervision will also be exercised over the accounts of the office. Changes, such as those referred to in the second paragraph, are made, not on the responsibility of the postmaster of Glasgow, or of the Surveyor General in Edinburgh, but on that of the Postmaster General alone. He has to decide what changes shall be made, either in the postal facilities of Glasgow or in the work and pay of the Post Office servants, seeing that they largely involve expenditure. Financial matters have never been under the independent charge of the postmaster of Glasgow, and it is not proposed that they should be so.

SIR G. TREVELYAN : May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in the case of postal facilities being required in Glasgow, perhaps a matter of small nature, the postmaster of Glasgow will require to communicate direct with the Surveyor General and the office in London ?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON : He might possibly communicate with London, but ordinarily will communicate with the Surveyor General, and, as I have said, there is considerable convenience in that course, because we shall be thus informed of all the circumstances it is necessary for us to know. Small facilities he could grant by his own authority.

FACTORY INSPECTORS.

SIR HENRY JAMES (Bury, Lancashire) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the number of weaving sheds requiring inspection under "The Cotton Cloth Factories Act, 1889," and if he could state how many Inspectors have performed the duty of inspection under that Act ; and, in view of the fact that the provisions of "The Factories and Workshops Amendment Act, 1891," especially those contained in Section 24, as to giving particulars of work, render necessary a considerable increase in the number of Factory Inspectors, whether any such increase is contemplated for the purpose of sufficiently carrying out the provision of both of the above Acts ?

Mr. MATTHEWS: There are about 600 weaving sheds to which the Cotton Cloth Factory Act of 1889 applies. With few exceptions, the special duty of enforcing the provisions of the Act has hitherto devolved upon Mr. Osborn in Lancashire. In order to strengthen the administration of that enactment, I have nominated two additional Inspectors, who will, I hope, shortly enter upon their duties. With regard to the question of increasing the staff of Factory Inspectors generally, I can only say that the experience of the operation of the Factories and Workshops Amendment Act of 1891 has not been sufficient to enable me to decide whether any or what increase of the staff is required; but I may assure my right hon. Friend that particular attention is being directed to this important matter.

ILLITERATE VOTES.

Mr. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is in a position to state when the Return, ordered last Session, of the number of illiterates who have voted in Parliamentary Elections since the last General Election, will be issued?

Mr. MATTHEWS: My hon. Friend will find that this Return has been issued.

TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION.

Mr. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education to state how many of all the County Councils in England and Wales have voted the whole or part of the money received under "The Local Taxation Act, 1890," to purposes of technical instruction, and to give the same information with respect to county boroughs?

SIR W. HART DYKE: Out of the 62 County Councils in England and Wales, 52 are applying the whole sum received under the Local Taxation Act, 1890, to technical education, while nine are giving part only. Complete Returns are not forthcoming with regard to the action taken by the 63 county boroughs; but it is believed that in every case, except Wolverhampton, the whole, or the whole, amount is to be devoted to technical education.

INCOME TAX APPEALS.

Mr. MAC NEILL (Donegal, beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, having regard to the hardship entailed on persons residing in Bundoran and Ballyshannon compelled to go to Enniskillen or Omagh for the hearing of their cases, arrangements can be made for the Commissioner of Income Tax Appeal Commissions to sit at Enniskillen and Ballyshannon?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN Gorst, Chancery): There are no further appeals to be heard in Ireland by the Special Commissioners this year; but I am assured by the Revenue Authorities that every consideration will be given to the interest and convenience of taxpayers as regards the hearing of appeals in the early part of next year.

TELEGRAPH SUBSIDIES.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON (Croydon, S. C.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can give some particulars of the guarantees given to the Government by private persons again the cost of constructing lines of telegraphs in the United Kingdom, that is to say, the number and the amount of guarantees last year?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: There are at present in the United Kingdom 539 Telegraph Offices open to the public, and guaranteed, either by single individuals or collectively. The total amount of the guarantees is £19,903 10s. It includes a few cases in which a guarantee is given by a public body, such as the Fishery Board for Scotland.

POSTAL FACILITIES.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that in many of the Colonies and Possessions all letters are re-addressed free of charge; whether he is aware that foreign letters arriving in this country are re-directed free of charge; whether it is a fact that the whole of the postage on these foreign letters is (under the Postal regulations) appropriated by the Governments of the countries whence they come; the British Government performing the work of re-addressing and re-transmission free of charge; and whether it is the intention of the Government to allow our own letters, sent from any part of Great Britain or Ireland to another, to be re-directed free of charge?

*SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: The answer to the first three paragraphs of this Question is in the affirmative. The question of allowing inland letters to be re-directed free of charge has long been under consideration, and I am at the present moment in communication with the Treasury upon the subject.

THE NAVAL RESERVE AND THE INDIAN MARINE.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he is aware that considerable dissatisfaction exists among officers of the Naval Reserve, owing to an Order in Council, dated 20th March, 1891, which grants precedence to officers of the Indian Marine; if so, will he take steps to remove the grievance?

*MR. FORWOOD: Certain representations have been made to the Admiralty, due, apparently to a misconception of the circumstances which led to the passing of the Order in Council in reference to these officers. Owing to a recent agreement with the Indian Government, the coast defence vessels previously manned by the Indian Marine will in future be manned partly by officers and men of the Royal Indian Marine and partly by those of the Imperial Navy. It, therefore, became necessary to define the relative status of the officers of the two Services, which will henceforth be in close connection in peace as well as in war time; and in consequence officers of the Indian Marine, forming as they do a part of the permanent defence forces of the Empire, were as usual given precedence immediately after the officers of the Royal Navy. As the possibility of the officers of the Indian Marine and Royal Naval Reserve serving together is so remote, any grievance as to relative rank is not likely to arise.

CHURCHWARDENS AND OVERSEERS.

MAJOR BANES (West Ham, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General if he is aware that, by the judgment of Justices Mathew and A. L. Smith, on the 4th of February, in the cases of "The Churchwardens and Overseers of West Ham v. the Fourth City Building Society, and the Fourth City Building Society v. East Ham," the Act 59 Geo. III., c. 12, s. 19 (Stourges Bourde's Act), 1819, is impliedly repealed by subsequent legislation and the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act of 1869; that this judgment affects not only the large borough of West Ham and the parish of East Ham, but also those of Tottenham, Edmonton, Wanstead, the borough of Macclesfield, and adjoining township of Huddersfield, and other parishes throughout England, who have adopted the Act of 1819, and that a large and specially convened vestry in West Ham last year decided not to adopt the Act of 1869, but to retain the Act of 1819; and whether he will be prepared to look into the matter, with a view to amend the law so as to do away with the uncertainty, complication, and the large expenses consequent upon the many and various Acts relating to the rating of small tenements?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have as yet only had an opportunity of seeing the report of the case referred to in his question in the Times' reports, but, as far as I can judge, the effect of the decision is correctly stated in the question. It is, in my opinion, very desirable that the law of rating should be consolidated; but it is not in my power to make any statement as to whether any legislation with that object will be possible during the present Session. I will, however, see that attention is paid to the point.

DISTRICT REGISTRIES.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he will state the number and names of the district registries or places in England and Wales where writs of summons can be issued?

*SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: Under the Judicature Act Her Majesty may by Order in Council create district registries. On 1st January, 1891, there were 83 such district registries. I will not detain the House by reading the list, but they are set out on pages 346 and 347 of the index of the statutory Rules and Orders in force on 1st January, 1891, which is, I believe, in the Library; but I shall be pleased to show the hon. Member the list if he desire to see it.

THE LICENSING OF THEATRES.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in accordance with the understanding last Session, he will move for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the law relating to the licensing of theatres and music halls in the county of London?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Government are prepared to move for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the law relating to the licensing of theatres and music halls. The Motion will be made at an early date.

THE GRESHAM UNIVERSITY.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the authorities of King's College and University College have recently petitioned the Privy Council to revise the Draft Charter founding the Albert University; and, if so, when was their Petition presented; whether the Petition has been considered by the Committee of the Privy Council; and, if so, at what date; and whether any public notice of such consideration was given?

SIR W. HART DYKE: There has been no revision of the Draft Charter as settled by the Committee. The parties were told at the hearing that the Committee would be prepared to consider any alteration of the name of the new University. A Petition was presented by the two Colleges, and the assent of the Gresham Committee and of the ten Medical Colleges accompanied it, praying that the name of Gresham may be adopted. The Committee met on Tuesday the 16th instant and agreed to this proposal.

MR. PICTON: Am I to understand from the right hon. Gentleman that no alteration whatever has been made to the Draft Charter except the substitution of the word "Gresham" for "Albert"?

SIR W. HART DYKE: That is what I stated to the House.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): When will the Charter be laid on the Table?

SIR W. HART DYKE: I should think in the course of a very few days.

THE SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when it is intended to present to the House the Supplementary Estimates for the current financial year, and what Votes are to be included in those Estimates?

SIR JOHN GORST: My right hon. Friend has asked me to answer these questions, and I have to say that I hope the Supplementary Estimates will be in the hands of hon. Members early next week. There will be 15 Civil and three Revenue Estimates, amounting to £309,936, besides the grants to Scotland and Ireland equivalent to the English fee grant for education.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether referring to a question asked on 30th July, 1891, with respect to the contract for pouches and belts for telegraph messengers given to Messrs. Hebbert and Co., of James Street, Haymarket, the War Office have made inquiry into the conditions under which the contract has been fulfilled, and with what result?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Inquiry was made, and it was found that the leather for about one-third of the order had been obtained in a roughly cut-out state from Messrs. Ross. Messrs. Hebbert reported the circumstances, and urged that they had not infringed their contract; but on my disapproval being conveyed to them, they have undertaken not to make any further purchases of the same description.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS: Seeing that is the point of a question which I asked in July last, I should like to know whether, as the Factory Clause has been violated, the right hon. Gentleman intends to take any action to enforce the penalties?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I can hardly say the clause was violated. What was violated was an obligation not to buy any manufactured goods from Messrs. Ross.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS: That is not an answer to my question. The right hon. Gentleman will remember the question I put in July last. I distinctly asked whether it was not the fact that the leather, in a partly-manufactured state, was obtained from Ross and Co., who had been struck off the list of contractors. I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman intends to make the Factory Clause an actual fact?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am very anxious to enforce the Factory Clause; but in this case there was no deliberate intention to violate the clause. They acted honestly, but under a misapprehension; therefore I do not think it necessary to prosecute the matter further.

AN "ANARCHIST" PROSECUTION.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the statements made by the police in the alleged "Anarchist" case at Birmingham, in which a Liberal Unionist gentleman of the name of Cavagna was charged by the police with having explosive substances in his possession, and of being connected with an Anarchist Club in Manchester, he all the time being a Liberal Unionist; if in the Anarchist case at Walsall it is a fact that at least two agents provocateurs were employed by the police; and if the employment of these agents provocateurs is sanctioned by the Home Office?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed that a person named Cavagna was charged at Walsall, under the 4th section of the Explosives Act, with being in possession of explosive substances under such circumstances as to give rise to a reasonable suspicion that he did not possess them for a lawful object. He was, however, discharged on the application of the Treasury Solicitor. He was not charged with being connected with an Anarchist Club in Manchester. I have no information as to his political opinions. The answer to the last two paragraphs of the question is in the negative. There is no foundation for the suggestions they contain.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Is it not within the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman that two men during the course of that case testified that they were employed by the police—one saying that his salary was 2s. 6d. per day?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am not cognisant of these facts.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to answer the third paragraph of my question?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have answered it; there is no foundation whatever for the paragraph.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: What I propose to ask the right hon. Gentleman is, whether these men were paid? I will not call them agents provocateurs, if the right hon. Gentleman does not like the word.

MR. MATTHEWS: The employment of agents provocateurs is not only not sanctioned, but is forbidden by the Home Office.

IRISH NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the National School Teachers in District 21, whose schools were examined for results in the month of January last, have yet been paid the fees arising from the said examinations; and, if not, will he direct the Heads of the Education Department in Ireland to cause payment of the said fees to be made forthwith in the cases in question?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed by the Education Department that the fees arising from the January examinations have been paid. I cannot ascertain that they have not been paid in any particular instance; but if

*SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: Under the Judicature Act Her Majesty may by Order in Council create district registries. On 1st January, 1891, there were 83 such district registries. I will not detain the House by reading the list, but they are set out on pages 346 and 347 of the index of the statutory Rules and Orders in force on 1st January, 1891, which is, I believe, in the Library; but I shall be pleased to show the hon. Member the list if he desire to see it.

THE LICENSING OF THEATRES.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in accordance with the understanding last Session, he will move for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the law relating to the licensing of theatres and music halls in the county of London?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Government are prepared to move for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the law relating to the licensing of theatres and music halls. The Motion will be made at an early date.

THE GRESHAM UNIVERSITY.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the authorities of King's College and University College have recently petitioned the Privy Council to revise the Draft Charter founding the Albert University; and, if so, when was their Petition presented; whether the Petition has been considered by the Committee of the Privy Council; and, if so, at what date; and whether any public notice of such consideration was given?

SIR W. HART DYKE: There has been no revision of the Draft Charter as settled by the Committee. The parties were told at the hearing that the Committee would be prepared to consider any alteration of the name of the new University. A Petition was presented by the two Colleges, and the assent of the Gresham Committee and of the ten Medical Colleges accompanied it, praying that the name of Gresham may be adopted. The Committee met on Tuesday the 16th instant and agreed to this proposal.

MR. PICTON: Am I to understand from the right hon. Gentleman that no alteration whatever has been made to the Draft Charter except the substitution of the word "Gresham" for "Albert"?

SIR W. HART DYKE: That is what I stated to the House.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): When will the Charter be laid on the Table?

SIR W. HART DYKE: I should think in the course of a very few days.

THE SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when it is intended to present to the House the Supplementary Estimates for the current financial year, and what Votes are to be included in those Estimates?

SIR JOHN GORST: My right hon. Friend has asked me to answer these questions, and I have to say that I hope the Supplementary Estimates will be in the hands of hon. Members early next week. There will be 16 Civil and three Revenue Estimates, amounting to £309,936, besides the grants to Scotland and Ireland equivalent to the English fee grant for education.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether referring to a question asked on 30th July, 1891, with respect to the contract for pouches and belts for telegraph messengers given to Messrs. Hebbert and Co., of James Street, Haymarket, the War Office have made inquiry into the conditions under which the contract has been fulfilled, and with what result?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Inquiry was made, and it was found that the leather for about one-third of the order had been obtained in a roughly cut-out state from Messrs. Ross. Messrs. Hebbert reported the circumstances, and urged that they had not infringed their contract; but on my disapproval being conveyed to them, they have undertaken not to make any further purchases of the same description.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS: Seeing that is the point of a question which I asked in July last, I should like to know whether, as the Factory Clause has been violated, the right hon. Gentleman intends to take any action to enforce the penalties?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I can hardly say the clause was violated. What was violated was an obligation not to buy any manufactured goods from Messrs. Ross.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS: That is not an answer to my question. The right hon. Gentleman will remember the question I put in July last. I distinctly asked whether it was not the fact that the leather, in a partly-manufactured state, was obtained from Ross and Co., who had been struck off the list of contractors. I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman intends to make the Factory Clause an actual fact?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am very anxious to enforce the Factory Clause; but in this case there was no deliberate intention to violate the clause. They acted honestly, but under a misapprehension; therefore I do not think it necessary to prosecute the matter further.

AN "ANARCHIST" PROSECUTION.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the statements made by the police in the alleged "Anarchist" case at Birmingham, in which a Liberal Unionist gentleman of the name of Cavagna was charged by the police with having explosive substances in his possession, and of being connected with an Anarchist Club in Manchester, he all the time being a Liberal Unionist; if in the Anarchist case at Walsall it is a fact that at least two agents provocateurs were employed by the police; and if the employment of these agents provocateurs is sanctioned by the Home Office?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed that a person named Cavagna was charged at Walsall, under the 4th section of the Explosives Act, with being in possession of explosive substances under such circumstances as to give rise to a reasonable suspicion that he did not possess them for a lawful object. He was, however, discharged on the application of the Treasury Solicitor. He was not charged with being connected with an Anarchist Club in Manchester. I have no information as to his political opinions. The answer to the last two paragraphs of the question is in the negative. There is no foundation for the suggestions they contain.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Is it not within the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman that two men during the course of that case testified that they were employed by the police —one saying that his salary was 2s. 6d. per day?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am not cognisant of these facts.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to answer the third paragraph of my question?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have answered it; there is no foundation whatever for the paragraph.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: What I propose to ask the right hon. Gentleman is, whether these men were paid? I will not call them agents provocateurs, if the right hon. Gentleman does not like the word.

MR. MATTHEWS: The employment of agents provocateurs is not only not sanctioned, but is forbidden by the Home Office.

IRISH NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the National School Teachers in District 21, whose schools were examined for results in the month of January last, have yet been paid the fees arising from the said examinations; and, if not, will he direct the Heads of the Education Department in Ireland to cause payment of the said fees to be made forthwith in the cases in question?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed by the Education Department that the fees arising from the January examinations have been paid. I cannot ascertain that they have not been paid in any particular instance; but if the hon. Gentleman will supply information of any such case I will inquire into it.

THE COLLECTOR GENERAL OF RATES, DUBLIN.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Irish Executive will undertake not to fill up the vacancy in the office of Collector General of Rates in Dublin (caused by the death of Mr. E. J. Kennedy) until the Corporation of Dublin shall have had an opportunity of considering whether they will avail themselves of the option of collecting their own rates secured to them by the Dublin Corporation Act of 1890? What I wish to ask is, that any temporary appointment that is made should not preclude the question of the salary being raised in case the Corporation do take over their rates.

MR. JACKSON: I do not see that any temporary appointment that may be made can possibly affect the salary to be settled hereafter.

MR. SEXTON: The last appointment to this office was called temporary, but in some mysterious manner it became permanent, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman not to make any appointment, at least not during the next few days.

MR. JACKSON: I cannot enter into any engagement, but I will communicate at once with Dublin, representing the case as stated by the hon. Member.

MR. SEXTON: As this office may be worth £1,200 a year in salary, I beg to give notice that if I find the Government attempting to anticipate the action of the Corporation of Dublin in this case I shall move the Adjournment of House.

At a later stage—

MR. SEXTON: The anxiety felt in Dublin in connection with the office of Collector General of Rates is very great, and I wish to ask the Government, if they do resolve to make an appointment to the office, whether they would consider the claims of the gentleman who now holds the second position in the office. That would get rid of any difficulty which might be involved?

Mr. Jackson

MR. MADDEN: I will convey right hon. Friend the Chief Sec the suggestion of the hon. Mem

IRISH LAND PURCHASES.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nott Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what rules framed by the Treasury (inter alia) to the making of "Returns" by the Irish Land Commissioners, under Section 33 of Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act will be presented and distributed.

SIR JOHN GORST: The rules will be laid upon the Table of the House soon as they are ready.

GLEBE LANDS (SALES).

Return ordered—

Showing the Sales of Glebes (in accordance with the Parliamentary Paper, Session 1891.)

MOTIONS.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING

THE FIRST LORD OF THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Marquess of) : Mr. Speaker, whether the Bill which it is now my duty to introduce is the most important legislative proposals which the Government have to make during the course of the present Session I will not say, but undoubtedly it is a measure of great complexity in itself, and has aroused the largest amount of controversy in the country during the Recess. It will be in the recollection of the House that, towards the end of last Session, in answer to a question put to me by the learned Gentleman the Member for Longford (Mr. T. M. Healy), I explained on behalf of the Government the intention to bring in a Local Government Bill for Ireland. And a great surprise I found next day when this was regarded as a new departure in the Unionist policy, and the supposed support I had taken the country in thus announcing the policy of the Government. Sir, the Government in this matter to have forgotten that ever since the formation of the present Parliament, in 1886, and even before that time, the extension of Local Government to every part of the United Kingdom has been a cardinal part of their policy ; and so far from there being any novelty in the intentions of the Government in the views expressed by Parliament last Session, it was a mere repetition of what was said over and over again by gentlemen who have every claim to speak on behalf of the Government. The declarations of my noble Friend the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) in this matter are probably within the recollection of all. I think that Local Government has figured certainly in more than one Queen's Speech since the year 1886. And in the year 1889 I myself, at that time Chief Secretary for Ireland, expressed on behalf of the Government our intention to bring in a Local Government Bill as soon as we had been able to deal with the question of Land Purchase. I attach no special value to my own utterances on the point. I only wish once for all to dispel the kind of delusion which seems to have seized some minds in relation to this matter. I stated on that occasion that I was in favour of extending Local Government to Ireland, and that I hoped to bring in a Bill for that purpose, and, if necessary, in bringing it in, to follow with regard to Ireland the same prudential maxims that had been applied in dealing with the other countries with a view to meeting their respective needs and necessities. That was a declaration of policy which I made three years ago, and I see no reason to qualify or alter in any way the statements I then made. Now, Sir, some gentlemen appear to think that the course of the Government is not justified, and that no adequate grounds have ever been stated why we should meddle with Local Government in Ireland at all. These are gentlemen with whom, in many respects, I have great sympathy. Most of them belong to the Party of which I am a member. But I never noticed that these gentlemen on the occasion of these various statements which have been made in the Speeches from the Throne, or on other occasions, even thought it was worth while to inform the Government that they dissented from their policy ; and, in point of fact, I was not aware of the necessity of that policy ever being questioned until the matter came to the front in the discussions that arose in the course of the autumn. Whether the policy of the Government is justified or not will no doubt depend upon the view taken of the measure which I have now to introduce. But I think it will be admitted by every impartial person that the burden of proof, at all events, lies with the objectors. We have introduced a Local Government Bill for England ; we have introduced a Local Government Bill for Scotland ; and, if we are not to introduce one for Ireland, it must be because of certain great, specific, and obvious dangers that must attend such a course. Vague generalisations, vague distrust, will hardly, I think, be thought sufficient by this House if we are to abandon a policy which men of all parties, so far as I know, have, broadly speaking, agreed to. No ; if we are to abandon our announced policy it must be for cause shown, and shown with definiteness and precision. I will now proceed without further preface to explain the provisions of the Bill, which I trust the House will, in the course of the present Session, pass into law. But in order that they may be understood, I ought, in a very few words—and they shall be very few—to explain to Members who are not intimately acquainted with the existing form of Local Government in Ireland what the system is, because I think all will agree that, in so far as it is possible, we should graft our new and reformed and altered system upon the system which has been in operation with considerable administrative success for now more than a generation. (Opposition cheers.) I gather from the ironical cheer that some hon. Gentlemen doubt the administrative success of the existing system in Ireland. I cannot agree with that. That the Grand Juries may have been guilty of errors of judgment I do not, of course, deny ; but I think they have, on the whole, administered the affairs entrusted to them with economy and with parity. (Cries of "No, no !") I think it cannot be fairly denied. But without going into the merits or demerits of the Grand Jury and the other Local Bodies in Ireland, let me, in one word, tell the House what the present system is. We constantly hear it described as the Grand Jury system, from which anybody not acquainted with the actual machinery and work would suppose that it was the Grand Jury that discussed and initiated all the work that was done in reference to county matters in Ireland. Members from Ireland know that is not the case. The initiative in no single matter connected with county administration lies with the Grand Jury; it lies with the Baronial Sessions or the County Sessions. These two bodies, one representing the barony and the other representing the county, make their financial proposals to the Grand Jury. The Grand Jury have the power of rejecting or accepting them; they have not the power of in any way modifying them. The House will see, then, that at present the counties in Ireland are governed by a Baronial Presentment Sessions and a County Presentment Sessions and the Grand Jury representative of the county. There is no such thing in Ireland as the parish for administrative purposes. For ecclesiastical purposes it exists there as it does elsewhere. But the smallest unit in existence for the purpose of county administration is the barony. The baronies, like almost all other units of government of long standing, vary very greatly in size. I think there are about 150 in the whole of Ireland. They vary from a very small population to a very large one—from the size of a few parishes to the size of a moderate county. Now, the Baronial Sessions, as at present constituted, consists of the Magistrates of the county and of certain cesspayers in the barony who are elected by a method extremely complicated—(An Irish MEMBER: "Selected.") I leave the hon. Gentleman to define the difference between election and selection. They are elected or selected, whichever the hon. Gentleman prefers, by a method which I need not describe to the House. It is extremely cumbrous, and, if I may venture to say so, extremely absurd. The Grand Jury are selected practically by the Sheriff of the county, and, broadly speaking, may be said to consist of 23 landholders—considerable landholders within the county. It is to these gentlemen that the administration of county affairs is entrusted. As the House knows, in dealing with England we had to deal with a country in which no area at all corresponding with a barony is to be found; and, therefore, it was that my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board had to introduce into English measure a very long and elaborate set of provisions setting up District Councils, and so difficult an elaborate was the operation found to be, that we have not yet succeeded in obtaining Parliamentary time for carrying out the subordinate part of the general Local Government scheme for England. In Ireland we start in a better position. The baronial unit there. We propose to retain it, and therefore, our Bill would not merely be a County Council Bill, but it would be what, in England, would be described as a District Councils Bill also; and it will combine, in one measure, provisions necessary for establishing County Councils, and for establishing those subordinate Baronial Councils which will correspond more or less accurately with the District Councils which we hope to set up at no distant date in England. We follow English precedent, in transferring the County and Baronial Councils which we propose to set up, none of them having administrative duties, and leaving untouched the judicial and quasi-judicial duties now entrusted to the Grand Jury. In this we are not merely pursuing what I think is a sound policy, but I am suing the course which the House already thought fit to adopt both in case of England and in the case of Scotland. I may parenthetically mention that among these duties which are left to the Grand Jury are all questions connected with compensation for malicious injuries, or compensation for murder and maiming under the Clauses 105 and 139 of the Grand Jury Act. The members of the County Council and of the Baronial Council will be elected for three years. They will all go out of office together.

and we propose to follow the Scottish precedent rather than the English precedent in the matter of Aldermen, and not to import into the Irish system the provision which finds a place in the English Act. The Baronial Council has laid upon it, broadly speaking, the duties now performed by the Baronial Presentment Sessions. The County Council will have thrown upon it, broadly speaking, the combined duties of the County Presentment Sessions and of the Grand Jury in relation to administrative affairs. Their chief duties, financially, will no doubt be in connection with the repair, maintenance and construction of roads and highways. But this important difference in the existing system will be introduced : that whereas in Ireland the distinction between main roads and other roads—baronial roads as they are called—is not recognised, we propose in this Bill to recognise it. At present certain roads, called post roads, are maintained at the cost half of the county at large, and half of the barony to which they belong. Other roads are maintained wholly at the cost of the barony. The post road is defined not at all as a main road; but a road along which a mail cart happens to run—a definition which evidently dates from before railroad times, and has no relation to the importance of the roads to be dealt with; or with the propriety of throwing half the cost of its maintenance on the county, or the whole cost on the barony. The County Council will have to decide which are main roads, and which are baronial roads; and as at present the baronial roads will be supported by the barony, the main roads will be supported half by the barony and half out of the rate levied on the country at large. We propose in addition to administrative duties now fulfilled by the Baronial Presentment Sessions, the County, and Grand Jury, to hand over to the County Councils, if they should elect to accept the responsibility, the duties now performed by the Rural Sanitary Authorities. We do not propose to make it obligatory on the County Councils to take over these duties. They may feel that, at all events during the first years of their existence, they have not the administrative experience which would justify them in taking over those duties; but if they desired to take them over, we propose that they should take them over. The county, it will be observed, is in some respects far too large an area for the actual administration of sanitary affairs, and in my earlier draft of the Bill I proposed to give these sanitary duties not to the County Council, but to the Baronial Council. But further reflection convinced us that the barony was not a convenient area in all probability for sanitary work ; that it differed so profoundly from the existing sanitary areas that the adjustment of existing burdens between the two would be almost impossible ; that the Baronial Council would contain members representing the existing Sanitary Authorities, but ought not, of course, to be allowed to vote upon sanitary matters outside the area of the Urban Sanitary Authority within the barony. And for these, and other reasons, we came to the conclusion that the County Council was the proper body to be responsible for the general administration of sanitary matters, but that it should delegate its authority to Local Committees in convenient areas — those Committees being formed out of County Councillors and Baronial Councillors, who, in the opinion of the County Council, most accurately represented the interests of the ratepayers in the sanitary area which they thus delimit. I will, therefore, only add now, with regard to the duties of the County Council and the Baronial Council, that, in addition to the administrative work now performed by the Grand Juries and the various Presentment Sessions, and the duties now performed by the Rural Sanitary Authorities, these County Councils will be required to appoint members of the Board of Governors on the District Lunatic Asylums, in addition to those appointed by the Lord Lieutenant, subject to this provision—that the number of members appointed by the Lord Lieutenant shall in no case exceed the number now appointed by the County Councils. It is, therefore, possible, under this Bill, that the number of representatives appointed by the Lord Lieutenant shall equal, though it is not possible that they shall ever exceed, the number of those appointed by the County Councils. At present, as the House knows, the whole number is appointed by the Lord Lieutenant. The justification for giving the Lord Lieutenant this power to nominate a certain number of Governors to the asylum is that at the present moment the Imperial Exchequer pays one-half the cost of all inmates in these asylums. I have no doubt the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be delighted to hand over the whole affair to the County Councils, if they would also take over the cost.

MR. T. M. HEALY: That is out of our own money.

MR. BALFOUR: Nine per cent. is Irish money, and 91 per cent. English and Scottish. They would also have to appoint five members on the Governing Body of the county hospitals. They also have to appoint the Coroner for the county, and on the representation of the Baronial Council the City Councils have power to acquire woods and plantations. I ought to say a word upon that provision, which is without analogy in the English or Scottish Acts. Those who have in their minds our Debates last year on the Land Purchase Act will recollect it was pointed out with great force that one result of selling estates to the tenant occupiers is that the woods on these estates are very necessary often not only for the amenity, but also for the climate and shelter of the country in which they exist. These woods are almost invariably destroyed. I expressed myself at the time, and I was quite conscious of the magnitude of the evil; but it appeared to me quite impossible to remedy it till we had a body who could be trusted, and who had the funds to purchase and power to manage the woods. No such body existed, and I had, therefore, to defer to the present occasion introducing a provision which I hope, if it meet the approval of the House, will prove extremely useful as the operation of the Land Purchase Act gradually extends through the country. The next point on which the House will desire information has reference to the boroughs' relations to the counties in which they are situated. There are in Ireland 11 municipal boroughs and two counties of towns—13 in all; and we propose to make these 13 boroughs of counties and towns separate counties for administrative purposes, and for administrative purposes alone. In other words, we propose to hand over to them all the powers which in the county proper we hand over to the County Council. The other urban districts we do not propose to touch. They will be merged in, and be part of, for all county purposes the counties in which they are situated, while they will retain unimpaired all the powers given to them by law. I think that is, though brief, yet an adequate account, broadly speaking, of the duties and construction of the bodies we propose to create.

MR. SEXTON: Which body—the County Council, or the Grand Jury—will have charge of the presentments?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Practically we leave the presentments untouched, as they fall altogether outside the area of county administration. That seems the natural and proper course. So far, I do not think that there will be any broad divergence of opinion upon the main principles of the system of county government I have dealt with. I now come to a more difficult and more controversial matter. I, of course, have never disguised from myself that there are large classes in Ireland and in England who look with great alarm and dread upon any measure of the kind I have suggested. I think it is only due to persons who, whether they be right or wrong, certainly have only the general interest of the community, of which they form members, at heart, if we examine in a perfectly fair and candid spirit the fears they entertain. They are afraid of three things, broadly speaking. They are afraid that the new system will result in financial extravagance and possibly corruption. They are afraid that the majority, in counties, where the majority is also very small and is often divided from the minority by a chasm for which there is no parallel, I am happy to think, with English or Scottish experience—they think that that minority may possibly be oppressed and plundered by the new bodies to be created; and they also think that such bodies may travel beyond the duties for which they were called into existence, and may use powers given to them by this House for the purpose of managing their local affairs in order to carry out other objects which, however excellent in themselves, cannot be described as local. Now, I should like to say a word upon each of these points. I am not at all disposed to deny that there is weight and force in the arguments of those who think that the administration of the new County Councils may possibly, in certain cases, be open to the charge of financial extravagance and reckless expenditure. Consider what the great mass of the constituents of those Councils will be. There are a multitude of extremely small occupiers of land whose total contribution to the County Council very often does not exceed 1s. or 8d. or even 4d. If you look down, as I have done, the roll of cesspayers in some of the Welsh counties, you will see multitudes who pay sums as small, and even smaller, than those I have mentioned. It is also true, and must not be forgotten, that unhappily the economic history of Ireland has compelled successive Governments, at different times, to start in certain districts public works which would not otherwise have been started, for the purpose of providing employment and relief. The idea of relief works, therefore, is unhappily too familiar to the mind of a numerically very large proportion of the population in some of these Western Districts. The man who pays 8d. or 4d. a year to the county cess, but who on a new road started in his district might expect to earn 8s. or 10s. a week for certain work in the winter months, evidently, though he be a contributor to the County rates, has inadequate motive for economy in their administration. They have only to give notice to the council on any terms whatever to start roads or new works of any sort within reach of their homes, and they will or may gain infinitely more by the starting of such works than they could ever hope to gain by the most economical administration. I think the House will feel that, under these circumstances, it is not only desirable, but absolutely necessary, to take some precaution that capital expenditure shall not be recklessly indulged in. A great many suggestions have been made to carry out that object, and every kind of elaborate plan has been brought under my notice. It has been suggested that the County Council should be divided into an upper and lower house—the upper house representing the larger ratepayers, the lower house representing the smaller. It has been suggested that all the smaller ratepayers of the county cess should be excluded from the franchise. It has been suggested that there should be a larger number of ex-officio members placed upon the County Council, by which the proceedings of that body would be more or less controlled. I reject all these expedients. I think they belong to the character of artificial safeguards, which cannot in the nature of things stand. I also believe that they will be wholly inoperative to carry out the effects for which they were designed. After all, we cannot have a better object lesson in this matter than the case of the Boards of Guardians in Ireland. The Boards of Guardians in Ireland are composed of one half Magistrates and one half of members elected on a plan by which great preponderance is given to the votes of the larger ratepayers. I do not think that anyone acquainted with Irish administration will say that this scheme has succeeded with Boards of Guardians; I cannot conceive it to be any better in the case of County Councils. Therefore I reject unhesitatingly all these plans which have no precedent in England or Scotland, and would be irritating without being effectual, and certainly would not stand against hostile criticism. One exception only, perhaps, I can make, and that is, that in the first County Council elected under this Bill there shall be four ex officio members—the Lieutenant and Sheriff of the County, a nominee of the Grand Jury, a nominee of the County Presentment Sessions, and on the first Baronial Council a nominee of the Baronial Presentment Session. This is, with a slight exception, in strict accordance with the Scotch Bill. This, I believe, will be a convenience to the newly-elected Council, as they will be well acquainted with the business. I do not anticipate from any quarter of the House that the proposal will receive serious criticism.

I have told the House the schemes which we will not accept with regard to the constitution of the County Council, and the franchise by which it is to be elected, and the mode by which its proceedings are to be controlled. Let me now explain what are the plans which the Government accepted in these matters. We propose that the franchise for the County Council shall be identical with the franchise for the Baronial Council, and that both shall be identical with the Parliamentary franchise, with this exception, that it will include women and peers. It will exclude persons otherwise qualified to vote at Parliamentary elections who have not paid their county cess, and it will exclude illiterates. That franchise will, of course, be extended to all the municipal towns which we turn into counties for administrative purposes, with the exception that, as a precedent is set in the cases of Dublin and Belfast, and as the conditions governing urban society differ profoundly from those prevailing in rural societies, we do not propose to depart from the practice which we have already set up in the cases of the two towns I have just mentioned.

MR. SEXTON : What practice ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : We do not propose in regard to municipalities to deal with either illiterates, peers, or women.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Do you mean that the new franchise will be the Belfast franchise ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Practically, it will be.

MR. T. M. HEALY : That is not the Parliamentary franchise.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : It is not Parliamentary, but it is substantially the Parliamentary franchise.

MR. T. M. HEALY : Belfast has only 8,000 electors.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : That is a question I will not argue now. It is our desire to assimilate all the boroughs in Ireland to the franchise in England and Scotland, although, no doubt, some minute differences may have to be set up. So much for the franchise to elect the County Council. It will be noticed that by setting up that franchise we sweep away altogether the whole class of precautions that have been suggested for the protection of minorities and the wealthy ratepayers. Now comes the question, How are we to deal with these difficulties ? We think that in Ireland we ought to depart from the precedents set in England and Scotland, and that we ought to have some kind of minority vote. I do not think this House will require to be told that the conditions of Ireland are such that, if you set up single-member constituencies, as you have done in England and Scotland, the minority, whether it be a Protestant minority in the South, or a Catholic minority in the North, will probably have no chance of any representation whatever. Here and there it might be that men of particular political complexion or religious creeds might be gathered together in small communities sufficiently powerful to return one or two members to the County Council. But looking to Ireland as a whole—and I have investigated this question with such care as is in my power—I have not the slightest doubt that if you attempt to elect your Councillors upon the system of single-member constituencies you will commit a most grievous injustice to the minority, and absolutely exclude them from any share or chance of even raising their voices in the Council, which is the body to manage their local affairs. The plan of the Government is to make each barony for baronial purposes a single electoral division. If there are to be ten members for a given barony it will form a single electoral unit, and the members will be elected by minority representation. The county, for county purposes, will be divided into electoral divisions; these divisions will probably not all be of the same size. It would be impossible to frame them so, but we shall form them to be as nearly the same size, and to return somewhere about 15 in each electoral division. We have two sets of elections to deal with—for Baronial Councils and for County Councils. So far as Baronial Councils are concerned, we consider the barony not to be too large an area to be a convenient electoral unit for baronial purposes, and all members of it will be elected in one electoral district. The county, we think, on the other hand is too large an area for one electoral division, and we propose, therefore, to divide it into electoral divisions, each electoral division returning a number which I will call 15, although, of course, in many cases it must be less, and in some, perhaps, more. The mode of minority election we have put in the Bill is not, in my opinion, the best, but it is the one most familiar to English legislation and practice—that already in force in School Board elections. I do not think it the best; but I do think it is very easily worked and understood, and there are very great advantages in doing a stupid thing which has been done before, instead of doing a wise thing that has never been done before. I will observe to the House on this subject that the objections which, no doubt, have been felt to the working of the School Board system in England will not, I think, apply to the same extent in Ireland, because, as I am informed—I have no personal experience, but those who have personal experience tell me—that the great difficulty in School Board elections is to get exactly the full value for the votes, which are tolerably equally divided between the two parties. The denominational party may have a right to ten representatives, and the undenominational to six, and the difficulty is so to manage their voting powers as to get exactly their full amount on the Board. That is not the kind of difficulty which will occur in Ireland. What we want to do is to give a minority, even a small one, adequate representation on the County Council; and I think certain rough justice will, on the whole, be done by the scheme which we ask the House to accept. That is the way in which we propose, not to protect minorities, but to give them a voice in the proceedings of the County Council. I am perfectly well aware that if you are a minority, and especially a very small one, it may be impossible merely by argument to deal with those who are acting oppressively. Therefore, I do not now pretend, and I never have pretended, that this giving the minorities a chance of representation is to be regarded as adequate protection of their rights and interests. In order to do that, other provisions have been made, and the first of these provisions is the right of traverse. I will remind the House, or that part of the House not acquainted with the right of traverse, that there is at this moment, by Grand Jury Law, a right of any ratepayer to traverse a presentment before a Judge and jury, and that right I shall propose to preserve. Slight modifications will have to be introduced into it, but it is sufficient to say that the right of traverse is maintained in this Bill. The other safeguard against financial corruption or oppression is one entirely peculiar to this Bill, and has no precedent in existing Irish, or English, or Scotch legislation. We think that it is not absolutely impossible, though we hope and believe the possibility is a remote one, that County Councils might, under certain circumstances, use the powers given by the Bill for the oppression of small minorities. We think it possible, remotely possible—not, I trust, probable—that they may be guilty of wilful and persistent corruption, and we think that it is impossible to look at the history of Ireland in the past without thinking that these dangers, remote though they be, have a reality in Ireland which they have not, never have had, and I venture to say never can have, in either England or Scotland. Hon. Gentlemen may differ from me as to the facts; but if the facts be as I say, and I do not think any impartial investigation into Irish history can deny it—I am not disposed to blame the Irish people for it—it will be admitted that that condition of things has arisen out of historical causes, amongst which we, the people of the United Kingdom, must take our full share of blame. Well, I admit that we have not to look to the history of the past, but at the facts of the present; and if the facts of the present are as I have said, it is clearly necessary to provide machinery in Ireland which we have not found necessary in England or Scotland. The question now arises, What that machinery will be? The House is aware that under the existing law governing Poor Law administration it is in the power of the Local Government Board, in cases of malversation, to dissolve a Board of Guardians, and substitute paid guardians for them. I do not think the Local Government Board is either strong enough or, in other respects, well enough informed, to deal with such bodies as the County Councils and Baronial Councils ; and instead of attempting to throw either on the Lord Lieutenant or the Privy Council, or the Local Government Board, the power of dissolving a County Council, we have adopted a plan not open, I think, to the objections which might be urged against all the schemes I have just adverted to. Under the Bill, on application being made by 20 cesspayers of the county to a Judge of Assize for leave to petition for the removal of the Council of the county or barony, on the ground that the Council has been guilty of persistent disobedience to the law, or of corruption, or of malversation, or of oppression, the Judge, if a prima facie case be shown, shall give leave ; and when the Petition is presented, the Judges on the rota of Election Petitions are to try it like an Election Petition ; and if they find the Council guilty, the Councillors then in office are to be removed, and their places filled up by persons only approved by the Lord Lieutenant. (Laughter.) If I may gather from the uproarious laughter of the right hon. Member for Derby, this is a suggestion which affords him peculiar and unmixed enjoyment. I gather also from signs in the House that it does not meet with universal approval upon the other side of the House, and I refrain at the present moment from arguing our view of the case, which I shall have no difficulty in defending when the proper time comes. These powers given to the Election Petition Judges are certainly not greater than the power they have already, which is practically that of disfranchising a constituency ; and these powers are never to be exercised, except in the cases I have specified—of persistent disobedience, corruption, or oppression. Now, of course, it may be open to hon. Gentlemen to say no Irish County Council could ever be guilty of either malversation or oppression, and if they never are guilty, of course the provision in the Bill will remain a dead letter. Supposing the impossible case of malversation is proved, do hon. Gentlemen opposite desire that it should go on unpunished ? Do they desire that the powers given to the County Council for certain purposes should be deliberately used by them for the purpose of oppressing the minority ?

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. M. KENNY : What about England ? Are we not as good as you ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : If there be in the mind of any Member of this House the idea that oppression is possible, it is the bounden duty of this House to provide that it should be remedied ; and for my own part, without venturing to foresee what the judgment of the House may be, I say that if you will examine the history of Irish controversy in the last ten years, leaving out its previous record, you will find ample material to show that dangers exist in that country which do not exist in England and Scotland, and the House would be guilty of the gravest dereliction of duty unless it provided ample protection against these evils. There is one other, and, I think, a much more important safeguard. I am disposed to think, especially if a plan like that I have suggested be adopted, no County Council will venture to abuse its powers. That I believe, but I do not believe with the same confidence that it may not indulge in reckless expenditure of the kind I have indicated, in the shape of unnecessary roads and unnecessary works, and I think something should be done to deal with that peculiar peril. Here I follow out the analogy, as nearly as may be, of the Scotch Act. The Scotch Act provides that as the owners of land have an interest in the ultimate incidence of the votes, as great or even greater than the occupier, they should have some share in declaring what capital expenditure, as distinguished from current expenditure, should or should not be permitted. If hon. Gentlemen will make themselves acquainted with the mode of procedure of the Fair Rent Commissioners ; if they will look at the schedule which is given to the sub-Commissioners for the purpose of enabling them to fix fair rents, they can see that the amount of county cess is, as it ought to be, an element taken into account in determining fair rent. Fair rents are to be fixed every 15 years, and every 15 years the tenants can throw on the owner of the land the whole of the county cess payable at that date. Therefore, although he is not directly a cesspayer, he is deeply interested in the economical management of county affairs, as far as capital expenditure and loans are concerned. The Scotch Act provides that there shall be seven nominees of what in Scotland are called heritors, seven nominees of Commissioners of Supply, seven of the County Council, and the Sheriff of the County, and that this body shall have control over the capital expenditure and charges of a permanent character. Unfortunately, we have no official in Ireland corresponding to the Scotch Sheriff; I wish we had. But I have not been able to find, or, so far, to create a corresponding personage, and I have put upon this Joint Committee the Sheriff of the County. I am not wholly satisfied with the substitution, but I may be able to devise some expedient more satisfactory to my own mind. The principal question is the construction of the Joint Committee, the consent of which we propose should be obtained to capital expenditure on roads, new offices, in addition to those sanctioned by the Local Government Board, and for all purposes of a similar kind. It is framed, apart from the Sheriff, exactly on the model of the Scotch Act—seven nominees of the Grand Jury, and seven of the County Council. It may not be good enough for Ireland, but it has been found quite good enough for Scotland. It will be only necessary for me to add, in order to explain the provisions of the Bill, that the present secretaries of Grand Juries follow the English and Scotch analogy, being at the service of the Joint Committee, and will also have to act officially to both the County Council and the Joint Committee; will be appointed by the County Council, and will not be dismissible except with the consent of the Joint Committee, and that the rights of existing officers are provided for; and that, of course, the County Council is given, in the appointment of future officers, absolute power both in regard to appointments, applications, and dismissals. There is only one more danger which I have heard adverted to by critics of a Local Government Bill for Ireland. They tell us—these critics that I allude to—tell us that the County Council can be, and will be, made the centre of some political agitation; that it can be, and will be, used as an instrument not for looking after rates or for dealing with sanitary questions, but to further the particular views of a particular Party in Ireland. Well, Sir, I confess I have exercised my imagination as far as I could to discover how this danger would arise, and I am utterly unable to see it. I do not doubt that the County Councils like other Boards in Ireland, and like Boards in England too, may occasionally pass, and very likely will pass, extremely foolish resolutions; that they will forward these resolutions to the Government of the day; that they will be quoted in this House; and that, whatever weight can be attached to them, and whatever assistance can be drawn from them, will be freely availed of by hon. Gentlemen holding the same opinions as the majority party who are members of the County Council. But I cannot, for the life of me, understand how that can affect, for good or evil, the prospects of any particular measure to be discussed in this House. It may be—I hope it will not be, but it may be—that these County Councils will be elected on political lines. If so, undoubtedly the majority of these County Councils will be of the same complexion as the Parliamentary Representatives of that particular county; but how the voice of the County Councils will add anything to the weight of the elected Member of Parliament I am utterly unable to understand. The elected Member of Parliament is elected to express the political views of his constituents. He does so with an authority which no one can gainsay in this House. But the County Council is elected for entirely different purposes, and this House would look not to it, but to the Members of Parliament, for an expression of the political views of the county itself. I cannot help thinking that those gentlemen who fear that in passing this Bill for Local Government in Ireland we are not passing a measure for Local Government in Ireland, but that we are passing a measure which is to be used as a stepping-stone to something which has nothing to do, which will have nothing to do, with Local Government, are disquieting themselves in vain. I do not believe, whatever dangers or difficulties may attach to the establishment of a system of Local Government in Ireland, that that particular danger is one of them, and I would venture to ask those gentlemen who criticise the Bill from that point of view to argue out in their own minds what is the exact nature of the danger which they fear. If they do, I am convinced they will come to the conclusion that the danger has no existence outside their own imagination. I have explained to the House, I hope with lucidity and at greater length than I had hoped to have done, all the complex principles of this measure.

An hon. MEMBER (on the Irish Benches): What about the police?

Another hon. MEMBER: What about the rates?

MR. MAURICE HEALY: What about the Sanitary Authorities?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Police I do not touch. The incidence of rates remains as it is; the Sanitary Authorities are not touched; the Sanitary Committees appointed in the urban sanitary districts are not touched at all. I have nothing, I think, to add to the outline I have given to the House. I hope the House will wait until they see that outline filled in in detail; and hon. Members will wait until they have the Bill in their hands. It is for the most part drawn up on the line of the English and Scotch Bill, and the far greater part they will find in one or other of these Bills, not only the model for the proposals which we have adopted, but also the very words in which they are quoted in the parent measures. I do not know, Sir, that I need say anything upon the general question of Local Government in Ireland. I have been accused of showing a vast indifference to my own proposals, and I have been accused of cynicism in my remarks in regard to them, though I do not know what that accusation means. I have always said upon this subject exactly what I think. I have not pretended, nor do I pretend now, to say that either this Bill, or any other Bill dealing with County Councils, is likely to regenerate Ireland.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

I do not believe that, under the bodies, county affairs will in Ireland be administered more economically or more independently; but I most sincerely think that the exercise of these duties of County Councils are a right which the Irish taxpayer has a claim to, after what has been done in England and Scotland. I also believe that at the first, in the long run, the effect of a Bill of this kind will be to bring the various classes in Ireland more together and associate them more for a common object. While I have provided in the Bill for a condition of Irish society which has little or no parallel outside Ireland, I refuse to believe that that condition is likely to be established, and, as time operates upon wounds that have been seared on the face of Ireland, I hope—I believe—that we may find the representatives of rich and poor, the landlords and occupiers, the large cesspayer and small cesspayer, the Protestant and Catholic, meeting together as in England and Scotland, and, irrespective of their political differences, working in common, for their own good administration of their own districts. If that be the result of this Bill, it will be a valuable result. I do not pretend to class this measure in importance with other Irish measures of which I have had the conduct of which this House has passed into my hands. I do not think it is nearly so important as the administration of justice, for example, as the Criminal Law Procedure Act, nor that it is so important for the amelioration of the condition of the country as the Railway Bill; I do not think that it is of the same importance as measures dealing with congested districts. I do not think that it will substitute for a state of society a good state of society, which I trust, in the long run, the Land Purchase Bill will substitute, although I do not think it in importance with any of the measures—for I do not anticipate it any, so far as Ireland is concerned. Of the advantages which she has derived from any of the four Bills which I have referred—yet the holding of it from Ireland, after getting it to England and Scotland, v have the effect of giving the people of Ireland ground for the declaration that they are not treated with equal justice; and for that reason I think the effect of it will be, not to widen, but to help to heal, the prejudices which unfortunately exist in Ireland, and for these reasons I urge it earnestly upon the attention of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That leave be given to bring in a Bill for amending the Law relating to Local Government in Ireland, and for other purposes connected therewith."

(5.40.) MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Gentleman had no reason whatever to apologise to the House for the manner in which he has introduced the Bill. The Bill could not have been presented to the House with greater clearness, with more lucidity, or with more admirable frankness. It is the first time that any Minister, in any country, has prefaced the introduction of a Bill for extending Local Government with an avowed preference for a Coercion Act. Now, I confess that I am disappointed in the Bill. Our position—the position of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian and the rest of us—has practically been from the very first to welcome any measure pointing in a liberal conciliatory direction towards the people of Ireland without compromising or abandoning our own firm opinion, which is, that reform of county and administrative bodies is hopelessly insufficient to meet either the constitutional demands or the social requirements of Ireland. And our opinion further is, that, unless your plan of reformation is constructed on an almost unattainable scale, it will not lessen, but that it will increase the difficulties of better government in Ireland. Though we hold these opinions, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, in a very early stage in the existence of the present Parliament, expressly admitted that the Government might be expected to bring in a Bill of this kind. I now, to-night, admit that the Government have a full right to ask us, at this stage, at any rate, to examine their proposals as they stand, and on their merits, with a view for the special objects and ends which they have set out for themselves in framing that measure, and independently of the value of this measure as an alternative policy to Home Rule. We admit the truth of that. The Government have a right, in the first instance, to invite us to discuss that measure from their own starting-point—namely, that it is not desirable, in their judgment, to trust the people of Ireland with a central elective authority; but that it is desirable, and that it is safe to entrust local representative bodies—this I take to be the first principle—to entrust local representative bodies with the same powers as has been conferred upon local representative bodies in England. (Hear, hear!) The right hon. Gentleman assents I see to that. Has he carried that principle out? I will examine it in a moment. I may observe that the right hon. Gentleman's remonstrances as to surprise being felt that the Government should bring in a Bill of this kind does not concern us, because they were remonstrances addressed to his own followers, and to his followers upon this side of the House. I think his remonstrances were unreasonable. It is an unreasonable thing for a Government, whose Chief has just denounced a people, as representing, by their majority, the most backward and least civilised portion of the community—it is rather an extraordinary thing that the same Government should bring forward a measure for performing the operation proposed in this Bill. It is an extraordinary thing too that Local Government should be taken as the legitimate crowning of an edifice, whose foundations are laid in coercion, and in exceptionally repressive legislation. The two orders of architecture are indeed widely different, the order of the foundation and the order of the column itself are widely different, and I do not see how they can be reconciled, the one with the other. This is not the time for those perplexing debates, and I have no desire to pursue them in the presence of a policy which could only be sound on the condition that all the things that have been stated from those Benches opposite for the last six years about the condition of Ireland are unsound and untrue. The question that we have to ask ourselves in examining the proposals of the Government are of an entirely different kind. We have to ask ourselves, taking their own starting-point, whether the Bill is a Bill constructed on the lines of English and Scotch Local Government; we have to ask ourselves whether it fulfils the only object for which local representative bodies were created in England and Scotland, and the only object for which they can be desired in Ireland; we have to ask ourselves whether it does fulfil, or is likely to fulfil, the objects of local self-government, or whether it does confer local self-government substantially in any sense that makes it worth anything; or whether it is not likely to produce administrative confusion, and increase local disorganization in Ireland? I admit the reasonableness of the right hon. Gentleman's claim, that we should not pass judgment until we have seen the Bill in print. I accept that, and I do not propose to enter into any details except one or two remarks of the right hon. Gentleman in regard to the measure that has been laid before the House. We have been able, thanks to the very lucid way in which the right hon. Gentleman laid down the lines of his proposal, to disentangle the main principle upon which the Bill has been constructed; and that is all, at this stage, that is necessary for the House to do, or that it usually does. We, on this occasion, have no intention of resisting formally the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman for bringing in this Bill. But let there be no mistake; this Bill is a less liberal Bill, it is a more reactionary Bill, than the Bill brought before the House in the year 1879 by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet. I have recollection of the provisions of it, and I believe gentlemen from Ireland, who remember it better, perhaps, than I do, will bear me out in saying that this Bill is a less liberal Bill than that of 1879. I will not go over the various provisions which the right hon. Gentleman laid before the House, except in the case of two matters upon which he relies, which I think are worthy of the consideration of the House, and which I believe are the substance of the Bill. He relies, first, on the cumulative vote, which I think the most broken reed any minority trembling for its privileges could be made to rely upon. It is undoubtedly the opinion of those who favour minority representation that it is the most cumbrous and the least satisfactory, and that it will be found to be no protection at all. But the second point, as to the safeguards, is the real pith of the Bill. It is incredible that a Minister—considering every principle laid down by the spokesman of the Government at the beginning of this Parliament, that Local Government should be extended to Ireland equally with England and Scotland—should bring forward a proposal now, that the Judge of Assize, sitting, I presume, like an Election Judge, without a jury, should try these charges of malversation, or of corruption, or of oppression, and that if these charges are made, then the Judge should proceed to try the County Council.

An hon. MEMBER : Two Judges.

MR. MORLEY : One Judge or two, it makes no difference; we are to try the County Council in the dock, and are to declare if, in the opinion of a Judge, they are guilty or not guilty. He does not deny that the Judges are to decide upon the question of guilt; to decide upon the charge of malversation; on the question of corruption, on the question of oppression. But I would point out that, under the Act which throws upon Judges the duty of trying election cases, the corruption is expressly and carefully defined. But now, what is oppression? What is to be in the mind of the Judge when the County Council is put into the dock on a charge of oppression? Is it defined in the Bill? It is, I suppose, not defined in the Bill. Is the definition of oppression in the Bill, or does the definition of it only lie in the bosom of the Judge?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Why not?

MR. MORLEY : The right hon. Gentleman asks why not. Why, all the privileges and all the freedom of Englishmen depend upon Statute and not upon the definition of a Judge.

Mr. John Morley

Is the Judge to constitute a new crime? Oppression is surely a new crime. In the Coercion Act, of which the right hon. Gentleman is very proud, in that Act he created new crime; but in this Bill new crimes are to be created and pressed home, not to an individual, but to elected bodies of gentlemen. I think that is so monstrous a proposal that I am quite sincere in saying that I am disappointed in the Bill. We knew there would be artificial safeguards which we should have to protest against; that the friends of the right hon. Gentleman in Ulster would seek for them, but I think he might have found some safeguard which would not have affronted every principle of his Bill. The right hon. Gentleman says it is necessary to give this measure to Ireland because you have given a measure to England and Scotland. I should like to see the right hon. Gentleman consenting to introduce into a Bill, which would be supposed to satisfy the English and Scotch people, a proposal which would place the English and Scotch County Councils in the dock for a Judge of Assize to try them, and give his opinion of oppression. This proposal shows that he distrusts the Irish people, who are to be treated, as this Bill implies, as debased Helots, which we are responsible for having made them. All I can say is this, that I should like nothing better than that you should dissolve on this question; yes, as soon as you like. Go to the English counties and tell them you have brought in a Bill for Ireland, nominally a Bill to give equality and similarity of institutions between England and Ireland, which is to expose their elected County Councils to being tried by the Judges of the land, who are to say whether they are guilty or not. From that point of view I am not disappointed. If I had cared more for Party interests than I care for good government in Ireland, I should not have been disappointed; but I repeat it, the country, depend upon it, will see through this monstrous imposture. It will see that a measure brought in containing such a provision as that is a mockery of the House of Commons, is a falsification of your pledges, and is a just ground for new and fresh irritation in Ireland.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford City) and MR. JUSTIN McCARTHY (Londonderry City) rose.

MR. SPEAKER: Mr. Redmond (Loud cries of "Mr. McCarthy.") Mr. Redmond rose first. (Cries of "No. Mr. McCarthy rose first.") I think Mr. Redmond did rise first, and I call upon him.

(6.5.) MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): I did not see the hon. Member for Derry City rise in his place, and I assure the House that in taking the opportunity that thus early has been given to me of saying two or three words at once upon this Bill, I mean no personal disrespect to him, and I can assure the House also, that I will not stand between the House and, no doubt, the anxiety of hon. Members for a moment. The right hon. Gentleman who has just resumed his seat has stated to the House that he would not upon this occasion enter a formal vote against the Bill. For my part, I hope the earliest opportunity will be taken for enabling Members representing Irish constituencies of protesting by their votes against a sham and an insult, which they recognise in the Bill as it has been sketched by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. This Bill, I venture to assert, will not receive the sympathy or the support of any section of the people of Ireland. I do not believe that even those hon. Gentlemen representing Orange constituencies in this House, for whose feelings such elaborate precautions have been taken by the Government, will be able to declare themselves in favour of this Bill; while every man who represents any section of the Irish people who claim to be Nationalist will feel it their duty to offer to it a strenuous opposition. For myself, I may be permitted to say that I came into this House this evening with a perfectly open mind upon this subject. I had not a very high expectation as to what the Government would propose, but for my part I was prepared if they introduced a good Bill to give that Bill a hearty support through all its stages in this House. But they have introduced a measure which makes it impossible, as I believe, for any Irishman with any self-respect whatever to give it anything except the most strenuous opposition. In itself I say the Bill is a sham—not only is the Bill in itself a sham, but in the manner also in which it was proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. The Bill is an insult to the Irish people. The right hon. Gentleman commenced his speech by reminding the House and the country that this was, forsooth, no new departure of the Tory Party to introduce Local Government in Ireland. He reminded the House that the policy of the Tory Party was a policy of coercion, if you like, but a policy of creating for Ireland similar institutions with England. They have passed for Ireland whole-hearted, thoroughgoing, perpetual Coercion Acts, and when they take up what professes to be the supplementary part of their policy they have produced a measure which is absolutely beneath contempt. I thought at one part of the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury that the Bill was introduced with a view to an early Dissolution; but before he sat down I changed my opinion, because I did not conceive that any body of Ministers could be guilty of the imbecility of going to the country with such a proposal as the Bill proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. What, in a sentence, are the provisions of this Bill? The Grand Juries—which as a system have been denounced by almost every party in the State; which undoubtedly are indefensible in principle—the Grand Juries are to remain in existence, for the discharge of those very duties which, above all others, they have fulfilled in the most unsatisfactory way to the Irish people. The objections which have been held to the working of the Grand Juries have not been confined to objections as to the building of a bridge or the management of a little road in the country. Our objections to the working of the Grand Juries have been in those very duties which are still to be left to them. They have exercised their duties partially, for they have been influenced by political and other improper motives in discharging those duties, and those are the very duties which, under the provisions of this Bill, are left to them still to perform. They are to have the right of granting compensation for malicious injuries; they are to have the right of passing imperative presentments—as I am reminded, the most important part of the duties which at present remain with them. Not only that, but they are actually to exercise the practical right of veto upon every single penny to be expended in the shape of any capital expenditure in the county; because the House has grasped the fact that the County Councils are not to have the power of expending one single penny upon capital expenditure in Ireland without the consent of a Committee and that Committee is to be made up of seven Members nominated by the Grand Jury, and a casting vote to the Sheriff of the County; and though the right hon. Gentleman says his mind is open as to who should discharge the duty given to the Sheriff, still the fact remains that it is his intention to put over the County Councils to expend money for this purpose a Committee, the majority whom will be nominated by the Grand Jury, which we say should be totally abolished. Then there are the limitations put upon the Councils. In every Council there are to be seven ex officio members whose franchise is to be limited, and limited in a way which, as an Irishman, I felt humiliated on hearing proposed in this House. Some hon. Members might imagine because of the controversy that has been going on in Ireland, and from statements made from platforms in Ireland, that some of those who share the views I hold upon Irish political questions would be in favour of legislation directed against the illiterate voters in that country. For my part, I utterly disclaim anything of the sort. I look forward to the near approach of the day when the illiterate voters will be removed, but by the march of education among the poor classes; and I say that where there is no provision dealing with the illiterate voters in the measure of Local Government which Parliament has given to England, it is an insult to put it in a measure which you propose to give us in Ireland, which is needed there no more than it is needed here. To the fact that the Bill is still to retain the traverse, I have no objection; if it stood alone few men would be inclined to quarrel with it. Then the Bill contains one of the most extraordinary proposals that I ever heard made to this House, namely, a proposal for investigation—a couple of Judges would have the right of dissolving these Councils. The right hon. Gentleman, in making his speech, said he took the scheme of the minority voting in the School Boards in England, but when he saw that, on its merits, he could not defend that scheme, he, forsooth, said, "It is better to take a scheme which you know to be stupid, but which is in existence, than to take a scheme which you know is good and wise, but which has not been put on trial." But when he comes to deal with the most essential portion of his proposals, namely, the one by which he proposes to dissolve the County Councils, does he propose a scheme for dissolving County Councils which has been tried in this country, or in any country on the face of the earth? Nothing of the kind. He proposes a brand new scheme, that, forsooth, a couple of Judges should take to themselves the right of dissolving these County Councils, and thus deprive the people of their right of franchise. I did not rise for the purpose of going into the details of this Bill. I only rose for the purpose of expressing at once, without a moment's delay, what my feeling is with reference to the proposals in the measure; and my feeling is, that these proposals are a mockery to the Irish people, and, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle said, a violation of the pledges of the right hon. Gentleman and his friends, when they pledged themselves that while they were giving coercion to Ireland on the one hand, they were giving to Ireland similar free institutions with England, and that, in addition to these proposals, constitute an insult to the Irish people, which, for my part, I shall do my best at every stage of this Bill to resent by my voice and my vote.

*(6.15.) MR. JUSTIN McCARTHY (Londonderry City): I do not think that I ever heard in this House a Bill introduced under the same conditions, or a Motion made for the Second Reading of a Bill with the same results, as the Bill just introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury was one prolonged apology for introducing the measure at all. He evidently came "to bury Caesar, not to praise him." Not one single word of genuine praise came from the right hon. Gentleman about the measure he was introducing. At one time he apologised to his own followers; at another time he turned to us and made an apology to us. To his own followers he said—"It may be a very strong measure; you may think it very daring on our part; but you see we must do something with these people over the way." And then he turned to us and said—"I admit that this is a very ridiculous measure, but one has to do something, and it is better to have a stupid thing that has been done before, than a wise thing that has never been done before." Exactly. But you have now introduced a stupid thing that was never tried before, and I venture to say that never will be tried in this case or in any other. This, then, is the measure which is to win and wean the Irish people from all their wild desire for Home Rule. This is the measure which was promised to us long ago by the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington. I wonder what he thinks of it. This is the sort of measure which was to make us settle down composedly for ever more under the Tory and Coercionist Government, and return thanks to the powers above who gave us such benevolent masters. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle well said that this Bill is a monstrous imposture. It is also a very miserable and pitiable farce. I was disposed towards compassion for the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury when labouring with these absurdities which are called clauses in the Bill; the checks and balances, and the ingenious artifices—or rather, I should say, not ingenious, but very clumsy artifices—which seemed to be giving things with one hand while taking them away with the other. But one can understand the position of the right hon. Gentleman. He was like the captain of a vessel who at the one time has to fight an enemy and to try to keep down a mutiny below the hatches. I could not make anything of this Bill under conditions such as these. I do not propose to go into the details of this Bill. It seems to be all details. I can get no gleam or spark of meaning anywhere, except that it is a Bill based on the principle of "Oh, my prophetic soul, my uncle!" — the principle that the Irish people are like the Hottentots. We are to be regarded as below any other nation that pretends to be civilised in our right to civilisation. As regards one clause, the right hon. Gentleman asked us indignantly, with a sort of sneer in his voice, "If the thing is good enough for Scotland, is it not good enough for you?" But that particular clause was forced by the Tories upon the Scotch Members, and I say that what was merely forced on the reluctant Scotch Members is not good enough for Irish Members. I do not propose to follow the arguments that have been presented to the House by the right hon. Gentleman in support of the Bill; but I consider provisions have been introduced into this Bill which were unknown to any Statute whatever in this country before. It has been worked on the principle of coercion, and begins by putting a brand on the Irish people, so that even a measure of local self-government for them must be fortified round by new clauses, new schemes, new crimes invented for the purpose, and new means of punishment. I do not care whether the right hon. Gentleman's Bill is allowed to go through its first reading or not. I care little whether it is opposed in the beginning, or whether it is opposed in the end. My own feeling is that we ought to have nothing whatever to do with it; that we ought to express that feeling in the beginning, and reject the unclean thing. If I might venture to give the right hon. Gentleman one piece of advice, the piece of advice which I, for one, should like to give him, would be this—"Take your Bill, and put it in the fire."

(6.20.) MR. W. G. ELLISON MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I do not imagine that there will be in the minds of the cesspayers of Ireland any deep reflection of the very deep indignation exhibited on the Benches opposite, because I conceive that when the cesspayers of Ireland examine the provisions of this Bill, they will see what in reality the right hon. Gentleman proposes to do by the Bill. The Bill proposes to give a non-elected and non-elective body a complete and absolute control over the fiscal arrangements of the country. ("No!") Yes; that is what the cesspayers of Ireland have long desired to obtain, and they do not look on the establishment of County Councils as the perpetration of any deep political design. All they wish to have is the management of the county affairs in their own hands, and I believe, so far as I could gather from the clear and explicit statement of the First Lord of the Treasury, the Bill—which I believe to be a broad and generous Bill—will completely fulfil the expectations of the majority of the body of cesspayers of Ireland, whether great or small. I do not believe that there exists in any body of cesspayers in Ireland any great prospect or belief in seeing their affairs handed over to County Councils which would have unrestrained and unlimited powers of dealing with the finances of the county; and, therefore, I think that the provisions which the right hon. Gentleman has indicated and placed in the Bill to prevent extravagant and illegitimate expenditure on the part of the County Councils will be as heartily received by the small cesspayers as by the larger cesspayers in Ireland. I should like to reserve to myself full liberty upon one or two of the clauses connected especially with the franchise, and I think, the areas from which the Baronial and County Councils are to be selected; but, generally speaking, I desire—and I think I am expressing the opinion of all my hon. Friends who sit on this side of the House—to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman most heartily upon the measure which he has so successfully introduced.

6.25.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Frone, S.): I confess I speak on occasion with some difficulty. I've not made any secret outside—and see no reason why I should make y secret inside—this House that the constituency that I represent is not unanimously in favour of any scheme local self-government. At all events, I have gone to my constituents, d in every part of the constituency have told them what my views were. Now, I have listened to the speech of a right hon. Gentleman to-night, and have not the slightest desire to go to the details of the measure which has outlined. But there are one or two points upon which I should like express my opinion at once. First all, as regards the duties that are to be imposed upon these Councils, I do not think at any fair objection can be taken to the scheme. The duties of the new councils will be practically the same in character as the duties of the English and Scotch Councils. The fiscal function of the Grand Jury as distinguished in their judicial or quasi-judicial actions will be vested in these elected bodies. Now that is all the Government promised to do, and I do not think the country will be deceived by the boisterous merriment of the Front position Bench and of hon. Members below the Gangway when they come to argue in cold print the actual terms of the case. The next thing I would like to deal with are the proposed checks and safeguards outlined by the right hon. Gentleman. One would like to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, that they had never been a party to a Bill introduced by a Member of this House, that proposed checks and safeguards on an Irish Bill. I want to know what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian did when he was setting up a Governing Body in Ireland—or proposed to set up. Why, it is a matter of fact that he hedged that Bill round with safeguards of every description, and actually created two Orders in the Legislative body he proposes to set up. I now come to the question of the franchise. Nobody can deny that here, again, the country will see to-morrow at the basis of the franchise is solid and sound. The basis of the franchise is that every cesspayer shall have a vote. Nothing could be wider, nothing more democratic, than that. But the right hon. Gentleman by his Bill is guilty, says the hon. Gentleman the Member for Waterford, of one great sin—he has disfranchised the illiterate voter. I deny, taking the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, that he has done anything of the kind. What the right hon. Gentleman proposes to do, as I understand, is not to disfranchise anybody, but to withdraw the privilege that the law confers upon ignorance in this country. It is very easy in this country to laugh about the illiterate voter. They are not a considerable factor in either English or Scotch elections; but when they come up to a fourth of a total constituency, or more than a fourth, they then become a factor; and I say it is not any hardship to compel the illiterate voter to do the same as any other voter—that he must know what he is to do. And in view of recent elections in Ireland, and in view of the fact that priests were to be found as personating agents in the polling booths superintending the voting of these illiterates, I say the right hon. Gentleman has acted wisely in putting that clause into his Bill, and I hope he will stick to it. I now come to the question of the cumulative vote as distinguished from the franchise itself, and I confess candidly that I have some little doubts about that. I have some doubts about the minority vote at all, and I tell the House candidly why I have doubts. It will very probably be useful, but if the right hon. Gentleman's intention is to protect or to help Protestant minorities to representation in the South and West of Ireland, in almost every case in that part of the country these minorities are so slender that I hardly think any plan of cumulative voting will secure them representation. I admit that it will work better in the North, and I think it will do good in the North, because there the Catholic minorities are substantial, and I believe by this plan they will get representation, which I hold to be a good thing, on these Boards in the North. There are counties in Ireland where they would probably have no representation but for this; and, whilst I do not think this will be of much aid to Protestant minorities in the South and West, I believe it will be a great help to substantial Catholic minorities in the North, and I believe that it is worthy of consideration on that account alone. But I am convinced of this, that of all plans of minority voting this is the least harmful and the easiest understood. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond) waxed very eloquent about the County Council being hedged in with regard to capital expenditure. What was the promise of the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy) last year? I remember his promise perfectly.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I stick to it.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: His promise across the floor of the House was:—"If you introduce a Bill founded on the lines of the English or the Scottish Bills then I will support it." But this clause about capital expenditure which the hon. and learned Member for Waterford derides is absolutely founded on the Scottish precedent, and, I take it, is almost word for word. The hon. and learned Member's promise was not to support a Bill which would receive the support of the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid), but such a Bill as was embodied in the Scottish Act.

MR. T. M. HEALY: No, no.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I remember the promise given distinctly across the floor of the House. I do not pretend to fix him to every word or idea in the Bill; but when a clause such as this, to control the expenditure, comes up to be discussed, and you find it in the Scottish Act, I say hon. Members below the Gangway are barred by the promise of the hon. and learned Member for Longford from at least deriding it. I now come to the last part of the Bill that I care to discuss on the Motion for its First Reading, and I admit at once that I think the Government will find themselves in the greatest difficulty in regard to it—namely, the provisions with regard to suppressing County Councils where it might be deemed necessary to suppress them. But,

I think, the House at all events, instead of going off into merriment or exploding in passion at such a proposal as that, ought to look the facts in the face as they exist in Ireland. What have we been told? We have been told by hon. Members below the Gangway that every one of these bodies will be captured—that is the phrase—captured and worked for political purposes. I am not saying that they will not; I am not saying that they ought not to be. At all events, there is fair warning given authoritatively by the hon. Member for North East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien), that everyone of these bodies, that every public and popular institution of the country would be captured for ulterior purposes. I start with that, and I say the House is bound to take cognizance of a threat of that kind. Will the House take the analogy of the Board of Guardians? They are also public and popular institutions.

An hon. MEMBER: Partly.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Well, they are the only popularly elected body in the country.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: What about the ex officios?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I am aware of the ex officios, but I say the Board of Guardians are the only analogous Boards that you can consider, because they are the only Boards of the kind in the country. I want to ask, and especially do I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Sir G. Trevelyan), how many Boards did he suppress? These Gentlemen go off in merriment and in explosions of indignation at the idea of suppressing a public body, when they themselves have suppressed them times without number and said nothing about it. (Unionist Cheers and Laughter.) Did the right hon. Gentleman believe that they ought to be suppressed? He must have done so, or he would not have suppressed them, and if he believes that public Boards in Ireland were capable of doing things for which he judges suppression a necessary punishment, I say that the Government is bound in this Bill to act in the same way. I do not object to the power of suppression. I object to the method. I think that is cumbrous. I think it is.

Mr. T. W. Russell

very faulty, and I do not think I shall be able to support it, and I tell the Government that candidly. But as to the necessity for some power of appeal in cases of malversation I have not the slightest doubt that that is necessary, and I hope, whilst that clause will not be passed, that some power will be retained which will be capable of pulling those Boards up when occasion arises. The past history of the country shows that occasion has arisen, and if it has arisen in the past we have no right to act on the supposition that it will not arise in the future. I do not know that I ought to say more save in regard to one subject. I think the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) showed his hand just a little too plainly during the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. He interrupted the right hon. Gentleman to know what he proposed to do in regard to imperative presentments. I say that is just showing his hand a little too soon.

MR. SEXTON: What is my hand?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I say these are subjects of which we have had some experience already. They involve presentments for extra police, and we know what happened in the city of Limerick.

MR. SEXTON: No, no! They do not.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: They involve, I maintain, the presentments for extra police. These are imperative presentments. I say we have had some experience in the past with the Limerick Corporation in that matter, and I think the Government have acted rightly in simply transferring the fiscal functions of the Grand Jury and retaining in their hands their judicial and quasi-judicial functions.

MR. SEXTON: May I be allowed to say, with reference to the hon. Gentleman's remarks that I showed my hand, that I merely asked for information that the right hon. Gentleman omitted to give, and there is no reason why the County Councils more than the Grand Jury should have these resentments, seeing that the Judge of assize can make an order.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: At all events, I am exceedingly glad that that power has not been transferred to the County Councils. It is partly a judicial function, and I hope it will be retained by the Grand Jury. It is much too soon to discuss the clauses of this Bill in detail, and all I can say now is that I am prepared to vote for the First Reading of this Bill if there be a division; and whilst I reserve to myself full liberty on the clauses of the Bill, I believe there is in the measure the foundation for a good system of Local Government for Ireland.

(7.40.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I think the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Tyrone suffered somewhat from the fact that he was not able to have it written out beforehand, and that if he had seen the Bill yesterday, or even this morning, he would have made rather a better hand of it. The hon. Member challenges me with regard to an expression which I used last year with reference to the system of Local Government. Everything I said last year I fully and fairly stand by. The whole bent of my mind—my whole practice and desire in this House for 12 years—has been, whenever I saw a Bill introduced of which any good whatever could be made, if I could possibly do so without sacrifice of principle, to try and make the best I possibly could of that measure. But as to this Bill, a more contemptible Bill, a Bill more impossible for us to accept, without loss of self-respect, I have never known to be introduced. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) mentioned the Scotch Act, and said that one of the provisions which was taken exception to, that which is called, I think, the Joint Committee Provision, is to be found in the Scotch Act. Very good; but are not the rates in Scotland divided? The landlord in Scotland pays half the county rates, and that being so, it is very legitimate that the landlord should have representation. But is that so with us? The hon. Member for South Tyrone is a Scotchman, and tries to palm this off on the ignorance of the House, when he knows very well that in Scotland the occupier only pays half the county rate, and in Ireland he pays the whole of it, and that, therefore, while in point of form, no doubt, it may seem a matter of equality to embody the same system in regard to both countries, in practice and in fact there is a gross inequality and the grossest injustice. I go through this Bill from start to finish, and from the crown of its head to the sole of its foot, and I find no goodness or soundness in it. My only regret is this, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) stated that his Party would not divide against it on the First Reading. For my part I can only say that I shall be delighted if the Opposition, whether it be Liberal or Nationalist, divides against this Bill. I was glad, indeed, to hear the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond). I am glad he took the line he did; but, at the same time, without laying the blame upon any Party, I mournfully reflect that the true inwardness of the Government was shown by the Solicitor General for England (Sir E. Clarke) in a speech to his constituents a few months ago, when he pointed out that there was now a division in the Irish ranks, and when he declared that he believed that the Bill of the Government would be an easy Bill to pass, because, said he, "A large section of the Irish Members will be in favour of it." I believe that the Government thought they had Ireland at their feet, and that owing to the dissension which prevails in our country, anything could be forced down our throats. But I think the First Lord of the Treasury and his Party will find before very much later that this Bill will be rather a tougher job for him to pass into law than even a Coercion Act. I can well understand the Government insisting that a particular clause must be passed in the interest of law and order when it was a Coercion Bill they had to deal with, on the plea that society was crumbling to its foundation, and that it was necessary to appoint two Removables to deal with the matter—that there was some Parliamentary necessity for proceeding to the Closure. But when you have a Bill running into all the crevices and interstices of county life in Ireland, extending to at least 100 clauses, dealing with the question of the powers of the old Grand Juries as regards malicious injuries, as well as the powers of the new body which you now propose to constitute, I can only say that I believe this Bill is dead and buried almost before it is born. Of course, there is one thing to be said. The Government may be serious in passing the Bill; but if they are, I, who have always respected the intellect of the First Lord of the Treasury, can only say that he has fallen very much in my estimation. I cannot conceive that any man of the astuteness of the First Lord of the Treasury—except he believed he would capture some wing of the Irish Party—would expect that this Bill had the smallest chance of passing into law. If he has no hope, what is the good of this Bill? As a dissolving Bill it is absolutely worthless to Her Majesty's Government. You cannot recommend it to English constituencies; you cannot recommend it to the Scottish. The Irish constituencies would not have it. I think the shadow of the Birmingham Congress—where the previous question was moved—will so prevail in the Tory Party that they will give the Bill very cold support on their platforms when the Dissolution is sprung upon them. Therefore, I say, from either point of view, whether as a stalking horse for the Dissolution, or as an effective measure which can be passed through this House, the Bill is an absolute failure, and has died upon the lips of its author. Therefore, for us to make any criticism as to its provisions at this stage would be an absolute mistake. English Members, who know nothing whatever about the matter, will no doubt talk eloquently with respect to the Grand Jury proposal. Now, let me inform hon. Gentlemen on the Tory Benches that there is no subject more difficult to understand than the subject of the Irish Grand Jury law, and when the Member for South Tyrone talked about "imperative presents," I venture to think he did not know what they were. A great grievance is the grievance as to "malicious injuries." The right hon. Gentleman, with half the astuteness he sometimes displays, gave us the instance that the Grand Jury would still be allowed to retain the power of malicious injury in cases of maiming and murdering. Will the House believe that until four years ago it was not even discovered that the Grand Jurors, except under the Coercion Acts, had that power, and they now only have that power in the case of any policeman injured in a riot, and in the case of a witness who may have given evidence for the Crown; so that the power as regards maiming and murdering is non-existent except in the most special cases. And, furthermore, in the very place where that power is needed more than anywhere else, the City of Belfast, where the Catholics were mowed down in 1886, and where policemen were shot and killed, that power does not exist at all. The widow of a constable, a most respectable woman with a helpless family, because that power does not exist, was left penniless until a grant was given from Her Majesty's Government. What is the power of the Grand Jury as regards malicious injury? They have this power, and a more mischievous power was never placed in the hands of irresponsible men, who do not pay one penny from their pockets. A haystack is burned. It is always the haystack of a land grabber. It is forgotten that the very fact that if the man came before a landlords' body and said that he was a land grabber, that is the very thing to get compensation at twice the ordinary rate of pay. There was the case of Mrs. Lucas—tried at Cork Assizes four years ago. She was the wife of a Grand Juror, the wife of a Magistrate of the County of Cork, and she was tried for arson—for pouring paraffin on the curtains, with her own babes in a cradle in the upper room. She got compensation from the Grand Jury for malicious injuries, on the ground that she was boycotted, and her husband himself was one of the Grand Jury. If there ever was a provision which worked injustice it is this provision with regard to malicious injury. When we wish for county reform in Ireland, and when we desire Grand Jury reform, which would get rid of this odious malicious injury system, which has worked so much injustice in the past, I would not give sixpence for a Bill which did not deal with this question. I shall be told by some gentlemen opposite that this presentment can be traversed. Yes, it can be traversed before a Judge of Assize, one of the gentlemen who are to have the power of destroying these new County Boards. It may be traversed by cumbrous machinery. All the Judges, with two exceptions, I think, refused common juries in these cases. Who are the best judges, from the landlords' point of view, whether this Bill is a good one or not? The Irish landlords. And the Irish landlords assume, as a matter of course, by resolution of their Committee, that the Government would deal with this question of malicious injuries. Did the Landlords' Committee, or at any rate as many of the landlords who have intelligence, propose to deal with the subject? Did they imagine it would be left to the Grand Jury to continue to have this power? Then the Irish landlords are more extreme than the First Lord of the Treasury. They passed a resolution taking away from the Grand Jurors the power of malicious injuries, and they proposed to place it on the County Court Judge. So that, in the confession of the landlords themselves, the Government are taking a retrograde, and even a reactionary step. The other day the Member for South Tyrone had 300 bogus voters in his constituency. They were all allowed to go on, because the revising barrister refused to grant the objections, and the revising barrister got 100 guineas for doing that duty for the Member for South Tyrone. The Member for South Tyrone got him made a County Court Judge with £1,200 a year. For my own part, bad as the proposal of Her Majesty's Government is, I should regard the proposal of the Irish Landlords' Committee as far better than that which is in this Bill. It may be that the Government have made this Bill so bad as it is for the purpose of having Amendments made to it in Committee. They propose something awfully bad—so bad, that anything will be an improvement on it. Then when you propose something decent the Government will say, "Let us split the difference," and they give us something betwixt and between. That may be the idea working in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman. If it is, I will

which seemed to be giving things with one hand while taking them away with the other. But one can understand the position of the right hon. Gentleman. He was like the captain of a vessel who at the one time has to fight an enemy and to try to keep down a mutiny below the hatches. I could not make anything of this Bill under conditions such as these. I do not propose to go into the details of this Bill. It seems to be all details. I can get no gleam or spark of meaning anywhere, except that it is a Bill based on the principle of "Oh, my prophetic soul, my uncle!"—the principle that the Irish people are like the Hottentots. We are to be regarded as below any other nation that pretends to be civilised in our right to civilisation. As regards one clause, the right hon. Gentleman asked us indignantly, with a sort of sneer in his voice, "If the thing is good enough for Scotland, is it not good enough for you?" But that particular clause was forced by the Tories upon the Scotch Members, and I say that what was merely forced on the reluctant Scotch Members is not good enough for Irish Members. I do not propose to follow the arguments that have been presented to the House by the right hon. Gentleman in support of the Bill; but I consider provisions have been introduced into this Bill which were unknown to any Statute whatever in this country before. It has been worked on the principle of coercion, and begins by putting a brand on the Irish people, so that even a measure of local self-government for them must be fortified round by new clauses, new schemes, new crimes invented for the purpose, and new means of punishment. I do not care whether the right hon. Gentleman's Bill is allowed to go through its first reading or not. I care little whether it is opposed in the beginning, or whether it is opposed in the end. My own feeling is that we ought to have nothing whatever to do with it; that we ought to express that feeling in the beginning, and reject the unclean thing. If I might venture to give the right hon. Gentleman one piece of advice, the piece of advice which I, for one, should like to give him, would be this—"Take your Bill, and put it in the fire."

(6.20.) MR. W. G. ELLISON MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I do not imagine that there will be in the minds of the cesspayers of Ireland any deep reflection of the very deep indignation exhibited on the Benches opposite, because I conceive that when the cesspayers of Ireland examine the provisions of this Bill, they will see what in reality the right hon. Gentleman proposes to do by the Bill. The Bill proposes to give a non-elected and non-elective body a complete and absolute control over the fiscal arrangements of the country. ("No!") Yes; that is what the cesspayers of Ireland have long desired to obtain, and they do not look on the establishment of County Councils as the perpetration of any deep political design. All they wish to have is the management of the county affairs in their own hands, and I believe, so far as I could gather from the clear and explicit statement of the First Lord of the Treasury, the Bill—which I believe to be a broad and generous Bill—will completely fulfil the expectations of the majority of the body of cesspayers of Ireland, whether great or small. I do not believe that there exists in any body of cesspayers in Ireland any great prospect or belief in seeing their affairs handed over to County Councils which would have unrestrained and unlimited powers of dealing with the finances of the county; and, therefore, I think that the provisions which the right hon. Gentleman has indicated and placed in the Bill to prevent extravagant and illegitimate expenditure on the part of the County Councils will be as heartily received by the small cesspayers as by the larger cesspayers in Ireland. I should like to reserve to myself full liberty upon one or two of the clauses connected especially with the franchise, and I think, the areas from which the Baronial and County Councils are to be selected; but, generally speaking, I desire—and I think I am expressing the opinion of all my hon. Friends who sit on this side of the House—to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman most heartily upon the measure which he has so successfully introduced.

*(6.25.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I confess I speak on his occasion with some difficulty. I have not made any secret outside—and I see no reason why I should make any secret inside—this House that the constituency that I represent is not unanimously in favour of any scheme of local self-government. At all events, I have gone to my constituents, and in every part of the constituency I have told them what my views were. Now, I have listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman to-night, and I have not the slightest desire to go into the details of the measure which he has outlined. But there are one or two points upon which I should like to express my opinion at once. First of all, as regards the duties that are to be imposed upon these Councils, I do not think that any fair objection can be taken to the scheme. The duties of the new Councils will be practically the same in character as the duties of the English and Scotch Councils. The fiscal function of the Grand Jury as distinguished from their judicial or quasi-judicial functions will be vested in these elected bodies. Now that is all the Government promised to do, and I do not think that the country will be deceived by the boisterous merriment of the Front Opposition Bench and of hon. Members below the Gangway when they come to examine in cold print the actual facts of the case. The next thing I should like to deal with are the proposed checks and safeguards outlined by the right hon. Gentleman. One would think, to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, that they had never been a party to a Bill introduced by a Member of this House, that proposed checks and safeguards on an Irish Bill. I want to know what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian did when he was setting up a Governing Body in Ireland—or proposed to set up. Why, it is a matter of fact that he hedged that Bill round with safeguards of every description, and actually created two Orders in the Legislative Body he proposes to set up. I now come to the question of the franchise. Nobody can deny that here, again, the country will see to-morrow that the basis of the franchise is solid

and sound. The basis of the franchise is that every cesspayer shall have a vote. Nothing could be wider, nothing more democratic, than that. But the right hon. Gentleman by his Bill is guilty, says the hon. Gentleman the Member for Waterford, of one great sin—he has disfranchised the illiterate voter. I deny, taking the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, that he has done anything of the kind. What the right hon. Gentleman proposes to do, as I understand, is not to disfranchise anybody, but to withdraw the privilege that the law confers upon ignorance in this country. It is very easy in this country to laugh about the illiterate voter. They are not a considerable factor in either English or Scotch elections; but when they come up to a fourth of a total constituency, or more than a fourth, they then become a factor; and I say it is not any hardship to compel the illiterate voter to do the same as any other voter—that he must know what he is to do. And in view of recent elections in Ireland, and in view of the fact that priests were to be found as personating agents in the polling booths superintending the voting of these illiterates, I say the right hon. Gentleman has acted wisely in putting that clause into his Bill, and I hope he will stick to it. I now come to the question of the cumulative vote as distinguished from the franchise itself, and I confess candidly that I have some little doubts about that. I have some doubts about the minority vote at all, and I tell the House candidly why I have doubts. It will very probably be useful, but if the right hon. Gentleman's intention is to protect or to help Protestant minorities to representation in the South and West of Ireland, in almost every case in that part of the country these minorities are so slender that I hardly think any plan of cumulative voting will secure them representation. I admit that it will work better in the North, and I think it will do good in the North, because there the Catholic minorities are substantial, and I believe by this plan they will get representation, which I hold to be a good thing, on these Boards in the North. There are counties in Ireland where they would probably have no representation but for this; and, whilst I do not think this will be of much aid to Protestant minorities in the South and West, I believe it will be a great help to substantial Catholic minorities in the North, and I believe that it is worthy of consideration on that account alone. But I am convinced of this, that of all plans of minority voting this is the least harmful and the easiest understood. The hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond) waxed very eloquent about the County Council being hedged in with regard to capital expenditure. What was the promise of the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy) last year? I remember his promise perfectly.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I stick to it.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: His promise across the floor of the House was:—"If you introduce a Bill founded on the lines of the English or the Scottish Bills then I will support it." But this clause about capital expenditure which the hon. and learned Member for Waterford derides is absolutely founded on the Scottish precedent, and, I take it, is almost word for word. The hon. and learned Member's promise was not to support a Bill which would receive the support of the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid), but such a Bill as was embodied in the Scottish Act.

MR. T. M. HEALY: No, no.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I remember the promise given distinctly across the floor of the House. I do not pretend to fix him to every word or idea in the Bill; but when a clause such as this, to control the expenditure, comes up to be discussed, and you find it in the Scottish Act, I say hon. Members below the Gangway are barred by the promise of the hon. and learned Member for Longford from at least deriding it. I now come to the last part of the Bill that I care to discuss on the Motion for its First Reading, and I admit at once that I think the Government will find themselves in the greatest difficulty in regard to it—namely, the provisions with regard to suppressing County Councils where it might be d      y to suppress them. But,

-      I      ell

I think, the House at all events, instead of going off into merriment or exploding in passion at such a proposal as that, ought to look the facts in the face as they exist in Ireland. What have we been told? We have been told by hon. Members below the Gangway that every one of these bodies will be captured—that is the phrase—captured and worked for political purposes. I am not saying that they will not; I am not saying that they ought not to be. At all events, there is fair warning given authoritatively by the hon. Member for North East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien), that everyone of these bodies, that every public and popular institution of the country would be captured for ulterior purposes. I start with that, and I say the House is bound to take cognizance of a threat of that kind. Will the House take the analogy of the Board of Guardians? They are also public and popular institutions.

An hon. MEMBER: Partly.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Well, they are the only popularly elected body in the country.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: What about the ex officios?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I am aware of the ex officios, but I say the Board of Guardians are the only analogous Boards that you can consider, because they are the only Boards of the kind in the country. I want to ask, and especially do I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Sir G. Trevelyan), how many Boards did he suppress? These Gentlemen go off in merriment and in explosions of indignation at the idea of suppressing a public body, when they themselves have suppressed them times without number and said nothing about it. (Unionist Cheers and Laughter.) Did the right hon. Gentleman believe that they ought to be suppressed? He must have done so, or he would not have suppressed them, and if he believes that public Boards in Ireland were capable of doing things for which he judges suppression a necessary punishment, I say that the Government is bound in this Bill to act in the same way. I do not object to the power of suppression. I object to the method. I think that is cumbrous. I think it is very faulty, and I do not think I shall be able to support it, and I tell the Government that candidly. But as to the necessity for some power of appeal in cases of malversation I have not the slightest doubt that that is necessary, and I hope, whilst that clause will not be passed, that some power will be retained which will be capable of pulling those Boards up when occasion arises. The past history of the country shows that occasion has arisen, and if it has arisen in the past we have no right to act on the supposition that it will not arise in the future. I do not know that I ought to say more save in regard to one subject. I think the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) showed his hand just a little too plainly during the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. He interrupted the right hon. Gentleman to know what he proposed to do in regard to imperative presentments. I say that is just showing his hand a little too soon.

MR. SEXTON: What is my hand?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I say these are subjects of which we have had some experience already. They involve presentments for extra police, and we know what happened in the city of Limerick.

MR. SEXTON: No, no! They do not.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: They involve, I maintain, the presentments for extra police. These are imperative presentments. I say we have had some experience in the past with the Limerick Corporation in that matter, and I think the Government have acted rightly in simply transferring the fiscal functions of the Grand Jury and retaining in their hands their judicial and quasi-judicial functions.

MR. SEXTON: May I be allowed to say, with reference to the hon. Gentleman's remarks that I showed my hand, that I merely asked for information that the right hon. Gentleman omitted to give, and there is no reason why the County Councils more than the Grand Jury should have these presentments, seeing that the Judge of Assize can make an order.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: At all events, I am exceedingly glad that that power has not been transferred to the County Councils. It is partly a judicial function, and I hope it will be retained by the Grand Jury. It is much too soon to discuss the clauses of this Bill in detail, and all I can say now is that I am prepared to vote for the First Reading of this Bill if there be a division; and whilst I reserve to myself full liberty on the clauses of the Bill, I believe there is in the measure the foundation for a good system of Local Government for Ireland.

(7.40.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I think the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Tyrone suffered somewhat from the fact that he was not able to have it written out beforehand, and that if he had seen the Bill yesterday, or even this morning, he would have made rather a better hand of it. The hon. Member challenges me with regard to an expression which I used last year with reference to the system of Local Government. Everything I said last year I fully and fairly stand by. The whole bent of my mind—my whole practice and desire in this House for 12 years—has been, whenever I saw a Bill introduced of which any good whatever could be made, if I could possibly do so without sacrifice of principle, to try and make the best I possibly could of that measure. But as to this Bill, a more contemptible Bill, a Bill more impossible for us to accept, without loss of self-respect, I have never known to be introduced. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) mentioned the Scotch Act, and said that one of the provisions which was taken exception to, that which is called, I think, the Joint Committee Provision, is to be found in the Scotch Act. Very good; but are not the rates in Scotland divided? The landlord in Scotland pays half the county rates, and that being so, it is very legitimate that the landlord should have representation. But is that so with us? The hon. Member for South Tyrone is a Scotchman, and tries to palm this off on the ignorance of the House, when he knows very well that in Scotland the occupier only pays half the county rate, and in Ireland he pays the whole of it, and that, therefore, while in point of form, no doubt, it may seem a matter of equality to embody the same system in regard to both countries, in practice and in fact there is a gross inequality and the grossest injustice. I go through this Bill from start to finish, and from the crown of its head to the sole of its foot, and I find no goodness or soundness in it. My only regret is this, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) stated that his Party would not divide against it on the First Reading. For my part I can only say that I shall be delighted if the Opposition, whether it be Liberal or Nationalist, divides against this Bill. I was glad, indeed, to hear the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond). I am glad he took the line he did; but, at the same time, without laying the blame upon any Party, I mournfully reflect that the true inwardness of the Government was shown by the Solicitor General for England (Sir E. Clarke) in a speech to his constituents a few months ago, when he pointed out that there was now a division in the Irish ranks, and when he declared that he believed that the Bill of the Government would be an easy Bill to pass, because, said he, "A large section of the Irish Members will be in favour of it." I believe that the Government thought they had Ireland at their feet, and that owing to the dissension which prevails in our country, anything could be forced down our throats. But I think the First Lord of the Treasury and his Party will find before very much later that this Bill will be rather a tougher job for him to pass into law than even a Coercion Act. I can well understand the Government insisting that a particular clause must be passed in the interest of law and order when it was a Coercion Bill they had to deal with, on the plea that society was crumbling to its foundation, and that it was necessary to appoint two Removables to deal with the matter—that there was some Parliamentary necessity for proceeding to the Closure. But when you have a Bill running into all the crevices and interstices of county life in Ireland, extending to at least 100 clauses, dealing with the question of the powers of the old Grand Juries as regards malicious injuries, as well as the powers of the new body which you now propose to constitute, I can only say that I believe this Bill is dead and buried almost before it is born. Of course, there is one thing to be said. The Government may be serious in passing the Bill; but if they are, I, who have always respected the intellect of the First Lord of the Treasury, can only say that he has fallen very much in my estimation. I cannot conceive that any man of the astuteness of the First Lord of the Treasury—except he believed he would capture some wing of the Irish Party—would expect that this Bill had the smallest chance of passing into law. If he has no hope, what is the good of this Bill? As a dissolving Bill it is absolutely worthless to Her Majesty's Government. You cannot recommend it to English constituencies; you cannot recommend it to the Scottish. The Irish constituencies would not have it. I think the shadow of the Birmingham Congress—where the previous question was moved—will so prevail in the Tory Party that they will give the Bill very cold support on their platforms when the Dissolution is sprung upon them. Therefore, I say, from either point of view, whether as a stalking horse for the Dissolution, or as an effective measure which can be passed through this House, the Bill is an absolute failure, and has died upon the lips of its author. Therefore, for us to make any criticism as to its provisions at this stage would be an absolute mistake. English Members, who know nothing whatever about the matter, will no doubt talk eloquently with respect to the Grand Jury proposal. Now, let me inform hon. Gentlemen on the Tory Benches that there is no subject more difficult to understand than the subject of the Irish Grand Jury law, and when the Member for South Tyrone talked about "imperative presents," I venture to think he did not know what they were. A great grievance is the grievance as to "malicious injuries." The right hon. Gentleman, with half the astuteness he sometimes displays, gave us the instance that the Grand Jury would still be allowed to retain the power of malicious injury in cases of maiming and murdering. Will the House believe that until four years ago it was not even discovered that the Grand Jurors, except under the Coercion Acts, had that power, and they now only have that power in the case of any policeman injured in a riot, and in the case of a witness who may have given evidence for the Crown; so that the power as regards maiming and murdering is non-existent except in the most special cases. And, furthermore, in the very place where that power is needed more than anywhere else, the City of Belfast, where the Catholics were mowed down in 1886, and where policemen were shot and killed, that power does not exist at all. The widow of a constable, a most respectable woman with a helpless family, because that power does not exist, was left penniless until a grant was given from Her Majesty's Government. What is the power of the Grand Jury as regards malicious injury? They have this power, and a more mischievous power was never placed in the hands of irresponsible men, who do not pay one penny from their pockets. A haystack is burned. It is always the haystack of a land grabber. It is forgotten that the very fact that if the man came before a landlords' body and said that he was a land grabber, that is the very thing to get compensation at twice the ordinary rate of pay. There was the case of Mrs. Lucas—tried at Cork Assizes four years ago. She was the wife of a Grand Juror, the wife of a Magistrate of the County of Cork, and she was tried for arson—for pouring paraffin on the curtains, with her own babes in a cradle in the upper room. She got compensation from the Grand Jury for malicious injuries, on the ground that she was boycotted, and her husband himself was one of the Grand Jury. If there ever was a provision which worked injustice it is this provision with regard to malicious injury. When we wish for county reform in Ireland, and when we desire Grand Jury reform, which would get rid of this odious malicious injury system, which has worked so much injustice in the past, I would not give sixpence for a Bill which did not deal with this question. I shall be told by some gentlemen opposite that this presentment can be traversed. Yes, it can be traversed before a Judge of Assize, one of the gentlemen who are to have the power of destroying these new County Boards. It may be traversed by cumbrous machinery. All the Judges, with two exceptions, I think, refused common juries in these cases. Who are the best judges, from the landlords' point of view, whether this Bill is a good one or not? The Irish landlords. And the Irish landlords assume, as a matter of course, by resolution of their Committee, that the Government would deal with this question of malicious injuries. Did the Landlords' Committee, or at any rate as many of the landlords who have intelligence, propose to deal with the subject? Did they imagine it would be left to the Grand Jury to continue to have this power? Then the Irish landlords are more extreme than the First Lord of the Treasury. They passed a resolution taking away from the Grand Jurors the power of malicious injuries, and they proposed to place it on the County Court Judge. So that, in the confession of the landlords themselves, the Government are taking a retrograde, and even a reactionary step. The other day the Member for South Tyrone had 300 bogus voters in his constituency. They were all allowed to go on, because the revising barrister refused to grant the objections, and the revising barrister got 100 guineas for doing that duty for the Member for South Tyrone. The Member for South Tyrone got him made a County Court Judge with £1,200 a year. For my own part, bad as the proposal of Her Majesty's Government is, I should regard the proposal of the Irish Landlords' Committee as far better than that which is in this Bill. It may be that the Government have made this Bill so bad as it is for the purpose of having Amendments made to it in Committee. They propose something awfully bad—so bad, that anything will be an improvement on it. Then when you propose something decent the Government will say, "Let us split the difference," and they give us something betwixt and between. That may be the idea working in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman. If it is, I will say the whole Bill will want a new lock, a new stock, and a new barrel. I cannot conceive any portion of it which commends itself to the judgment of any section of Irish Members in the House. The mere fact of refusing to deal with malicious injuries, alone is a serious defect. To talk about other questions, the question of the franchise or the question of the cumulative vote, would, I think, be almost useless at the present moment. The only thing I wish to say is, I hope English Members will be instructed by the unanimity with which both sides of the Irish Party desire to preserve the illiterate vote. I saw in a pamphlet, sent out in England recently, the statement that the priests were at Cork in front of the booth with the crucifix. I never yet saw a priest with a crucifix anywhere outside his chapel. Therefore, so far as we are concerned, if you put in these illiterate voters in the interest of either section of the Irish Party both equally repudiate them. Certainly the last to make any proposition with regard to the illiterates should be the Conservative Party. You kept them in ignorance. You put the same price on the head of a schoolmaster as on the head of a wolf. You refused to allow us to deal with our schools, our schoolmasters, or with regard to the whole question of education, except upon some English plan. No doubt it suits the superfine English gentleman who has robbed the Church of this country, and given his children education at the expense of the poor, because, after all, the monasteries taught the poor, which you did not do in the Universities. You get your education at the expense of the poor in Oxford and Cambridge, but turn up your nose at some of us who have hardly got any school education. Whatever state of things prevail in Ireland is your handiwork. If an Irishman is ignorant and uncivilised—if, to use a famous phrase of the uncle of the First Lord of the Treasury, he is an Hottentot—for all these things he has to thank you and your Parliament. It is admirably instructive as to the true inwardness of the Tory Party in this latter end of the nineteenth century that, after having endured your rule for seven centuries, you now propose to punish the men you have robbed and kept ignorant for their crimes.

(7.2.) SIR WILLIAM HAROURT (Derby) : My hon. and learned Friend who has just sat down rather objected I think to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle, that we should not vote against the First Reading of this Bill. Now, I have one argument to address to my hon. and learned Friend which I think will have some weight. If we did not vote for the First Reading of this Bill, this Bill would never be printed. Now, our object should be to give the largest circulation that we possibly can to this Bill. I think we ought to have cheap editions of it ; that the Liberal vans throughout the counties of England should be stocked with this Bill, that they should enable the illiterates of the rural districts—those people who are not fit for county government as we have heard so often—to form a true opinion of what the Government think county government ought to be in this country. Therefore, Sir, for my part, I should be disposed to take, at all events, the preliminary measure, which would enable the people of England to understand two things—first of all, the point of view from which Her Majesty's Government approach the treatment of the self-government of Ireland—treatment which, as a Gentleman below the Gangway said, amounts to this, that a more insulting Bill to the people of Ireland, more insulting in its provisions and in the manner in which it was presented, cannot be imagined. Why, it professes to be a great remedial measure for Ireland !

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : No, no !

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT : I know you say it is not a self-government Bill, but it ought to be ; it is the basis of all reconciliation between the English and Irish people ; and I was going to say that it is not the provisions of this Bill alone, but it is the point of view and the tone of the right hon. Gentleman in presenting it which shows us what his conception is of the relations between England and Ireland, when he says that the Bill for the establishment of local self-government in Ireland is trifling Bill compared with a Coercion

Bill, or a Bill for the making of light railways in Ireland. Well, I shall not, at all events, vote against the First Reading of this Bill, because I wish it to be published throughout the length and breadth of the land. Sir, if there is anybody who should desire to intercept this Bill, it should be the gentlemen who sat behind the right hon. Gentleman. Why does not he, after what I think he has seen of the opinion in this House, get some other noble Lord to perform the friendly office which was performed to this measure at the great Conservative meeting at Birmingham? Why, those delegates had a great deal more common sense than the Cabinet they were called upon to support. Why does he not get some friendly Member on these benches to move "the Previous Question," so as to relieve him of his own Bill? He might save them from the disaster which was contemplated at Birmingham. Sir, we cannot forget that this is a Birmingham Bill. The stamp of Birmingham liberalism it on its face. But where are its supporters? What has become of the Liberal Unionists Brigade? Why are they not here to "help the lame dog over the stile"? Talk of running away! He, the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings), slunk out after them. But I must do this justice to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, that in this judgment of Solomon he did not speak with the language of the true mother of the Bill. No, Sir, the mother of this Bill sat at the end of this Bench. I saw in his countenance how much he felt for the imminent fate of his infant. I would venture seriously to ask the right hon. Gentleman after we have paid him the decent compliment of reading his Bill a first time, guided very much by the considerations to which I have alluded, whether it is worth his while to waste this Session upon such a Bill as this? He has got a colleague, sitting next but one to him, who can tell him something about compensation, and what happened to the Compensation Bill. But, Sir, the Compensation Bill was a joke compared to this Bill; I should say that this is the worse joke of the two. I have a high opinion of the intelligence of the right hon. Gentleman. Does he really think it is worth while wasting the time of the House of Commons with a Bill which it is using the mildest language to call an absurdity? Nobody can conceive seriously that a Government can propose for the acceptance of the House of Commons such a measure as this. It is not necessary to refer to any other clause than the notable clause of the trial of the County Council, solvuntur risu tabulae. If the right hon. Gentleman will only take a sensible view of this matter I am perfectly willing to say to him tu missus abibis. But the trial of the County Council—may I be there to see it; it will be a spectacle such as, I think, has never been witnessed. When the two Judges have retired and have pronounced the County Council guilty, and the culprits are removed from the dock, then the Lord Lieutenant will produce a new County Council. Do you call that a Government that can produce to the ridicule of mankind such a measure as this as fulfilling the great offices of self government in this country? Well, now, Sir, I venture to speak only in the interests of Public Business, and I would entreat the right hon. Gentleman to have some compassion upon the House of Commons. You may carry a joke too far. It is all very well for one night. The right hon. Gentleman has afforded us excellent sport for a few hours before dinner, and we are very grateful to him; but if this farce is to be continued, if the time of the House is to be wasted on such rubbish as this, I think the sooner you send us to our constituents the better, because, depend upon it, they will not waste many weeks in forming a judgment upon this measure and disposing of it. Therefore I would really recommend the right hon. Gentleman to take his First Reading, and then to assure us that we shall hear no more of this Bill, and then go on with some business which is fitting for men of common sense.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have naturally listened with interest, I may say with entertainment, and possibly with profit, to the short conversational Debate which has occurred on the First Reading of this Bill, and I have noticed I think in the speeches of all the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who have attacked this measure a parti pris—a pre-arrangement of opposition, which I think indicates that they had made up their minds how they were going to receive it long before our proposals were made to the House. I did not begin early enough to take notes of the speeches to have anything like a complete catalogue of the various contumelious epithets which have been heaped upon our proposal. One hon. Member described the Bill as "contemptible"; another as "an insult"; a third as "a sham"; a fourth as "wrong from the crown of its head to the sole of its foot" another as "a monstrous imposture." An Irish Member who knows a great deal about these things said that it would take as long to pass as the Coercion Act, and the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down threatened us with the same kind of opposition which he led with such brilliant courage against the Licensing Bill of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The hon. and learned Member for Longford seems to think that this Bill is of extraordinary character—that it must have been brought in by arrangement with one of the wings of the Irish Party.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I did not say anything of the kind.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That violent and eccentric hypothesis has been advanced by the hon. and learned Gentleman to account for such a measure being produced. The hon. Gentleman said we wanted to capture one of the wings of the Irish Party.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I never said anything of the kind. I said the right hon. Gentleman must have hoped to do so, for a colleague of his own (the Solicitor General for England) indicated that in a speech of his.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Well, Sir, I am sorry to say I had no more subtle or sinister designs in bringing forward this Bill than those which I have explained in my speech. I endeavoured, without colouring the matter one way or other, to explain to the House the advantages that would be derived by Ireland from local government, and I do not for a moment pretend that more than those advantages would follow from this or from any other Local Government Bill. It was not I who said that this would settle the Irish question, or that any other conceivable Bill would settle the Irish question. It was not I who said or pretended that it would bring into harmony those parties who have so long disturbed Irish politics. These are sentiments put into my mouth by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and which derive no colour whatever from anything I have said before. I want the House and the country to understand in a word what is the character of the Bill that has been so treated. The Bill agrees with the English and the Scotch Bills in handing over the management of county government to Councillors elected by an absolutely democratic vote, if that is the word; a vote not differing essentially from the vote by which Members of this House are returned. It agrees with the Scotch Bill in handing over to the County Councils so elected management of sanitary affairs as well as the management of roads, asylums, and other matters of that kind. The County Councils and the Baronial Councils elected by this wide suffrage have absolute control over the ordinary management of their ordinary affairs. The only limit put upon them with regard to the works they shall undertake is a limit which has already been imposed in Scotland, and which, so far as I know, has never been described as either rendering the Scotch system ineffectual or unjust, or Scotchmen who have adopted it either slaves or Hottentots. So far as the broad divisions of the Bill are concerned, they are taken from the measure you have already passed for England and Scotland. I admit there is one clause dealing with the power of suspending the County Councils—not treating them criminally, as the right hon. Gentleman, without the slightest warrant, chose to suppose. There is a provision by which, after judicial inquiry by a tribunal which has been thought strong enough to decide whether a Member shall sit in this House, and to determine whether constituencies shall return a Member to this House; before that tribunal we have proposed, and we think we are right in proposing, that cases of corruption, malversation, and oppression should be tried. In what sense is that an insult to the Irish people? In what sense is that a limit to the true powers of the County Councils in Ireland? Will it be maintained by any human being that a County Council, not guilty of oppression or malversation, or corruption, will be found by two Irish elected Judges to be unworthy of continuing in office? It will not be so found. No man believes for one moment that the verdict of a tribunal like that would be an unjust verdict. Therefore, the only possibility of the prophecy in which the right hon. Gentleman indulged of the County Council standing before such a Judge, and hearing his unfavourable opinion of their conduct, must depend upon the fact that in the judgment of the right hon. Gentleman County Councils in Ireland will be guilty of malversation and corruption. Except in that event the clause in the Bill would have, and ought to have, no operation. In that event, who will deny that we are bound to find some method by which laches like this can be dealt with? I wish the House, and I wish the country, to judge from this Debate what amount of sincerity there is in the cry sent up by hon. Gentlemen for Local Government in Ireland. Those cries are branded from the first with the stamp of insincerity by the speeches we have heard. The Member for Longford said it was not worth while discussing this Bill, which did not alter the existing law with regard to compensation for malicious injuries. What was that to do with Local Government in Ireland? (An hon. MEMBER: Why do you give it to the Grand Juries?) We do not alter the law. Because we bring in a Bill to deal with County Government in Ireland, and in addition did not also happen to deal with the reform of the Grand Jury Law relating to compensation for malicious injuries, therefore these lovers of Local Government, these people who desire that the ordinary ratepayers should have complete management of their own affairs, will not look at the Bill. They say it is contemptible, it is ridiculous, it is a sham. Is it not certain that a man who can deliberately reject a Bill, which, on the widest possible franchise, does give complete control to counties of their affairs, such as is given in Scotland, and who rejects that Bill because it does not go outside the province of Local Government and deal with the perfectly alien question of malicious injuries, is perfectly indifferent to Local Government? The right hon. Gentleman opposite advised me to drop this Bill at once, and tells me that they are going to offer a kind of obstructive opposition, such as has been offered by them on previous occasions, and that the whole Session will be wasted if we deal with this question at all. Are they going to pose about the country as the friends of Local Government? This Bill, at all events, gives to the Irish ratepayer what he has never had—complete power to manage his own affairs. If you reject, as you say you are going to reject, this Bill; if you render it impossible, as you say you will make it impossible, for us to pass this Bill, you will postpone indefinitely the privileges which the Government propose to give to the Irish ratepayers and taxpayers, as they have already given them to the people of England and Scotland. But if you think you are going to reap political advantage by going about the country denouncing us for having introduced a clause in this Bill by which a County Council in Ireland which oppresses is not to be allowed to exist any longer—if you think you are going to make political capital out of the statement that we have dared to introduce a clause in this measure by which the weak and the poor are to be protected from the numerous and the strong, I think you will make nothing of that. There is not a platform in this country, nor an audience in this country, before whom I could not go bearing in my hand instances in which popular bodies in Ireland have already shown what, under circumstances and under some temptation, they are capable of. I ask the English people whether we should not be acting criminally towards the minority in Ireland if we did not extend some protection to them? In the meanwhile, I can only take note of the declarations that have been made. I interpret those declarations as a distinct statement on the part both of the official Leaders of the Opposition and of those who represent both sections of the Nationalist Party below the Gangway, that they mean to use every Party weapon they can command to prevent this Bill becoming law. I take note that the only reason they do that is because we introduce machinery to stop corruption and oppression, and I draw from it the inference that it is not freedom and not Local Government they care for, but the desire to make something out of the County Councils. They desire and expect to be able if this provision is not introduced into the Bill to use the powers of the Council either for corruption or for oppression, and for carrying on the cause of the Party of which they are the representatives.

(7.27.) MR. MAHONY (Meath, N.) : The insulting observations of the right hon. Gentleman are very simply and very shortly dealt with by asking him if the provisions were so salutary why were they not applied to England and to Scotland ? The right hon. Gentleman finds that the Irish Members of all sections are opposed to this Bill. The reason is a very simple one. It is because this Bill is drawn on the assumption that for some reason or another Irishmen are inferior to Englishmen and Scotchmen. So long as the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Members in this House mean to legislate for Ireland on the assumption that Ireland is inferior to England and Scotland in any respect, so long will their measures meet with every opposition that it is possible for Irish Members to give them.

*(7.32.) MR. KNOX (West Cavan) : I want to know why it is that the hon. Members for North Armagh and North Down are not present during this discussion ? The only explanation of this extraordinary event is that they are engaged in organising the poor and the weak in Ulster against the oppression which would be possible under this Bill.

MR. MACARTNEY (South Antrim) : My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Armagh is suffering from influenza.

*MR. KNOX : I am very sorry to hear that. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that these provisions are inserted in the Bill, because the Irish people have shown that they have been guilty of a condition which English and Scotch people have not been guilty of. Have we heard of the Metropolitan Board Works ? In the Capital City of Kingdom—a city which is the hotbed of Toryism—you had a spectacle of corruption which you have never equalled in the poorest Board of Guardians in Ireland. You talk of political corruption ! The man whom hon. Members opposite wish to be styled Mayor of Belfast, who was to have the entertainer of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury on his visit to that town, is a member of a firm of contractors, and his partners tendered for contracts under the corporation of Belfast. He says he has some arrangement with his partner which the profits do not go into the Lord Mayor's pocket. But neither the Corporations of Dublin or Cork, or other city in Ireland, would have given contracts to the partner of their Magistrate. That is the one case declared open and scandalous conduct which you can find anywhere in the Local Government of Ireland. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether this provision is specially inserted in order to prevent the Mayor of Belfast from giving contracts to his partner ? Then, what about the poor and the weak ? We used to be of the wealth and intelligence of our opponents, of their strong right arm which were going to resist any measure of Home Rule for Ireland. Your friends in Ireland, on behalf of whom you refused for the last six years to even the rudimentary rights of citizens to the vast mass of the people of Ireland, are, after all, so poor and that you have to invent a scheme of checks and balances and safeguards different to anything that has ever been seen in any other Local Government Bill. The people of Ireland are fit for Local Government, but they are not fit for the Local Government proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. I do not see the wisdom of setting up an elaborate sham. We do not take exception to any provision which puts down corruption and oppression, but we do take exception to the strenuous proposal to give the Judges the right to punish the County Council reland because they opposed the Conservative Party. We shall offer to his Bill the most decided and determined opposition; and as the Bill must be a complicated one, and as the statutes dealing with Local Government are numerous, it will be possible for us to oppose this Bill in a way which may exceedingly embarrass Her Majesty's Government. There will be no difficulty in drawing Amendments which would occupy no small part of the time of this Session; and if my hon. Friends sitting around me are of the same opinion I think the Government will hesitate to press on this measure in the face of the opposition which it will encounter.

(7.37.) MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Jarro): I decline to express any opinion on the Bill till I have seen it. I see mainly in consequence of the indignation, real or assumed, expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby and other speakers. He would suppose that the Members for Derby and Newcastle had never heard of local governing bodies being controlled by the Courts of Law. I know of no Local Government, either past or present, which is not directly subject to the control of the Courts of Law. It is the common practice for applications to be made to the court of Queen's Bench to keep justices within their proper jurisdiction, and to get them to discharge their duty; and when they fail to discharge their duty you can get a mandamus to compel them to do so. If after this they do not discharge their duty, they would be adjudged by the Court to be guilty of contempt of Court. We need not go into ancient history. We have had a recent instance in which the London County Council had to obey a mandamus of the Queen's Bench on a question of licensing. What hon. Gentlemen opposite seem to have lost sight of is this fact—that you must take the local governing authorities subject to the control of the executive, of the Imperial Government. If that is not done, then Local Government ceases to be Subordinate Government. There is nothing new in this, except that the new tribunal proposed to have the power of dissolving County Councils. In principle it is the same, for the local governing bodies are subject to the control of Her Majesty's Superior Courts.

(7.42.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I have observed that whenever a Tory Bill is brought in you always have a Tory lawyer to swear it is part of the Constitution. Let me tell the hon. and learned Gentleman that he may talk as he pleases, but he must realise himself that the Liberals would never consent that an elective representative assembly should be subordinate to any judicial tribunal in this country. The judicial tribunals are subordinate to all local bodies that have rights to legislate. But I do not rise to reply to the hon. and learned Gentleman. I rise to express my sympathy with the First Lord of the Treasury. I think he has been most cruelly treated by hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House. They have not considered the difficulty of his position. The right hon. Gentleman found himself between a certain Personage and the deep sea. Why has not the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham manifested his interest in the Bill? The right hon. Gentleman has for years demanded and insisted that the pledge of the noble Lord the Member for Paddington should be fulfilled, and that some sort of local government for Ireland should be brought in by the present Ministry. The First Lord of the Treasury had to submit to this. He knew he could call himself the Leader of the House, but he had a master, and the master was sitting here. The hon. Gentleman writhed under the supremacy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, but they were obliged to accept it, because if they did not they knew they would no longer have a majority in the House. Here is the right hon. Gentleman in this position, and I am sorry to see the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby and others trampling him under foot. The right hon. Gentleman has had to satisfy two different parties. He had to satisfy the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham by bringing in a Local Government Bill, and he had to satisfy Gentlemen behind him by bringing in a sham Local Government Bill. I never saw a more pitiable position of a Leader of the House.

He was on his knees not to the Opposition, but to hon. Gentlemen behind him, with one after another of what he was pleased to call safeguards. He looked disparagingly round to see if there was no cheer, and if there was not sufficient; then he would give another safeguard; and, showing that the Bill was a humbug and a sham, the right hon. Gentleman would have gone on putting in safeguards if his friends had desired it. I must call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham to his position. He has been called by the Member for Derby the mother of this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman complained that my right hon. Friend had not stated his views with regard to this Bill. We know that this Bill is the child of the right hon. Gentleman, and I should like to hear this eminent former Radical explain his views on the different clauses of the Bill. Let him tell us what he approves of and what he disapproves of, because I never know what the Government are going to do until I hear the words of the right hon. Gentleman. Why are we to be tormented, I ask the First Lord of the Treasury, by these sham Bills? Why not take the advice, which is exceedingly well meant, and send us back to our constituents? Either you have a majority in the country or you have not. If you have not, you have no business here. If you have, you will come back with redoubled force. It is too ridiculous to waste time on a Bill like this, or on any Local Government Bill, with regard to Ireland, considering that the great issue which must be submitted to the country is, whether there is to be Home Rule or not, and in the event of the country deciding that there was to be Home Rule, we shall be wasting our time, for it will be for the Irish Parliament, not for us, to decide what are to be the provisions of Local Government in the different counties.

(7.50.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): Sir, I am induced to say a few words on this stage of the Debate by the appeal of the hon. Member for Northampton. I think it exceedingly undesirable that credulous people should take for truth what the hon. Member has just said. The hon. Member is entirely mistaken in saying that I have insisted, either in public or in private, upon the introduction of a Local Government Bill for Ireland. I took note in the early part of this Parliament of the intention of the Government to introduce such a Bill. I have approved of that intention, and I have counted upon its fulfilment, but I have never insisted upon anything. The hon. Member does me altogether too much credit in imagining that I am in any way responsible for the clauses of this Bill. I understand in the course of my absence from the House for five minutes my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Derby took the opportunity of making an attack upon me, which I am assured was in his very best and latest Whitechapel style. I am told that my right hon. Friend complained that I had slunk out of the House for fear apparently of the onslaught which he was about to make upon me.

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT: I said in fear of the Bill.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I should like to assure my right hon. Friend that it was not because I was afraid of him. I had no idea that in his present retiring mood he would be likely to take a prominent part in this Debate, and certainly I never anticipated that he would attack anybody when that person was in a position to reply to him. I had not intended, unless these appeals had been made, to take any part in the discussion on the First Reading, because, following the example so often set by the greatest authorities in the House, I desired to see the Bill in print before pronouncing any opinion upon it. What I should like to consider, in the first instance, when I do see the Bill, is, what are the privileges which it confers upon the popular and representative local authorities it is going to create? If these privileges are as complete as I understand the First Lord to say, then I shall be inclined to regard with a favourable eye a measure which does for Ireland what similar measures have done for England and Scotland. As I understand, the opposition to the Bill has turned upon the safeguards which the right hon. Gentleman announced will be found in the Bill. I want to know whether hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House—I do not say hon. Gentlemen from Ireland, but from England and Scotland—consider that my safeguards are at all necessary? Are they prepared to give to these local authorities in Ireland, which will be elected, so far as the vast majority of their members are concerned by one party, full control over the property of the minority?

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Yes.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes; says the hon. Gentleman. My hon. Friend is perfectly willing to give to the majority full right over the property of the minority, but I am appealing, not to my hon. Friend, as he takes somewhat extreme views of these questions, but to the majority of the Party on this side of the House. I think I have heard the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, and if I have not heard him I have read articles written by him, in which he has pointed out the immense danger of conferring upon bodies similar in composition to Boards of Guardians in Ireland those powers over the property of the minority. I imagine that the right hon. Gentleman would agree that some kind of safeguard is necessary. When we get the Bill we shall see what the safeguards are—whether they are sufficient—or whether any alternative may be found. As I understand, the main safeguard, and the one spoken of as an insult to Ireland, is a safeguard which the Americans, the most democratic and independent people in the world, have introduced into their Constitution. At the present time in America there is no Legislature in the country, no one of those self-governing States, which may not be, in the absurd and theatrical words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, put into the dock and judged by a judicial tribunal.

MR. J. MORLEY: And suppressed?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: No, not suppressed. My right hon. Friend will not get off; I am coming to the suppression directly. The charge of the right hon. Gentleman against the Government was, that they were going to put County Councils in Ireland in the dock. No matter what the penalty was to be if convicted, the insult was that they were going to put them in the dock. I say in exactly the same way as these Councils might be put in the dock, the Legislatures of every State in the United States may be brought before the Supreme Court and put into the dock, and their acts declared to be ultra vires. The second objection is taken not to the method, which, in my opinion, is perfectly justifiable, and practically the same as the method adopted in this country. As the hon. and learned Gentleman has just said, it is perfectly true that every County and every Municipal Council in this country is subject to a judicial tribunal, and may be ordered by mandamus to undo its work; and if it does not fulfil the orders of the Court, what happens to it? It is not suppressed; no, but it is put into prison. I think it may fairly be said that in that way County or Municipal Councils in this country may be put into the dock and tried for their lives almost, and be imprisoned if they do not obey the orders of the judicial tribunal. But the complaint is that this judicial tribunal would have the power of suppressing the council. I do not know until I see the Bill what the provisions are. I should like to know whether or not it is intended, that having before it a case of oppression or wrongdoing on the part of the Council the Judicial tribunal is thereupon immediately to make an order for its suppression, or is, in the first instance, to give it an opportunity of undoing the wrong it has done? I do not gather from the speech of the First Lord which is the case. I should myself prefer that any Council being in this position should have an opportunity of undoing what it has done. But if it refuses to do that, and is in contempt of the Court, I see no hardship, no insult, no wrong to any class in Ireland in ordering its suppression, and in substituting for it, at all events for a time, persons who will carry on the work under the orders of the Court. I did not intend to take part in this Debate, but I hope it will be considered I have clearly and sufficiently answered the appeal that was made to me.

MR. J. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): The illustrations the right hon. Gentleman has given requires some immediate reply, as they may mislead some of those who are not familiar with the facts from which they are drawn. The illustrations were of the most absurd and indefensible provision of the Bill, and they were twofold. The first was the case of a mandamus which may issue against any Public Body in this country, and the second was the case of the United States. Now a mandamus issues in both England and Ireland when a Public Body disobeys the law. The Superior Courts are bound to see that the inferior Executive Bodies obey general law, and in dealing with cases certain rules are laid down for the observance of the Judges. What we complain of is that the Government is not content to rely upon these provisions of the general law, not content to rely upon the well understood functions and traditions defined and ascertained by centuries of usage in England, but proposes to set up a perfectly novel and exceptional procedure. The illustration of the United States is very wide of the mark. I should like to hear what any American, not a lawyer, would say if he had had the good fortune to be in the Gallery during the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He would more than ever believe, what Americans are in the habit of saying, that there is no place where American institutions are less understood than in the country from which they are derived. The right hon. Gentleman says that the case here is exactly parallel to that of the United States. He says that in the United States there is no Legislature which may not be brought to book and tried by a judicial tribunal in the same way as the County Council is proposed to be dealt with.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I did not say that. I did not say it was exactly the same, or that the consequences would be the same.

MR. BRYCE: The right hon. Gentleman certainly used the word "exact," and conveyed that impression. Will the House believe that there is absolutely no power whatever in any American Court to arraign or deal with the act of any Legislature at all? No

American Court has any power to do anything but this, to administer the general law of the land, the highest law of the land. Hon. Members will, perhaps, pardon me if I enter on what may seem to be a disquisition on a technical point to explain the matter. The highest law of the land is the Constitution of the United States, and the Statutes made under the authority of the Constitution, within the scope of Congressional power. If any Legislature transgresses the Constitution of the United States, or any of these Statutes, that Act may be, in a private cause arising between private parties, adjudged to be null and void. If any Legislature passes any Act by which a private right is interfered with in contravention of the Constitution, in a case between two private parties, it is competent for any Court to decide that that Act ought not to have been passed. Is there any similarity whatever in this? Anyone who has listened to the right hon. Gentleman would have supposed that the Legislature would be censured and dissolved in analogy with this Bill. Mr. Speaker, so far from this being the case, no State Legislature can be imprisoned, and no civil suit brought against it except by another State—not by a private individual—and so far from there being anything approaching an executive and administrative jurisdiction of this kind, such things have never been suggested for a moment in the United States, and nothing exists there beyond the power which exists in this country to pronounce a bye-law, passed by a Legislature in excess of its proper jurisdiction, null and void. The American Courts can only do that which our Courts can do. I will go a little further, and say that the provision in this Bill receives its very strongest condemnation from the practice of the United States. In America there have been attempts to throw non-judicial functions on the Judges, but the Judges have always declined to exercise them, on the ground that they would lose the confidence which they at present enjoy in the exercise of their duties, and that view is sanctioned by the Constitution of every State in the Union, and has been upheld in innumerable cases. The reason why, above all things, we are entitled to object to this proposal which the Government has made to combine judicial and executive work on the Judges, is that it tends to increase and aggravate the worst feature of the Irish social question. What we have said is that the antagonism which exists between the Judges and the people in Ireland, and the distrust of the administration of the law, would be greatly aggravated if our Judges became associated with what they consider is oppression. They look on the Judges as being too subservient to the Executive, and not sufficiently independent. That has been the constant difficulty in Irish government, and that is the danger which the present proposal of the Government tends to accentuate. The right hon. Gentleman tried to fix us with the alternative of proposing that if we did not desire to entrust this to Irish Judges it was because we believed that County Councils would never be wrong, or if oppressive ought not to be punished. Mr. Speaker, it is not, and I think the right hon. Gentleman must feel that it is not, such a view that has been expressed from these Benches. What we have said is this: that the antagonism between the Judges and people in Ireland, and the distrust of the administration of the law, would be greatly increased and aggravated if it were put into the power of any minority, however small, in a Local Authority to raise questions of this wide, vague, and indefinite character before a judicial tribunal, to accuse a County Council of oppression, and leave the decision of that question, not to any provision of law, or anything you can find in the Statutes, but to the view any two Judges might take as to what was oppression of the minority. No proposal can be more opposed to the best traditions of English Government, or can work more disastrously for the welfare of Ireland. We can desire nothing better than to have an opportunity, I hope we shall have it soon, for arguing the question at greater length than can be done to-night.

<sup>(8.40.)</sup> SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I should like to say that there are two statements of fact mentioned by the hon. Member for Longford which, in my judgment, are really not exactly accurate. He said, in the first place, that in Ireland the whole of the county cess is paid by the tenant. Now the Act of 1870, which is the law of the land, provided that in all cases of new tenancies the landlord should pay half of the county cess; and I know that on many properties where the tenants are numerous the landlord, by arrangement, does pay the whole of the county cess. Therefore the statement is not strictly accurate. The other statement was where the hon. Member charged the Union with having created illiterates. I would remind the House that this Imperial Parliament has been more generous to Ireland than to England itself, because 20 years before an Education Act was passed for England such an Act was passed for Ireland. The question before the House is, Whether we shall have submitted for consideration—

"A measure for the establishing of County Councils in Ireland founded upon representative principles, and framed with the double aim of confirming popular control over expenditure, and supplying a yet more serious want by extending the formation of habits of local self-government."

We are asked to allow to be introduced into this House a Bill for that purpose, and the words I have used to describe the measure is a just description of it. I have found the words I have used in Her Majesty's Most Gracious Speech from the Throne in 1881, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was one of Her Majesty's Ministers, and now we are told by him that to introduce for the consideration of this House such a measure is worse than a bad joke. I think the concluding observation in it is one of the strongest arguments for County Government of Ireland. I think the regeneration of Ireland depends upon such education; and so long as the present system continues I can see no prospect of an improved condition of Ireland which will be of a permanent character. It is utterly impossible to suppose that you can carry on a system of local taxation where the taxes are paid by one class and administered absolutely by another. Therefore I am forced into this position, and I am now speaking as a friend of Ireland, and not in any Party sense, when I declare this to be a necessary educational process, which I hope will produce good results upon the people of Ireland in regard to educating individuals in the duties of public affairs. At the present stage it would be impossible to deal with the details of the Bill. I only rose to point out one matter, that I have not heard referred to in the course of this Debate. It is in reference to the establishment of safeguards. I think exceptional and strong safeguards are necessary in Ireland. Granting that popular Local Bodies in Ireland in absolute power will be no worse and no better than similar bodies in England, assuming that for the sake of argument, there is exceptional reason why extra and special safeguards should be introduced when you are passing for the first time a Local Government Bill for Ireland. The safeguards are necessary for owners of property who are in the minority in that country. Against the interests of property history records that repeated attacks have been made. It has been the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and the policy of the Unionist Party, in every way possible to increase the number of owners of property in Ireland. This process is only in the commencement; and although the owners are few and in the minority, nothing should be done to make the position of owners of land, whether in large or in small portions, more difficult than at present. This House has on the recommendations of a Unionist Government, applied a large amount of State money for the purpose of encouraging occupiers to become owners. Now, Sir, if you establish a system of Local Government which provides no safeguards, and which, therefore, places in the hands of the vast majority—many of them ignorant of public affairs—power to oppress and to make the position of the landowners more difficult, you will largely deter occupiers from becoming owners, and in spite of all the trouble this House has gone to, the large sums of State money appropriated by Parliament for the purpose of converting occupiers into owners would be absolutely useless. If do not have safeguards the Government machinery may be by the large majority, who are occupied in deterring occupiers from becoming purchasing tenants. I have had conversations with many men in different parts of Ireland who are occupiers wish to become owners, and I find one of the chief things which men from purchasing is the fear any of the advantages the purchasing tenants would derive would be swallowed up by additional tax. I found their answer was generally this, when I asked them whether they had any intentions to purchase "While the terms are good we are like to become purchasing tenants, but we do not know what may be the result to ourselves as owners with regard to taxation of under Home Rule or popular control. Now, I hold that this uncertainty and fear has prevented occupiers from becoming purchasing tenants, as by County Government you alter the present system, they at once see they are uncertain as to the future of taxation. Therefore, in the interest of the purchasing tenants I you must adopt essentially such and even exceptional safeguards in Ireland for the purpose of protecting, not the great lords, who are able to protect themselves, or ought to be, but for the purpose of protecting small owners who will be in danger by this. For my part I will give the Bill my hearty support. I can understand the position of hon. Members of any Party opposite saying they will not even discuss this measure nor even submit to a discussion a measure for extending Local Government to Ireland, when it is a reference to the measure of 1881 to which I referred. It means that they will not do now what the right hon. Gentleman for Derby proposed to do in 1881. I give the Government credit for having introduced the Bill, and say that I upon county government as the means of educating public opinion in Ireland up to the level of forming a capable self-government.

Sir John Columb

(55.) MR. EDMUND LEAMY (S.): The First Lord has ten of a pre-arrangement of opposition which I fail to discover. I wish express my own opinion and the opinion of others sitting upon these benches, that we were looking forward, with very much hope, to the introduction of a Bill that would confer self-government upon Ireland, and that Bill were one which could be supported by the Irish people, I, for one, would only be too happy to support it. It did not require, as far as I could see, a pre-arrangement, or organization, consultation, to enable Gentlemen on these Benches to come to the conclusion that the Bill would be a sham, and that, if placed upon the Statute Book, it would be another blot to the Irish people. What, I would ask, is the use of the County Councils under the provisions of this Bill? We are told of corruption; we are told that they might oppress, if you look to the provisions, you see that there is no opportunity for oppression, and, I think, even for corruption. The Bill is a dubious substitute for the present system. I do not know whether it has a pointed out that not only are the powers to be given the power of finding County Council guilty, and so disbanding them, but that power to substitute others is given the Lord Lieutenant, so that you therefore punish the people for wrong done by the County Council themselves. I could understand, on its being dissolved, that a new election should be held and other members sent in the place of those who have been removed; but this proposal cannot be understood. The only point that appears to me to be of any use, or to recommend itself, is that which confers powers on County Councils to look after and protect the woods and plantations of Ireland. I am sure there is no Irishman who does not regret what has taken place during the last few years, and I believe that the first work that an Irish Parliament would set itself to do would be the afforestation of Ireland. Now, I am perfectly satisfied that, if this Bill is made into law against the wills of the Irish Representatives, the people will not take any advantage of it. What on earth would be the good of allowing a County Council to decide whether a road should be repaired or not? because, under the provisions regarding the Standing Committee, the County Council could not make a new road without the permission of the Standing Committee. We have been told that a Standing Committee exists in the Scotch and English Bills. That is quite true; but under the English Bill the Standing Committee have the power of appointing the Chief Officer of Police, of deciding the number and pay of the police, and the police are under the authority of the Standing Committee. I do not know what the idea of my hon. Friends around me may be on the subject, but for my part I think the Bill should be allowed to be read a first time. I agree that it would be a good thing for the Bill to be printed, because it would show the country the utter ineptitude of the First Lord of the Treasury to legislate for Ireland, and enable one to see what is really wanted in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman comes down to pass this measure without consulting the majority of the Representatives of the Irish people; but having consulted the minority, and having fallen in with their views on every single point, which are we know, with one or two exceptions, opposed to granting Local Government to Ireland. Surely it is no wonder that we should denounce this Bill as a sham; and I must say that, during my experience of 11 or 12 years in this House, I never saw a man standing on the Treasury Bench in such a state of excitement as the First Lord of the Treasury was while he was introducing this Bill. While looking at the excited state of mind of the First Lord of the Treasury this evening as I listened to him, and observed the tone of his voice and his attitude, I confess I was puzzling my mind as to whether he was really sincere in placing the measure before the House, and whether he intends to go on with it. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman intends to go on with it; but I think the right hon. Gentleman might find some instruction in the unanimous opposition which is offered to his measure by the Irish Members on these Benches, and might, perhaps, come to the conclusion that it might be as well to save the time of the House and go on with some other Bill which might be passed during the present Session, and which might be of advantage to some other part of the Empire.

*(9.5.) MR. T. D. SULLIVAN (Dublin, College Green) : In the course of the speech delivered by the First Lord of the Treasury he said that, with regard to certain proposed safeguards in this Bill, he would have no objection to go on English platforms and tell the people that we had objected to the provisions which would prevent malversation, corruption, and oppression in Ireland by some of these newly-constituted authorities. Well, perhaps we would have no objection to his doing so ; but I can tell the Members of this House that that game has been tried before now on English platforms, and the result has been very unsatisfactory for those who attempted it. He wants to know why we object to these proposed safeguards. We object, because we consider the proposal offensive, unnecessary, and grossly insulting to the Irish people. We object to it because we consider that it gives colour, or would give colour, to some of the most hateful, most unjust, and most bitter accusations and allegations that have been launched by some of our political opponents against the masses of the Irish people. It contemplates oppression, and it safeguards some persons or other—I cannot imagine who they are—against oppression. And we say that the introduction of such a clause into this Bill is offensive and is an insult, and to the best of our ability we shall oppose and reject it. We object to be branded in this way—to be branded as persons inclined to malversation, and corruption, and oppression—no such clause was introduced into the English or Scotch Bills. We have been told that so long as nothing of this kind was attempted, this clause could have no application, and no harm could be done by its introduction ; but if there is any value or force in that argument, it would apply equally to the introduction of such a clause into the English and Scotch Bills. But there is no such clause in those Bills, and I am perfectly sure that neither the English nor the Scotch people would submit to it. And, moreover, in that way you might justify the most hateful, and useless, and irritating provisions that can possibly be put into legislation of any country. This clause goes upon the ground that we are a people not to be trusted, that we are uncivilised—at all events, not up to the mark of other people—that we are an ill-conditioned, uneducated set of people. I recognise in this clause the hand of Lord Salisbury. I call that the Salisbury Clause of the Local Government Bill. It is in perfect keeping with the speech of the noble Lord—not one, but several speeches. We have been compared to the noble Lord the Prime Minister—Hottentots, to leopards, and to wolves, and I say this : that it is that spirit and that inspiration which I believe to be in this portion of the Local Government Bill. I consider this measure is advised. I think it is not a whole-hearted measure. I think it is a palliative measure. I doubt that the promoters and parents of it have the slightest idea that it will ever pass in the House of Commons ; and regarding it as do, and as I believe the Irish people will regard it, we shall do our best to defeat it and to render it absolutely nugatory. I would say, in conclusion, that I think the system of forcing so-called remedial measures on the Irish people against the will of their Representatives in this House has already proved a failure more than once, and it appears to me that it will be sure to prove a failure again in this instance if it be tried.

*(9.15.) MR. JAMES A. RENTOUL (Down, E.) : I would not have risen to speak in this Debate were it not for the fact that hints have been thrown out from several quarters that a measure of Local Government for Ireland would meet with a certain amount of opposition from hon. Members on this side of the House, and that the First Lord of the Treasury would have very great difficulty in dealing with us. I have not found that any such difficulty is likely to exist. I came in contact with many very large audiences in England, and I have not spoken on any platform whatever on which I did not treat of this question of the Local Government Bill, and I declared that I believed that the Government was about to introduce a Local Government Bill for Ireland as wide, or wider even, than the Local Government Bill for England; and on every occasion the gentlemen on those platforms, so far as I can recollect, applauded that sentiment. Therefore, it appears to me that any hon. Member sitting on this side of the House who allowed me to make a statement in favour of this Bill on his platform is pledged to support this Bill. I mention this as a proof of the fact that I, for one, have not heard of any opposition likely to be given from this side of the House, but that the Bill will receive the cordial and hearty support of all my colleagues around me without exception. And I could hardly imagine it to be otherwise, because the Unionist Members for Ireland are, every one of them, in favour of this Bill, and I could hardly understand that the English Members of Parliament sitting on the same side of the House would turn their backs on a Bill which the Ulster Unionist Members support. I have not spoken with many of the Ulster Members since the First Lord made his speech this evening, but I feel certain they will support this Bill, because I have discussed with nearly every one of them the probable nature of the coming Bill, and this Bill seems likely to be more satisfactory to them than the Bill they thought the First Lord would bring in. That is to say, this Bill contains greater safeguards than we ever expected, and I think we would have been prepared to receive a Bill with less safeguards if it had been introduced. I took the opportunity in the Long Vacation of visiting all the 32 counties of Ireland. I met with members of the Grand Juries of every one of these 32 counties, and I discussed with them the probable provisions of the coming Bill, and I found their views were extremely reasonable, and, with one solitary exception, I did not meet or converse with a single Grand Juror who was not prepared to receive a wide and generous measure of Local Government such as the First Lord of the Treasury has brought in. I think it will be admitted by Irish Members on both sides of the House that it is necessary to have some controlling power over the County Councils. I believe hon. Members opposite would not like to entrust the Orange County Council of Down, for example, with the uncontrolled management of the affairs of the Roman Catholic population; and I think, on the other hand, that the Unionists might be afraid to entrust the Nationalist County Council of Tipperary, for example, with the uncontrolled management of the affairs of their co-religionists in the South. Consequently, I think we must all agree that some sort of power, able to exercise its authority over the Councils in the different counties, would be a right and proper thing. Whether that controlling power should be exactly on the lines the First Lord of the Treasury had sketched might be questioned. There are other methods that could be applied that I think might be equally efficacious and possibly more satisfactory. But I, for one, could not certainly distrust the decision of two Irish Judges who have power to try an election petition, and who are selected not at random, but as having had long experience at the Bar, and as having risen to the top of their profession. I think these men might be trusted to deal fairly with a small matter such as a County Council or a question of Local Government when they are entrusted at present to deal with the honour and honesty of a Member of this House. It is perfectly clear that no County Council would be arraigned before these two Judges unless there was a strong prima facie case made out; and when a County Council is brought before two Judges surely everyone might trust to their justice and sense of right to do that which is right and proper. With reference to the cumulative vote proposal for the protection of the minority, I myself do not think that any reasonable scheme can be invented for the protection of minorities. Take the County Tipperary. I have discussed the question with a number of leading gentlemen there, and all of them were of opinion that no possible safeguard, no sort of franchise, no sort of cumulative voting would possibly bring to Tipperary County Council any but the merest fraction of Unionists.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I did not intend the cumulative vote to give the minorities a larger representation than they are entitled to according to their numbers. All I intended was that it would enable them to be heard in the County Councils in proportion to the number that they bore in the constituencies.

*MR. RENTOUL: I perfectly understood the right hon. Gentleman, but I may mention that, in the County Tipperary, as a leading Grand Juror told me, by no possible system that could be devised could the Tipperary County Council, made up, say, of 30 members altogether, be made to contain more than one or two Unionist members, and I think that these one or two members had better not be there. I say that deliberately. I myself am a member of the largest County Council, and I am unfortunately in a minority, and I know from experience that the minority in the London County Council have absolutely on all burning questions no sort of power whatever. In fact, I think they act as an irritant on the other members; and, possibly, the progressive members of the London County Council would not have gone to the lengths they have gone on certain questions if the minority had not been there. I am of opinion that two or three Unionists in the Tipperary County Council of 30 would be likely to do very little good to themselves or to anybody else. I am distinctly of opinion that in a thoroughly Home Rule county such as Tipperary the Home Rulers in the County Council will have it all their own way; and I think that equally in a county like Antrim, for example, the Unionists will have it all their own way. Therefore, with a few exceptions, in all Ireland—possibly in Tyrone County Council, for instance, where the members may be pretty equally balanced—the County Councils will have an overwhelming majority of members on the one side or the other; and whether it would conduce much to good administration to have a small minority in opposition in a County Council I do not know, but I think they would be just as well absent for all useful and beneficial purposes. If I am right in that surely it is useless to take any whatever to secure the presence small minority in a County Council, and, therefore, I should be inclined to omit that portion of the Bill which deals with the cumulative vote together. But I think it would be necessary and a useful thing to give some Governing Body over the County Council to which an appeal might be made. I had an idea which I expressed to in Belfast not long ago, and I think that no newspaper or shade of politics found any fault with that idea whatever. The idea that, when elected, each County Council might themselves elect one member to a Central Body, which might be the Government Board, and which would be the Governing body of all the County Councils. That idea has been confirmed by a resolution passed by the Ulster Land Committee, a body composed of gentlemen of all shades of politics. I only rose to say one thing, and that was that the expression in the newspapers which we have seen that there was likely to be any widespread support of the First Lord of the Treasury on this side of the House or any coolness towards the either among the Ulster Unionist Members or their constituents, is, in my mind, entirely without foundation.

*(9.30.) MR. J. PINKERTON (in a way): Mr. Speaker, it is rather shocking to hear a Protestant Member from the North of Ireland speaking in the tone of the hon. Member Rentoul.)

MR. RENTOUL: I did not speak at all in any disrespectful tone, or other tone, as to the minority. I simply tried to point out that when a body composed of 30 Members have two or three of a minority holding strongly different views from the others those two or three Members are likely to act as an irritant to the majority.

*MR. PINKERTON: The hon. Gentleman must remember that a leaven is likely to leaven the whole lump. Possibly, a minority may influence to a very great extent the views of the majority. So far as my experience goes, in every part of the land the Protestants are treated exceptional kindness by the Catholics. It is only when you go north of the Boyne, and reach the City of Belfast, that you find intolerance displayed by law-abiding pillars of the Constitution. I am more opposed to the proposal of the seven Grand Jurors and the Sheriff than I am to that of the two Judges. In fact, all the business of every county is to be handed over to the seven Grand Jurors, giving a casting vote to the High Sheriff. Every hon. Member in this House must know the difference between the Scottish Sheriff and the High Sheriff in Ireland. The High Sheriffs in Ireland are selected by the Lord Lieutenant not for their ability, but owing to the fact that they can maintain and support a certain amount of pomp and circumstance to receive the Judge in a proper manner. If it is necessary to have some safeguard in Ireland, let us have a Central Council elected from all the County Councils in Ireland as a Court of Appeal. I fail to see why this matter should be left to the decision of the Grand Jurors or the Judges. In fact if you are to try the elective principle in the baronies, it should hold good in the counties and with regard to County Councils. I had no intention of interposing in this Debate, but as a Protestant from the north of Ireland said that the minority was of no account—

MR. RENTOUL: I never said anything of the kind in my life. I simply said I think a minority on a council would be of no value.

*MR. PINKERTON: I am afraid that this explanation will not go down in the county of Down. (Laughter.) The electors of the county of Down hold a very different opinion. They regard themselves as a very important minority in Ireland. They regard the county Down as not only the most important county in Ireland, but as the top of creation. The Protestant minority in Down, in Antrim, and in the North of Ireland is certain to exercise a salutary influence in the interests of Ireland. I utter a most indignant protest against a so-called Orange Representative expressing such views to this House.

*(9.37.) MR. WEBB (Waterford, E.): Mr. Speaker: It must have been thought, I think, that during all the long years of the past, during all the Coercion Acts, we were yet to hope for something quite different from the proposals of the Government. But now when we see them we find we are descending to a deeper depth than ever. I would like English Members, Liberal Members, to attentively regard the situation. The First Lord of the Treasury dwelt very strongly on the great chasms existing in Ireland. Why do these chasms exist? They exist purely and solely not in the nature of the people, but in the system by which you seek to govern Ireland. One party has been taught to live independent of the other. Public opinion has been scorned. If any party in any country is kept in rights which do not belong to it, or given property which it should not possess, so surely will chasms exist. Just in proportion as the working classes here have obtained power, just as their strength as trade unionists has increased, so classes here have been drawn together. I believe it will be so in Ireland. There is no real influence, I believe, so great as the healing influence of enjoying equal privileges. Now, I think you must either trust us wholly or not at all. Past oppression has formed a great wrong to Ireland, and it is quite right that now we should get a better chance of equality. Suppose the majority in Ireland were to act in a wrong or dishonest manner. You have had sufficient power in the past to deal with them. I quite admit that in the course of the readjustment of matters in the last two years things have not always gone so smoothly as they might have gone. We could not have expected otherwise. Irishmen are just as good as you are, and just as honest as you are, and I do not know why we should have any less liberty than you have. There was one vein of truth in the remark of the First Lord of the Treasury which I think should be noted. A great many people think that because resolutions might, under Home Rule, be passed against the power of England, that power might pass away. I think we have an admission in the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury that such a supposition is groundless. Resolutions will have no effect whatever. I do not think we would be fit to enjoy British liberty if we did not object, in the strongest possible manner, against the passing of this Bill.

*(9.40.) MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I did not intend to intervene in this Debate, but some observations have fallen from the hon. Member who has just sat down which I would like to allude to. I wish to assure the House there is no distrust on the part of the Protestants of the North as to the question of Local Government in Ireland. The Belfast Conservative Association unanimously passed a resolution the other day approving of the scheme for Local Self-Government, and they did this before they had an opportunity of seeing the Bill that has been introduced to-night by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. They did it in the spirit that we in the North of Ireland feel—that it is extremely desirable there should be similarity of law to govern the three countries. (Hear, hear.) It is quite absurd for hon. Members on the other side of the House to talk about the tyranny that is exercised in Ireland over certain classes. The day of ascendancy has long gone by. There is no such thing as Protestant ascendancy in Ireland now. An hon. Member opposite (Mr. Sexton), said the other night that Roman Catholics were perfectly equal to the Protestants in Ireland on the question of education. We do not desire to see the ascendancy of class over class. We desire the most perfect equality, whatever shape the representation of the minority in local government is to take: I am not very careful or anxious to see that carried out. Further, I am not very much in love with this cumulative vote. We, in the North of Ireland, are perfectly able to take care of ourselves. I cannot say I quite agree with my hon. Friend the Member for East Down (Mr. Rentoul) with regard to the treatment of the minority. I do not know whether the effect of a minority may be irritating in the County Council of London. But a certain minority in the City of Derry long ago found it very desirable to enter a protest—an irritating protest against the majority, and ~~t~~ carry their protest even further. I am sure my hon. Friend did not intend to depreciate the efforts of minorities in Ireland to safeguard the rights and liberties. I have to thank the First Lord of the Treasury for introducing this measure. We are perfectly prepared to give a hearty and cordial support to it. I desire to express, on the part of those I represent, that it is in no grudging or hesitating manner that we support the efforts to give to Ireland a measure of Local Self-Government.

(9.44.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Mr. Speaker, upon the question of the action about to be taken by the House at the present time, I unreservedly adopt the idea expressed by the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt). I think it would be a great pity to place the slightest impediment in the way of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury bringing the Bill before the House and the country. There is a great difference of tone between the first and second speeches of the right hon. Gentleman. In his second speech I thought I discovered something like a note of defiance—a note of Dissolution, qualified, probably only by the fear as to whether this Bill was a Bill on which they would dare to go before the country. At any rate, we may assume they regard this as a test of the opinion of the electors and I should be very sorry indeed if any impediment were successfully applied to deny to the House and the country an opportunity of seeing this measure. With that view I shall certainly not oppose the motion, and I should advise my Friend not to put the House to the trouble of a division. I have seen many Bills introduced—some that were irritating, others that were laughable; but never in all my experience have I seen a Bill upon which the brand of incompetence was so deeply set—a Bill which is at the same time contemptible and ridiculous. We can sympathise with the right hon. Gentleman, because the Land Purchase Bill of last year was very largely of his own devising. I think some of the safeguarding provisions in this Bill which the right hon. Gentleman expounded with anything but the zeal of a parent to-night, must have been forced upon him by injudicious advisers ; and if it were not to satisfy the Orange and Conservative body in Ireland that the right hon. Gentleman introduced the cumulative vote, I cannot imagine at whose instance this strange provision was introduced. It has been promised that Ireland should substantially have the same system of Local Self-Government as England, but there is no general principle in the English Local Government Act which is not traversed in this Bill. Irishmen are not to get the control of the police ; they do not obtain the Parliamentary franchise.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Yes, you do.

MR. SEXTON : I mean the cumulative franchise. In England it was one man one vote, but in Ireland they would have scrutin de liste, than which there could be no worse principle for the election of local bodies. By the adoption of that system they would have a Party ticket in each section—Nationalists on the one hand and Conservatives on the other—and none but partisans would be elected. It was upon the promise that Ireland was to have such a Local Government Bill as England received that the Conservatives obtained power ; but did any man of any school of politics pretend that this Bill would satisfy the desire of Irishmen for Home Rule ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Hear, hear !

MR. SEXTON : What good will be served by the cumulative vote ? It did not exist in England or Scotland. Why is this inequality—this cumbrous, perplexing provision—imposed in the case of Ireland ? The right hon. Gentleman has said that the barony will be the unit of election.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : That is rather a difficult question. The barony is the unit for baronial elections, but for the county elections the units are certain electoral areas, which will be announced at the later stages of the Bill, but which are not coincident with the baronies.

MR. SEXTON : The county, then, is not the unit ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : No.

MR. SEXTON : I submit that in Ulster the cumulative vote will have no other effect than that which would follow the Parliamentary vote. Outside Ulster, no doubt, in certain counties, the adoption of the scrutin de liste system might give the minority a hearing ; but if the counties are divided into electoral areas the system will not give the minority a hearing, and therefore the minority will be injured by the cumulative vote. As regards the Standing Committees, it is absurd that, in respect to capital expenditure and new charges, they and not the County Council will have control. The Standing Committee is to be composed of 15 men, of whom seven are to be nominated by the Council and seven by the Grand Jury, with the Sheriff as the Chairman. Now, the Sheriff is to be nominated by the Lord Lieutenant ; and therefore the Sheriff and seven of his men will go from the Grand Jury room to the County Council room, and the eight will outvote the seven who represent the electors with respect to every new expenditure or capital charge. Now, Sir, I should like to say a word with regard to the question of the trial before two Judges. Positively at the end of the nineteenth century, with our advanced views of popular representation, it is seriously proposed that—for example, in a county like Cork—any 20, any gang of ill-conditioned, ill-tempered evicting landlords can form a conspiracy and hale before a Judge the elected representatives of the County of Cork. And upon what pretence ? They need not be at a loss for a pretext ; the right hon. Gentleman has given them a perfect rosary of them. They can charge a County Council with disobedience to the law, with corruption, or malversation, or oppression. Possibly a Judge of Assize may be bound in regard to the terms "corruption or malversation" ; but in regard to the term "oppression," a very large and high-coloured term, I can easily imagine a case where a learned Judge—and there are many learned Judges in Ireland—having a group of Unionist malcontents or a gang of evicting landlords before him, and having on the other side a County Council as unpopular with the Unionist classes as the London County Council. In such a case, and on such a charge as that of oppression, I can imagine what chance of escape the County Council would have. Does the First Lord of the Treasury think it is any answer to our objection that the County Council would be found "Not guilty?" Does he ignore our claims to equality in respect of our common manhood? In England and Scotland you start your schemes of Local Government upon the assumption that the men elected for public life will be honourable and honest; but in Ireland you start with the assumption that they will not be honest men, and that you must make them amenable to the public and the criminal tribunals. That is not reasonable. It is not fair. It is insulting to our people. The county cess in Ireland is paid by the occupier. The fraction which the landlords pay is infinitesimally small, and how can the House believe that the Irish people would encourage corruption or malversation in respect of those moneys which they contribute? In this matter you should leave the elected Representatives to their constituents; and if they act extravagantly or corruptly, they will go back to receive the judgment of their constituents. For my part, I can say that I will resist, and that I believe my friends will resist, to the very utmost of our power, all schemes to put our country under a disability which is founded on nothing else than your morbid, your eternal suspicion of everything that concerns Ireland, and your delusion that there is something superior about yourselves that requires your constant control, guidance, and checking influence to keep us from robbing ourselves. The drawing up of this Bill—if the time of the Government is of any value, which is somewhat doubtful—is a waste of their time, and it is certainly a waste of the time of the House to discuss such a measure.

Mr. Sexton

*(10.10.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): The fact, Sir, that the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast advise, the House not to divide upon the Motion for the introduction of this Bill shows that we have got into calmer waters than was the case in the earlier part of the evening. I only interpose for a few minutes in order to express my views upon the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury and upon the remarks of the hon. Gentleman the Member for West Belfast, who complained of the non-fulfilment of a promise made by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington when he was the Leader of this House, that in the matter of Local Government there should be similarity, simultaneity, and equality of treatment as between Ireland and the Sister Countries. As to simultaneity, the exigencies of time always made that impossible; and I have always thought the promise of equality was like the suggestion of one and the same pill for all diseases. The first fact of this Bill is that it effects a transfer of administrative functions from the Grand Juries in Ireland to the proposed County Councils; and on this head the hon. Member for West Belfast complains that the Bill is in no sense parallel with the English Act, because nothing is said about the police. But the hon. Gentleman must be aware that the Quarter Sessions in England had control of the police before ever the English Act was passed. The Grand Juries have never had control of the police in Ireland, and there could not be a transfer of that which they had not. Sir, I pass that entirely by. The real and serious objection that has been raised is as to the want of fulness in not transferring the power of Grand Juries to award compensation for malicious injuries. The hon. and learned Member for Longford dwelt very forcibly on the manner in which that power is at present exercised; and the possibility of its abuse is manifest; but the argument is a bad argument for a transfer to the County Councils, and I should have thought that the moral was that it was improper to entrust judicial functions of that character to a multitudinous Public Body. It has been suggested that the power should be handed over to the County Court Judge, and all I would wish to say upon it is this: that the power is a most dangerous one, and one that has no doubt been abused by Grand Juries. Therefore you must deal with it in an independent way, and not entrust it to another multitudinous body, for that would only be to transfer and perpetuate the abuse. If we look to County Councils nearer home, in the exercise of such quasi-judicial functions as that of licensing, we see the extreme inconvenience of placing such functions in the hands of a multitudinous body. Such functions should, in my view, be entrusted to some limited body, who should be put upon their responsibility in the exercise of the power given them. Passing from the transfer of functions, there comes the question of the persons who are to exercise the franchise, and here, with one exception, there is no ground of complaint. The one exception is, of course, the disallowance of the facilities granted to illiterate voters. The common master of my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle and of myself—namely, John Stuart Mill—has laid it down that an educational qualification might be rightly insisted upon, and, in point of fact, it has been, and I believe is, insisted upon, in more than one of our Australian Colonies. Now, Sir, as regards another point—namely, the alteration in the mode of voting—the hon. Member for West Belfast said that instead of allaying, the alteration will promote, Party strife. I believe it will have just the opposite consequences, and that this method of election, which I have always advocated, will tend to dissipate and destroy Party strife. Let me point out that the system of one man one vote does not, at all events, destroy combination. Look at the London County Council, which has been conducted on the principle of one man one vote. Will you get rid of Party in the approaching contests for the election of members of that body? I read, this morning or yesterday, in the newspapers, a letter of some power written by the noble Lord the Member for Barnsley (Earl Compton), in which he said he regretted that under the system of one man one vote, by which the London County Council was elected, a fatal obstacle was interposed to the running of independent men who would exercise a restraining influence upon extreme partisans. It is strange that those of us who desire to diminish Party organisation and Party method should advocate a mode of election which, according to the hon. Member for West Belfast, would increase them more. If you compare the results of the elections for the London School Boards with those of the London County Council, you will see that the London School Board, whatever may be its faults, at least contains an independent section which moderates the hostility of extreme Parties, and balances the one side against the other. That is what I understand the hon. Member for West Belfast to desire to attain in Ireland.

MR. SEXTON: Under the Bill, as it was described, no candidate would get his name upon a Party ticket except upon the ground of his being a politician.

*MR. COURTNEY: The hon. Member speaks of scrutin de liste, but scrutin de liste differs entirely from the cumulative vote, under which electors may be allowed to choose between one man and another, as well as between one ticket and another. It is clear that the hon. Member does not appreciate the scheme of election. He said that in Ulster you get the Parties equally divided, but it is not the case that in the different counties of Ulster Parties are equally divided. Is it the case that in other districts of Ireland the Parties are equally divided. What is the case with the present mode of election in the City of Belfast? Although you have got a popular franchise in Belfast, the result is that in the Town Council you find men all of one way of thinking.

MR. SEXTON: Because it is 40 years since the city was divided into wards.

*MR. COURTNEY: Still, it shows that the system of election by districts does not secure the representation of all Parties, and that the plan proposed would not result in the dangers feared. It is perhaps very presumptuous for a mere Englishman to stand up for this system in Ireland when the hon. Member for Belfast and others object to it; but there is some reason, even with that concurrent condemnation, which makes me think the plan may be useful. It would secure in the north-eastern counties a Nationalist representation, and it will secure in the south-western counties the election of some Protestant representatives. The proposed method would certainly secure in the County Councils of Down and Antrim a representation of the Nationalists, whilst in Cavan and Monaghan it would secure the election of some Protestants. Look at Sligo, which the hon. Gentleman once represented.

MR. SEXTON: Sligo is an exceptional county.

*MR. COURTNEY: It is very unfortunate that I can quote nothing but exceptional cases. But the hon. Gentleman does not appear to understand the operation and the force of the systems which even in Cork or Kerry would give representation to 1-14th or 1-15th of the electorate. Is it to be said that even in Cork or Kerry you cannot get 1-15th or 1-16th who belong to the other side? It is further to be remembered that minorities always develop when they have the means of growth, and you would find under this plan interests spring up where their existence was not at all suspected. The power to state the cases of the minority is all that is sought for. The fact that it is not the best method of securing this result is admitted by the First Lord of the Treasury himself. Incidentally the First Lord used a phrase, perhaps a little hastily chosen, by which he meant less good or less worthy. That reminds me, although it is quite irrelevant, that I should like to correct a misquotation of John Stuart Mill. Mr. Mill spoke not of the "stupid party" but of the "more stupid party." The plan proposed is one which those who have the well-being of Ireland at heart think a useful one. This method will not only secure the representation of a minority, which, however feeble, would be useful, but it secures the representation of the different sections of the majority. I often say to those friends with whom I act, more or less, that they mass together men who have many differences among themselves. There are different shades of Nationalists. There are some who would not accept anything less than the independence of Ireland — an Irish Republic. There are other Nationalists so moderate that they would be apparently content with the passing of something which would enable them to deal with the supply of gas and water. This scheme not only secures the representation of the Unionist Party, assuming them to be in the minority, but the different shades of opinion of the Nationalist Party. You might try to exclude these Nationalists whom you do not like, but you would find it impossible; and you would find every shade of the Nationalist Party represented—those who are more attached, those who are less attached to their clerical principles and clerical friends; those who are more keenly interested in agriculture; those who are more keenly interested in commerce; those, possibly, who, like the Member for Cork, are temperance partisans above all things; and those who, like the Member for the county of Cork, scout all teetotalers. Now, I do not suppose anybody will deny that the misery of Ireland is to be found in the strictly antagonistic nature of the relations between the different classes of Ireland. It will be allowed by those hon. Members who sit below the Gangway, as well by hon. Members on the other side, that it is a pity that the various classes should be so ignorant of one another, and I am afraid to say even hate one another. I do not say there is no justification for the feeling on the one side, or no explanation of the feeling on the other; but that is the nature of the Irish problem, and surely it will be something towards a solution if you could invent a method which should bring together, in the consideration, discussion, and discharge of local functions, representatives of all classes within the counties. The mere fact that we bring together into this House representatives of the two Parties in Ireland makes those Parties better understand each other ; and if in a year or two after, they leave this House, better understanding some of the conditions of the problem which they may not so fully have understood when they entered it, so I anticipate for the representatives of the different classes on the County Councils a better understanding of each other and of the problems with which they have to deal. Just as in the case of Members of this House there takes place a gradual transformation of view, an alteration of attitude, a relaxation from the painful tension that sometimes prevails while in the House, so would it be in the new gatherings of representatives of the different classes in the county. If they could associate together in the discharge of Irish local affairs, the people who are admitted to be so diverse at present, so strongly at daggers drawn, something would be done to draw them more towards each other to a better understanding, and, such is human nature, that I indulge the hope that you would bring them even to like one another. We are going through that experience in some of the English counties even now. We have in England the classes who have been called the privileged classes, and we have the unprivileged classes ; and we have brought them together in the County Parliaments. I have never looked on these County Parliaments as things that were likely to do very much in the way of economy, of which I should like to see more ; but I have always advocated them as breaking down the lines of demarcation between classes in England ; and making the classes know one another better. I am glad to see that process going on ; and I look to this system, in whatever form it is embodied, as a method of making the future of Ireland more hopeful, because it will make the people of Ireland understand the virtues as well as the faults of one another better than they do. Well, there is only one other point to which I would refer. It is the proposal to arraign a County Council before the Judges. I understand the

Mr. Courtney

First Lord of the Treasury to refer to that as a power which would not be likely to be exercised. I think he almost hinted that it would never occur, that he did not anticipate it—

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Hear, hear.

*MR. COURTNEY : I know that he did not anticipate the condition under which it would be necessary to call that power into operation, and I should suspect that the introduction of that provision was due rather to a desire to allay the anxieties which we know to exist—anxieties which are generally overstrained regarding the fear that the power of the majority might be abused. My own impression is that possibly that proposal will reach its fate in an intimation on the part of the Judges themselves that they do not like to accept such functions. (Hear, hear !) My right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) says "hear, hear." He is entirely entitled to cry "hear, hear;" but the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), who sits by him, knows that he and I were in the position of having been Members of a Government which introduced a Bill which threw on Judges duties which they would not exercise, and that Act was in that respect a dead letter in consequence. If this proposal meets with the same fate, I confess I, for my part, shall not be the least sorry, and an intimation may well come beforehand, which may induce the Government not to persevere with it, because the Judges would not desire to have those functions imposed upon them. I would point out, also, that the true method, as it seems to me, of keeping a County Council in order is already to be found in the powers which the Courts of Law possess. If a County Council proceeds to act ultra vires, you can restrain their action ; you can nullify what they have determined to do. If they are not acting ultra vires, then the proper remedy is to be found in the action of the electorate. But if you strictly define in your Bill what their powers are to be, then the abuse of their powers is limited ; they cannot go beyond them. The moment they go into what they are not by the Act authorised to do, they are subject to the jurisdiction of the Law Courts, and their action can be brought to nought by the ordinary processes which the Law Courts have opened to all. I have said more than I intended to have said when I got up; but before I sit down, I would also remind the House of the particularly sagacious principle my friend Mr. Fawcett often laid down among those who knew him—

"Never speak on the First Reading of a Bill; never condemn or praise strongly on the First Reading of a Bill; you never may know precisely what its real purport is; and you certainly never know what it will become."

I think that very judicious counsel, and older Members in this House are generally in the habit of receiving Bills with only some moderate inquiry, without flying into declarations that the thing is not to be entertained or listened to. I remember how the Land Bill of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Balfour) was received by my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Gladstone) when it was first brought in. My right hon. Friend made a very moderate speech on that occasion, and, acting on his advice, the House allowed it to be read a first time before 7 o'clock. He is an old Parliamentary hand—(laughter)—and I think it was a very judicious course to pursue. I apologise to the House not only for having occupied it so long, but also for having broken that example to which I have referred.

*(10.40.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): Although this Bill has only been under discussion for a few hours, and is not yet printed, I venture to think that we have had marked indications not from the Opposition, but from the supporters of the Government, of what the Bill is likely to become. It is perfectly obvious, from the right hon. Member for Bodmin, as well as the hon. Members for Down and Belfast, that we are likely to have in this Bill two Jonah clauses. The hon. Members for Down and Belfast joined in the denunciation of cumulative voting; and the right hon. Member for Bodmin anticipated that when the Judges were asked to undertake the powers which this Bill seeks to confer on them, they will respectfully decline to undertake them. That does not look as if the prospects of the Bill are very favourable, and the tone and spirit in which it was brought forward do not look very hopeful. It is also doubtful to whom to ascribe the paternity of the Bill, as the First Lord of the Treasury did not seem very fond of the child he has taken charge of. The hon. Member for West Birmingham and the two hon. Gentlemen representing Ulster disclaimed any knowledge of the contents of the Bill. The right hon. Member for Bodmin has been, and is now, a consistent advocate of proportional representation, but I was not aware that he was prepared to support the precise system in vogue at School Board elections, and which the Government intend to apply to Irish County Council elections. There is a positive confusion of areas created by the Bill, as well as the very complex system of election which, in the only instance in which it has been tried in practice, has been found cumbrous and inoperative to some extent. The right hon. Gentleman admits that in this Bill he has introduced an altogether novel principle, and hon. Members have tried to quote precedents in support of the submission, and in certain cases the suppression, of the County Councils by the judicial authority, but none of them bear on the precise proposal of the Government. The position is this: Into this Bill, which professes to deal with Ireland more or less on the same terms as England, you have introduced a principle which you have not sought to embody in the English or Scotch Acts, and you introduce it in a form which affixes a severe stigma on the majority of the people of Ireland, and lays them open to suspicions of the gravest nature. That is not the way you would expect a Bill of this sort to be brought in, and I do not think there is a great chance of such a proposal being carried even if the Government intend to press the Bill forward, though from the tone of the First Lord of the Treasury it did not appear that their intentions are very serious. Consideration of the nature of the proposals made by the Bill, and the insults which, by implication, it makes against the people of Ireland would strongly lead me to join my friends in taking a Division against it, but I am influenced on the other side by two reasons: One, suggested by the hon. Member for Derby, that if the vote against the Bill were successful it would not be printed, and people would have no chance of knowing the exact nature of its provisions, and it is desirable that candidates for County Councils in England should have an opportunity of expressing an opinion as to their position and feelings if a provision were introduced in England to subject the County Council of, say London, to the jurisdiction of two Judges, who would have power to suppress it, it being competent for the Lord Lieutenant of the county to fill the vacancies. The proposal would appeal with irresistible force to the hearer's sense of the ludicrous. The other reason which influences me in not voting against the Bill is that, great as are its imperfections, and ludicrous and absurd as are some of its provisions, by this Bill you admit that it is possible to frame safeguards which, in your opinion, will be sufficient to protect the minority. It is perfectly obvious that if that can be done in regard to County Councils it can be done in regard to a Legislature sitting in Dublin. In some cases the Councils would be sitting in remote places where public opinion would have comparatively little force, but the Legislature sitting at Dublin would be sitting in the full light of public opinion and criticism. Therefore, however absurd the provisions of the Bill, in it the Government have taken a step in advance from which it is impossible to recede, an important step in advance in regard to the self-government of Ireland.

(10.50.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): There has been one good point in the Debate; it has produced an excellent lecture on proportional representation by the right hon. Gentleman. I am not strongly in favour of cumulative voting, but I think there is much in favour of the argument of the right hon. Gentleman, and I believe there is scarcely a county in Ireland in which the minority would not get one representative out of 15, though if Members in England are so fond of it they should try it at some of the English County Council elections. There is one good point in the Bill, the electorate, which is practically household suffrage with women thrown in. I have no objection to the introduction of Peers, as I do not think they would much affect the result of the elections. There was one point on which the First Lord of the Treasury was not so lucid as on the other points. I understood that illiterate voters were not to be allowed to vote at all; but the hon. Member for South Tyrone declared that he was of a wholly different opinion, and that the proposal was that they should not receive peculiar assistance in voting. Was the hon. Member correct?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is so.

COLONEL NOLAN: I have no objection; but if they had been disfranchised altogether, it would have been a terrible injustice. The Bill itself is altogether overweighted. I do not say it cannot possibly pass, and the English and Scotch votes; may bear down the Irish votes, but it never can be received in Ireland, because the transference of power is not sufficient, and, on the other hand, the cost of the new system will be greater than that of the present system. The Grand Jury system is about the worst you can have, but, on the whole, it is economical. They give appointments to their own friends; but so would the new County Councils. You will have, however, the cost of holding these elections, and the Councils will be more inclined to spend money in different districts in order to provide work. The transference of the sanitary business will also lead to expense. Under the Guardians the Medical Officer of Health and the Sanitary Officer held dual appointments, and were consequently less expensive, as they were paid less for each post than if they held only one. I think the people would like County Councils in Ireland; but they would like them to have a certain amount of power. They know they will not get better roads and bridges, and it is not sufficient attraction that future appointments of officials will be in their hands instead of in the hands of the Grand Jury. The right hon. Gentleman has so filled the Bill with checks and safeguards that he has left no power to County Councils; the only power he has left them is power over the roads and bridges. The Bill brought in for land purchase in Ireland last year was also surrounded with checks and safeguards, and it has proved a failure. Under the right hon. Gentleman's measure really no transfer of power takes place. It will, at the same time, be more expensive, and I believe the people of Ireland will be united in the determination to wait for something better. I should be glad to adopt County Councils. I think County Councils must come. I brought in a Bill 15 or 16 years ago exactly on the same principle, and I am glad to see that the principle is now acknowledged. When I heard the proposal to give to two Judges the power to try County Councils I gave up the Bill altogether. The introduction of it is too utterly absurd, and cannot be listened to. I could not attempt to discuss the Bill from that point of view. If it is printed in the Bill it will be struck out at the earliest possible moment. I do not think the Bill will be accepted in Ireland, for it will not be an economic measure, and, therefore, I believe the best thing we can do is to put it off; for it will not pass this Session until we get a Home Rule Parliament, which will delegate certain portions of its powers to the County Councils.

(11.5.) MR. R. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): The thing struck me with surprise during the lecture of the right hon. Member for Liskeard, upon his favourite hobby of proportional representation, that he had not provided himself with a black board and a letter chalk. The right hon. Gentleman has ridden his hobby to such a length that I am inclined to say it is just now almost broken-winded. As to that portion of it in which the right hon. Gentleman referred to the visit to Donegal, I can only conclude that the Member for Bodmin must have fallen in amongst some of Cook's tourists. A most remarkable illustration was his reference to the Australian Colonies. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman does not wish to compare the Irish to the Sandwich Islanders and the Chinese; but I think the illustration was singularly infelicitous. I listened very carefully to the First Lord of the Treasury when he was introducing this measure. I hope, chiefly from the position I occupy, and from the fact that I am divorced from either Party in this House, that we shall see a more democratic cast of Bill introduced. I listened very carefully for anything that might seem like a ray of hope; and although I belong to those who give more attention and consideration to English than to Irish problems, I must say the Bill is so defective that you have turned me into as strong and severe an opponent of it as are the Irish Members themselves. I can imagine the feelings of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne when he was apostrophised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham upon democratic principles. He is, we know, opposed to every democratic measure, is an advocate of nationalisation, a strong advocate of Monarchy and for Royal grants, and will be, until pressure is introduced in Newcastle-on-Tyne to change his opinions. I can imagine his feelings when the expressions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham came home to him. It has been said that by the establishing of these County Councils you would gradually do away with class hatred, and soften down the lines of demarcation between the classes in the country. I believe that the introduction of these elective representatives of the different classes in this country will do more to increase class hatreds, and I would ask in which of the County Councils in England have these class hatreds been allayed? Only through class warfare are real reforms accomplished, and I say that prophecy of the right hon. Gentleman in this regard is as illusory as the hopes he raises in reference to proportional representation. If by means of these County Councils class hatreds would be modified in Ireland, surely the same argument would apply much more strongly to a Home Rule Parliament. I am not here for the purpose of moderating class hatred, but rather for the sake of exciting it. It seems likely that not only in Ireland, but in England and Scotland, this Bill will communicate a good deal more passion than the First Lord of the Treasury appears to have anticipated. Though I look with considerable distrust upon the case coming from the Front Opposition Benches, still, after what I have heard from the First Lord of the Treasury, and after having tried to discover any democratic feeling whatever, or any concession to the rising democratic feeling in the country, I am bound to assure the right hon. Gentleman that, so far as I am concerned, I will also have to offer my hearty opposition to this measure.

(11.17.) MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I believe that the measure now before the House and offered by the First Lord of the Treasury to Ireland will be regarded by the vast majority of the Irish people as about the most studied insult of all the long insults that have been levelled at our people, and which have distinguished the right hon. Gentleman's tenure of office since he unfortunately became connected with the affairs of our country. The Bill of the First Lord may be regarded as a sort of death-bed repentance on the part of the Government. For the last six years the right hon. Gentleman and his friends have been engaged in coercing, insulting, and trampling upon the Irish people in every possible direction; and now when they know that they are at the end of their term of office, and when they know that they must appeal to the country, they make a futile attempt to change their policy, because they are afraid to go and appeal to the electors of Great Britain upon a policy of coercion only for the people of Ireland. I am bound to say that if the Government now in power, or any other Government, had offered a legitimate and genuine measure of Local Government for Ireland, I would not have seen any reason why that measure should not have been accepted for the purpose of strengthening the demand of the Irish people for a native Legislature. But the measure offered by the right hon. Gentleman and his friends is not on the same lines as the measure given to Scotland and England; and I say it is absolutely insulting to the Irish people to ask them to accept even in a matter of Local Government something less than you have given to the Scotch and English people. If you are not able to trust the Irish people to conduct themselves as a civilised people, why do you go through the mockery of giving Local Government, pretending to give them Local Government at all? I say it is an absurd thing to endeavour to coerce the people with one hand and to give them Local Government with the other. If they are entitled to Local Government they ought not to be coerced; and if you are going to coerce them it is simply a piece of absurd inconsistency to imagine you can do any good by giving Local Government to them. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of safeguards which he proposed to introduce in the Bill for the purpose of protecting minorities in Ireland. I say it is an unreasonable thing to suppose for a moment that there is any disposition on the part of the majority of the Irish people to oppress the minority of their fellow-countrymen. I say there is no ground whatever for any such assumption. In this House Catholic constituencies have got Protestant Representatives, and Protestant constituencies have got Catholic Representatives; and I say that if County Councils were set up in Ireland in all cases where there was a Protestant, or what is called a loyalist, minority they would have a full and fair representation, such as their numbers entitled them to have; and, therefore, the safeguards of the right hon. Gentleman are absurd in the very last degree. With regard to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman to give the Judges the power of controlling the County Councils, I can only say that it is on a par with all the other proposals of the right hon. Gentleman in connection with Ireland. My own personal opinion is that if the provision with regard to the Judges in this Bill becomes law that you will find it extremely difficult to get even as many as half-a-dozen men in Ireland willing to become County Councillors, holding themselves liable to be put in the dock at any moment, and put in prison by partisan Judges appointed by Dublin Castle. The right hon. Gentleman has never yet taken my advice; but if the right hon. Gentleman will take my advice on this occasion, he will find that my advice will save him a very great deal of useless trouble and labour. My advice to him is not to have this Bill printed at all, not to go a single step further with it; but if he has it in manuscript to send for the very largest waste paper basket in the House, and have it deposited there and sent away, and let us hear nothing more about it. If the right hon. Gentleman perseveres with this Bill he will find the strongest possible opposition from every section of the Irish Representatives. Out of 103 Members representing Ireland, can he count half-a-dozen who are cordially in favour of this Bill? It is a notorious fact in Ireland that the Conservatives in Ireland have no desire whatever for this Bill. I, for my part, do not believe that any measure of Local Government, whether this measure, which is a sham, or any other measure of Local Government, will have the effect anticipated apparently in some quarters of quieting and settling the Irish people down. I do not see any use in disquising the fact. My opinion is—and I believe it is the opinion of many Members of this House, I know it is the opinion of Members from Ireland—that if you do set up County Councils in Ireland with the view of satisfying the Irish people you will very soon find out that we will use these County Councils for the purpose of strengthening our political position, and for the purpose of gaining increased political power to press forward our demand for national self-government. We do not want any mockeries or any shams, either local or National, in Ireland; and the right hon. Gentleman would be well advised, as I said before, if he dropped the Bill at once. He would save the House a great deal of trouble, and himself and his Government a great deal of humiliation, which undoubtedly will overtake them if he presses this measure forward against the will of the people of Ireland. With regard to the North of Ireland, I do not believe there is any particular desire, even among the Conservatives of the North of Ireland, for a Bill of this kind. The constituency which I represent at the present time is a constituency in which there are very many thousands of voters who are Conservative and Protestant; and I believe that even these voters have put forward no demand for a Bill of this kind, and they do not desire the Government to go on with this measure; and, under these circumstances, I think the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury ought really to say whether the Government having made a mistake will re-consider their position. Unless we get some assurance to-night that this Bill will be dropped, unless we get some more satisfactory statement than that of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, this Debate will go on until tomorrow, and possibly until next week. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord has spoken twice on this subject; but it is not too much to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say whether the Government now, after to-night's Debate, are in exactly the same position with regard to this measure as they were when the First Lord introduced it this afternoon. If the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland has not spoken, I think I may appeal to him with confidence to say whether I am not right in declaring that there is really no desire in Ireland for this Bill. He knows perfectly well that I am within the truth in saying there is no demand for it amongst the Nationalists of Ireland; and if that be so, if Ireland rejects and repudiates the Bill, surely it is not unreasonable to ask that you should drop the measure, or that if you persist in going on with it you leclare to-night, before the House goes any further, whether you propose to modify it in any degree or think it would facilitate matters. The hon. Gentleman the First Minister distinctly stated what is his view in regard to the large body of voters. I certainly understand him to say that the illiterate should be excluded from voting members of the County Council. It cannot be assumed that a man of common sense and intelligence who happens to be unable to write. In our country, as in others, there are large numbers who are illiterate and yet are capable of exercising the franchise, as much entitled to exercise the franchise as the hon. Member for South Croydon or any of the distinguished men whom I see opposite. I do not think the hon. Member (Mr. John Redmond) is in wishing to exclude voters, for many of his friends would be excluded.

JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): If the Member will pardon me for troubling him, what I complain of is, that there should be some who say they are illiterate and yet can read and

REDMOND: I, for one, am opposed to the exclusion of voters, for I say some of intelligent people are illiterate. The simple reason that in your Government made the mistake of our poorer classes almost illiterate. I do not know any one more irritating to an Irishman than to hear sneers and jeers at the proposal for being illiterate, know-how, that illiteracy is simply difficulties put in the way of the people, though education was carried on in spite of these difficulties. I am opposed to the Bill. I think we have a clear statement from a Member of the Government whether we have had this evening any altered their intentions to the Bill. It concerns us to know this, for if the Government intend going on with the Bill as it is we shall have to make arrangements for offering every opposition to it. Let the Chancellor of the Exchequer tell us if the Government really intend to proceed with the Bill, and if so, when he proposes to take the Second Reading. Let him tell us if the Government have any disposition to make modifications in the proposals. The Attorney-General for Ireland has not addressed the House yet; let him, if he can, contradict me when I say that among the Conservatives in Ireland there is no desire for this Bill, while it is repudiated by the Nationalists. Will it, then, be pressed forward? Unless we have some intimation of what the Government propose to do, this Debate will probably be continued into next week.

(11.45.) Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Balfour, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Ritchie, and Mr. Attorney-General for Ireland.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 174.]

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Will the right hon. Gentlemen say when the Bill will be circulated?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope early next week.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

---

MILBANK PRISON BILL—(No. 140.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(11.48.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST, Chat-ham): I do not think there will be any opposition to this Bill, the object of which is to vest the site of Millbank Prison in the Commissioners of Works. Millbank Prison was built in the last century, and the land has been held by the Crown for the purposes of a prison, and now that it has been determined that the prison is no longer required, the Crown has no power to part with it without the authority of Parliament. As all other Crown lands are under the control of the Commissioners of Works, we proceed by the simple expedient of vesting this also in the Commissioners. The Bill is a very short one, and needs, I think, no further explanation. Under the "Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1885," it is provided that such sites may be sold to the Metropolitan Board of Works—the then authority in such matters—for the housing of the working classes. That provision is still unrepealed, and therefore the Crown is still under the moral obligation to let the County Council have the refusal of the site at a fair market price.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir John Gorst.)

(11.53.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I am not going to oppose the Second Reading of this Bill, but as it will be in the recollection of the House that I took an active part in opposition to a proposal for dealing with another prison site, I should like it to be clearly understood that in talking of a fair market price to be given for the land for the purpose of erecting houses for the working classes, there is no idea of proceeding in the manner adopted with the Coldbath Prison site—the ridiculous plan of asking so much per prison cell for the site now used for Post Office purposes. I shall be glad to know that nothing of the kind will prevent the land being used for housing the working classes.

(11.54.) SIR JOHN GORST: This Bill, if passed into law, will not in any way hamper the Government in offering the site to the County Council. The land will be sold in the ordinary way at so much per acre, the only provision is for a fair market price by which it is intended that the country in general should not be made to pay for improvements in the Metropolis. The taxpayers of the whole of the United Kingdom have an interest in this, and hence it is that the County Council of London, should the Council desire to acquire the land, must do so at a fair market price.

Sir John Gorst

(11.55.) MR. W. REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I do not know whether the Government are anxious to have the Bill passed to-night, but if there is no hurry, I think it would not be unreasonable to ask that it should be postponed until it can be taken at an earlier hour than this.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): The site at the present time is entirely unused. The Bill may be for the benefit of the working classes of London, and I must say I think it ill becomes an Irish Member to offer opposition to it.

(11.56.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I would appeal to the hon. Member to allow the Second Reading of the Bill now, in order that the County Council may have the matter to deal with without delay.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday.

INDUSTRIAL AND PROVIDENT SOCIETIES (LEASEHOLD ENFRANCHISEMENT) BILL.—(No. 114.)
SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(11.57.) MR. SEALE - HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton) : It is obvious that at this late hour I cannot go into full explanation of the provisions of this Bill. It is a Bill in which Industrial and Co-operative Societies take the greatest possible interest, and it is founded on the unanimous recommendation of the Town Holdings Committee. It proposes to give power for the enfranchisement of leaseholders in accordance with the Report of the Committee, and I sincerely trust that inasmuch as the Bill is supported by hon. Members on both sides of the House, and arouses no party question the House will now permit the Bill to be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Seale-Hayne.)

(11.59.) MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow) : The Bill, the Second Reading of which the hon. and learned Gentleman has just proposed, involves a very important principle. The question of giving to industrial and provident societies facilities for acquiring the property they hold, or lease, is one thing, and I am quite prepared to do anything to assist the development of these societies, provided always—

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Tuesday next.

SALMON FISHERIES (IRELAND) ACTS

AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 112.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.0.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): This Bill passed a Second Reading unanimously last year, though afterwards its progress was interrupted by hon. Members who represented the views of some owners of Irish fisheries who believed their interests were threatened. I have communicated with my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helen's (Mr. Seton-Karr), and he on the part of fishery owners has consented to the Second Reading, provided that the Bill is afterwards referred to a Select Committee. I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland will consent to this course being adopted. The questions which are raised are somewhat technical and important enough to have the consideration of a Committee upstairs when the owners of fisheries claim they have a right to have their case heard. I believe the objections they urge are of such a technical nature that they could not, with advantage, be debated in the House. It is morally certain that Debate would simply take the form of statements on one side and contradiction on the other. I think a Select Committee, with evidence before them, will arrive at a just and fair conclusion on a matter of considerable importance both to the fishery owners and the milling industries throughout Ireland. Mill-owners have substantial reasons for complaint, and the first clause is designed to remedy a grievance imposed by the Act of 1879. When that Act was passed it was said that the only object was to transfer jurisdiction from the Commissioners of Fisheries; but beyond that the Act takes away from mill-owners in Ireland a protection mill-owners in this country enjoy. This is one of the grievances the Bill is intended to remove, and which mill-owners are prepared to submit with the claims of the fishery owners to the judgment of a Select Committee. The remaining clauses of the Bill are taken from the English Salmon Fisheries Act, and simply confer on mill-owners in Ireland the same protection mill-owners in England enjoy. If it can be proved in evidence before the Committee that this protection is excessive, then those I represent are quite ready to abide by the decision. I have said this matter is of great importance to the milling industries in Ireland. There is in Antrim one tributary of the Bann upon which there are no less than 25 mills, all affected by the action of the Conservators of Fisheries on the Bann. I trust the House will, on the understanding that it shall be sent to a Select Committee, give the Bill a Second Reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Macartney.)

(12.5.) MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helen's): Last Session I was one of those who were successful in the attempt to prevent the passing of the Bill in the small hours of the morning; and I may say now that I am entirely at issue with my hon. Friend on all the facts and the merits of the Bill. I represent a strong opposition to the Bill, not only in Lancashire, but in the West of Ireland, from fishing interests there. I have had a consultation with my hon. Friend, and those whom I represent desire that the facts upon which we are at issue with the promoters of the Bill should be most carefully examined before a Select Committee. I quite agree that the issue being upon facts, a Select Committee is the best tribunal for threshing out the merits of the Bill. We are, as a matter of fact, prepared to show that the Bill is not required to meet the justice of the case, and I trust the Government may see their way to consent to the appointment of the Committee, and perhaps I may be permitted to say at this stage that in the composition of the Committee the Unionist Party should not be too strongly represented. We are prepared to prove that evidence of the Inspectors of Fisheries is entirely against the Bill in its present form, and I trust that the Second Reading if taken will be only on the understanding that the Bill shall go before a Select Committee.

(12.8.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am bound to say I have made inquiries from the Inspectors of Fisheries and it is right to say that they see great objections to the Bill as it stands at present. They inform me that a question arising as to one river is the cause of the Bill. (Mr. McCARTHY: No, no.) I should be sorry to assist in passing a Bill which would do anything to diminish the value of salmon fishing in Ireland, upon which great expenditure has been incurred in the past. At the same time I quite understand it is possible there may be cases in the North of Ireland where manufacturing interests, also important, require that arrangements should be made, which, while preserving the salmon fishing, and providing that it shall be in no way injured, may secure to mill-owners those rights of water which are so valuable to their industry. I feel constrained to offer no opposition to the Second Reading now, on the distinct understanding that the inquiry before a Select Committee shall be very complete, and where it will be the duty of Inspectors of Fisheries to state their case.

(12.11.) MR. M. HEALY (Cork): It is proposed to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, but the terms reference have not been put down. is a mere reference without a statement as to sending for persons, paper and records.

MR. SPEAKER: That follows v the Motion for the nomination of Committee.

(12.11.) MR. M. KENNY (Tyrone Mid): Before we submit this mischievous and uncalled for Bill to a Select Committee, it is well we should know how this Committee is constituted. A fair arrangement should be made for the nominations. It is premature to take the Second Reading to-night, and I would advise the hon. Member in charge of the to first look about and see what arrangements he can make through the Whips of the respective Parties. Unless this is done, I must object to a vote being made with the Bill. I do not intend to discuss the merits of the Bill at this hour, but I am convinced the proposals are most mischievous from many points of view. It will really be of no benefit to mill-owners, some of whom are most anxious for the Bill, indeed, it will do some of them more injury than good. I shall, so far as I can, oppose the Bill through

(12.14.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway N.): I must protest against a permission which is growing up of moving the Second Reading of a Bill, and saying who supports and who opposes nothing upon the merits of the Bill itself. Now, I have rapidly gone through the Bill, and I can tell the House more about it than the Member has told us in moving the Second Reading. It provides gratings being fixed to prevent salmon being drawn up by mill wheels. One should think a proper provision should control the action of conservators in stopping up streams for the benefit of the salmon. Now, the conservators of rivers in Ireland are a ridiculous body. Anybody who pays £2 can be a conservator, and is anything unless there is an appointment to be made. A few Boards of Conservators are better; but, generally speaking, you might, in half an hour, collect in the Strand a body of men who would do the work as well as these conservators. I think the hon. Member might have given us some explanation of his Bill; but, however, if it is sent to a Select Committee probably some good will result.

(12.16.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I sympathise with my hon. and gallant Friend in the desire to know something of a Bill we are asked to read a second time; but it should be said that last Session we did have a full exposition of the provisions of the Bill from the hon. Member opposite. But I rise to make an appeal to my hon. Friend (Mr. Kenny) to allow the Bill to go forward. I have received a number of representations which induces me to think there is every reason why the Bill should be threshed out before a Committee. If I have any influence with my hon. Friend I would appeal to him to allow the Bill to be read a second time.

MR. M. KENNY: I object.

(12.17.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): Perhaps I may be allowed to explain that I have followed the ordinary course, and I am quite ready to adopt the usual course for securing on the Committee the representation of all sections in the House.

(12.17.) MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I may explain to the hon. Member that it is impossible to nominate a Committee until a Bill is read a second time. If the Second Reading is taken now, the hon. Member will be equally master of the situation, because the Motion for the appointment of Members of the Committee if opposed cannot come on after midnight.

MR. M. KENNY: Under the circumstances I withdraw my objection.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

MUNICIPAL FRANCHISE (IRELAND)
BILL.—(No. 34.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 39.)

Adjourned Debate on Second Reading [17th February] further adjourned till to-morrow.

CONVEYANCING AND LAW OF PROPERTY ACT (1881) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 110.)

Read the third time, and passed.

PLACES OF WORSHIP (SITES) BILL.
(No. 135.)

Second Reading deferred from Tuesday next till Friday 11th March.

MOTIONS.

LIMITED PARTNERSHIPS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Rathbone, Bill to establish Limited Partnerships, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Rathbone, Sir Horace Davey, Sir Albert Rollit, Mr. Cozens-Hardy, Mr. Courtney, Mr. Alexander Brown, Mr. Lewis Fry, Sir William Houldsworth, Mr. Whitbread, and Mr. Bryce.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 175.]

WOMEN'S DISABILITIES REMOVAL BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Haldane, Bill to remove the disabilities of Women, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Haldane, Sir Edward Grey, and Mr. Thomas Ellis.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 176.]

SMALL HOLDINGS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Haldane, Bill to facilitate the creation of Small Holdings and Allotments in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Haldane, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Esslemont, Mr. Robert Reid, and Mr. Munro Ferguson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 177.]

LEASEHOLDERS (PURCHASE OF FEE SIMPLE) BILL.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 177.]

PARCEL POST (UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND GREAT BRITAIN).

Return presented,—relative thereto [ordered 11th February ; Mr. Henniker Heaton] ; to lie upon the Table.

UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1889 (ORDINANCE NO. 11).

Copy presented,—of Ordinance made by the Scottish Universities Commissioners with regard to the Regulations for Degrees in Arts (Ordinance No. 11, General No. 6) [by Act] ; to lie upon the Table.

(No. 12).—Copy presented,—of Ordinance made by the Scottish Universities Commissioners with regard to the Regulations for Degrees in Science (Ordinance No. 12, General No. 7) [by Act] ; to lie upon the Table.

(No. 13).—Copy presented,—of Ordinance made by the Scottish Universities Commissioners with regard to the Regulations as to Examinations (Ordinance No. 13, General No. 8) [by Act] ; to lie upon the Table.

(No. 14).—Copy presented,—of Ordinance made by the Scottish Universities Commissioners with regard to the Regulations for Degrees in Medicine (Ordinance No. 14, Glasgow No. 1 [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

(No. 15).—Copy presented,—of Ordinance made by the Scottish Universities Commissioners with regard to the Regulations for Degrees in Medicine (Ordinance No. 15, Aberdeen No. 1) [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

(No. 16).—Copy presented,—of Ordinance made by the Scottish Universities Commissioners with regard to the Regulations for Degrees in Medicine (Ordinance No. 16, Edinburgh No. 1) [by Act] ; to lie upon the Table.

PRISONS (ENGLAND AND WALES).

Copy presented—of Order made by the Secretary of State for the discontinuance of Nottingham Prison [by Act] ; to lie upon the Table.

LIGHTHOUSES ABROAD.

Account presented,—showing the dues received and expenditure incurred in the construction, repair, and maintenance of Lighthouses in Britain sessions Abroad during the year [by Act] ; to lie upon the Table.

GLEBE LANDS (SALES).

Return ordered—

“ Showing the Sales of Glebes continuation of Parliamentary Paper, N Session 1891.”—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

CIVIL SERVICES AND RE DEPARTMENTS (SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES 1891-2).

Supplementary Estimate present Sums required to be voted for the s the year ending 31st March, 1892, in to the Sums already provided in the I presented in the current year [by Co Referred to the Committee of Suppl be printed. [No. 53.]

EASTBOURNE IMPROVEMENT 1885 (PROSECUTIONS FOR AIR SERVICES, &c.)

Address for—

“ Return showing (1) the num particulars of the charges brought, 1st day of June, 1891, to the 18th February, 1892, before the Justices Sessions at Eastbourne, for offence ‘The Eastbourne Improvement Act, otherwise, committed by persons tak in open air services or meetings, o sions with or without music, or for assembly ; (2) the number and partic the charges brought before the said during the same period for assaults or taking part in such services, or me processions, or on the police in co therewith, or for breaches of the pe damaging property, or threatening, o conduct, or resisting the police in co therewith ; and (3) the results in cases, with the particulars of any awarded, of other proceedings, if sequent to conviction, and of an of imprisonment actually served. Rowntree.)

House adjourned at twenty-five after Twelve

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 19th February, 1892.

INDIAN COUNCILS ACT (1861) AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]—(No. 3.)

House in Committee (according to order); Bill reported without amendment; Standing Committee negatived; and Bill to be read 3rd on Monday next.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR THE STANDING COMMITTEE.

Report from, That the Committee have (in pursuance of Standing Order No. L.) nominated the following Lords to serve as Chairmen of Standing Committees:

E. Chancellor.	E. Camperdown.
L. Cadogan. (L. Privy Seal.)	E. Kimberley.
E. Derby.	L. Monk Bretton.
E. Belmore.	L. Herschell.
E. Mecley.	L. Basing.

And that the Committee have (in pursuance of Standing Order No. XLVI.) nominated the following Lords to serve on the Standing Committee appointed on Thursday last:

L. Archbp. of Canterbury.	E. Brownlow.
L. Chancellor.	E. Morley.
L. Archbp. of York.	E. Camperdown.
V. Cranbrook. (L. President.)	E. Yarborough.
E. Cadogan. (L. Privy Seal.)	E. Dudley.
D. Saint Albans.	E. Kimberley.
D. Devonshire.	E. Ravensworth.
D. Rutland.	E. Wharncliffe.
M. Salisbury.	E. Northbrook.
M. Bath.	E. Selborne.
M. Abbercorn. (D. Abbercorn.)	L. Bramwell.
M. Ripon.	L. Monk Bretton.
E. Mount-Edegecumbe. (L. Steward.)	L. de Vesci. (V. de Vesci.)
E. Lathom. (L. Chamberlain.)	L. Northington. (L. Henley.)
E. Derby.	L. Rothschild.
E. Winchilsea and Nottingham.	L. Monkswell.
E. Chesterfield.	L. Lingen.
E. Lauderdale.	L. Ashbourne.
E. Dundonald.	L. Elphinstone.
E. Cowper.	L. Herschell.
E. Staunhope.	L. Hillingdon.
E. Waldegrave.	V. Sidmouth.
E. Spencer.	V. Gordon. (E. Aberdeean.)
E. Lucas.	V. Oxenbridge.
E. Belmore.	V. Cross.
E. Harrowby.	L. Bp. London.

L. Knutsford. (One of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State.)	L. Kenry. (E. Dunraven and Mount-Earl.)
L. Willoughby de Eresby.	L. Hartismere (L. Henniker.)
L. Zouche of Haryngworth.	L. Wolverton.
L. Windsor.	L. Sandhurst.
L. Clifford of Chudleigh.	L. Harlech.
L. Balfour.	L. Norton.
L. Boyle. (E. Cork and Orrery.)	L. Shute. (V. Barrington.)
L. Lovaine. (E. Percy.)	L. Watson.
L. Thurlow.	L. Lamington.
L. Carrington.	L. Rowton.
L. Meldrum. (M. Huntly.)	L. Brabourne.
L. Foxford. (E. Limerick.)	L. Reay.
L. Colchester.	L. Hothfield.
L. Ker. (M. Lothian.)	L. Grimthorpe.
L. Poltimore.	L. Kensington.
L. Leigh.	L. Brassey.
L. Belper.	L. Thring.
L. Houghton.	L. Macnaghten.
	L. Basing.
	L. De Ramsey.
	L. Morris.
	L. Field.
	L. Sandford.
	L. Hannen.

Read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

CONVEYANCING AND LAW OF PROPERTY ACT, 1881, AMENDMENT BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 17.)

House adjourned at half past Four o'clock, till Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 19th February, 1892.

PETITION.

THE OPIUM TRADE.

MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I have to present a spontaneous Petition, signed by 22,000 inhabitants of India and Burmah, against the opium trade in India, and I request that the prayer of the Petitioners may be read by the Clerk at the Table.

Petition presented, and read by the Clerk.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask you, Mr. Speaker, can this Petition be placed on the Minutes of the House, and appear as part of our proceedings?

MR. SPEAKER: It will be treated as Petitions are treated—in the ordinary way.

QUESTIONS.

---

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCE BY PARCELS POST.

SIR EDWARD GREY (Northumberland, Berwick): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to a resolution passed by the Central and Associated Chambers of Agriculture urging the desirableness of the provision of increased facilities by Parcels Post, so as to include the transmission of agricultural produce; and whether he is prepared to give effect to that view, so that the present high rates for the conveyance of small parcels of dairy and other farm produce may be reduced?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The proposal has received careful investigation, but I am not at present able to offer expectations of being able to assent to it.

UNPENSIONED VETERANS OF THE CRIMEAN WAR AND INDIAN MUTINY.

MR. LEON (Bucks, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in accordance with his statement in July last, a list has been prepared of the most necessitous men among the unpensioned veterans of the Crimean War and the Indian Mutiny; and whether the name of William Young, of Wolverton, Bucks, formerly of the 2nd and 3rd Battalion Grenadier Guards, appears on that list?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): My answer to the first paragraph in the question is—Yes; and to the second—No. The man referred to had not sufficient service to be eligible for the pension promised last year; but, as I have already stated, I am considering whether it will be possible to reduce the qualifying service.

MR. LEON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman when the list will be published?

Mr. Mac Neill

MR. E. STANHOPE: It is not going to be published.

INDIAN FACTORY ACT REGULATIONS

MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India if he will obtain and lay upon the Table a copy of the Regulations which were to be prepared by the Government of India relating to the Factory Act, which became Law in India on the 1st January last?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): Yes, Sir; the Regulations when received will be laid on the Table.

MR. PROVAND: But will the hon. Gentleman say when will they be received? How long shall we have to wait for them?

MR. CURZON: I cannot say at the moment.

OFFICERS OF THE INLAND REVENUE DEPARTMENT.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, before a reply sent by the Treasury to the Petition of the Supervisors, Officers, and Assistants of Inland Revenue, presented in May last, he will be kind enough to grant short interviews to one representative of each of the three classes?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, George's, Hanover Square): I regret that I am unable to comply with the request in the hon. Member's question. The Petition of the Excise Office and the Report of the Board of Inland Revenue are before me, and I see no advantage in taking the very unusual course of granting an interview to all of the memorialists.

MR. COBB: The right hon. Gentleman must be aware that within the limits of a memorial of reasonable size it is difficult to mention all the points and to make the representations that arise. If the right hon. Gentleman is unable to have an interview with the memorialists, will the Permanent Secretary to the Treasury appoint an interview?

MR. GOSCHEN: No; I am afraid I cannot hold out any such hope. I proper course is for the officers to make their representations through the Heads of their Departments. It is impossible to arrange that this shall be done by personal interview with the Secretary.

MR. COBB: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that that course has already been suggested in an answer from Somerset House? Sir Algernon West said the only remaining course was for the memorialists to ask for an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. GOSCHEN: No; I think that must be a mistake. The Board of Inland Revenue would not make such a suggestion. The hon. Gentleman must be labouring under some mistake.

MR. COBB: I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that I was present when Sir Algernon West made the suggestion. If I can show the right hon. Gentleman that was so, will he agree to adopt that course?

MR. GOSCHEN: No; not even if Sir Algernon West suggested that course. It is one that would embarrass all succeeding Governments. It is impossible that a Chancellor of the Exchequer could place himself in personal communication with all Civil servants who may think they have a grievance, or who wish to have their salaries raised.

THE BRITISH VICE CONSUL IN PARIS.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that the British Vice Consul in Paris acted as second in a duel fought in or near Paris last November; and, if so, whether any notice has been taken, or is intended to be taken, by Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in regard to the Vice Consul's conduct?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): No information on the subject has been received at the Foreign Office; nor has any intimation reached the Secretary of State that any charge of such a character has been made against the gentleman referred to.

MR. ESSLEMONT: Will the hon. Gentleman be good enough to inquire whether such a charge can be supported, if I put him in possession of information that seems to leave no doubt on the subject?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I should like to point out to the hon. Member that at present there is no evidence that any offence punishable either by the law of this country or of France was committed.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I desire to point out—I desire to ask the hon. Gentleman whether, without reference to any offence having been committed, it is a fact that the Vice Consul did act as second in a duel?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I have already told the hon. Member we have not the shadow of a shade of evidence of any such thing having occurred.

MR. ESSLEMONT: If I put the hon. Gentleman in possession of evidence in relation to this matter, will inquiry be made?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: If the hon. Member will forward such evidence the Secretary of State, no doubt, will consider it.

THEOLOGICAL TESTS IN SCOTCH UNIVERSITIES.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the Scottish University Commissioners have, more than a year ago, taken all the evidence they think necessary on the subject of Theological Tests, on which they were directed, by the 18th section of the Act of 1889, to make a Special Report to Her Majesty; and whether, if this be so, it is the intention of the Commissioners to present that Special Report forthwith, considering that till it has been presented, and an opportunity given for legislation regarding Tests, the ordinances necessary for dealing with the Faculty of Divinity in the Universities cannot be proceeded with?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I am informed that the Commissioners closed the evidence on the subject referred to some time ago, and they hope to be in a position to present their Report to Her Majesty at an early date.

MR. BRYCE: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when the Report is likely to be laid on the Table?

SIR C. J. PEARSON: I have given the reply I have received, and I am afraid I cannot go further.

THE ARMAGH GUARDIANS AND THE LOWER BANN DRAINAGE.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the Armagh Board of Guardians have by resolution protested against taxing the ratepayers of the union for the drainage of the Lower Bann, and declaring that the taxation should be raised on the lands benefited, supplemented by a large Imperial grant; and whether it is his intention to take any action in the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I have made inquiries, and I cannot find any such resolution.

QUARTER SESSIONS AT CLOUGHER, TYRONE.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he is aware that at the January Quarter Sessions at Clougher, County Tyrone, during the hearing of the case of "Venables v. Peebles," the defendant occupied a seat on the Bench; that at the same Sessions 200 defended cases were tried in four hours, and that the solicitors were cautioned against cross-examining witnesses; and whether he will call the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the matter?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The hon. Member appears to be under some misapprehension. The case of "Venables v. Peebles" was not heard at the January Sessions at Clougher, and at those Sessions some 25 or 30 cases were tried, not 200, as stated in the question. There does not appear to be anything to which the attention of the Lord Chancellor should be called.

HAULBOWLINE DOCK.

MR. MORROGH (Cork Co., S.E.): I beg to ask the Representative of the Admiralty if the First Lord has received a resolution in reference to the Haulbowline Dock passed by the Town Commissioners of Queenstown on the 1st instant; and what attention he is prepared to give to the matter?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT, Sheffield, Eccleshall): presume the hon. Member refers to communications in favour of undertaking dockyard work at Haulbowline. The Board of Admiralty never intended that a dockyard should be established for building ships at Haulbowline. The dock has been constructed there with a view to the repair of ships in an emergency.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask the hon. Gentleman if half a million of money has been spent on the construction of a dock there, and for what purpose? Also, why ships are brought from Irish waters to English docks yards for their annual overhauling?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: As I have said, the dock was constructed with a view to repairs on an emergency. It is true that a large sum was expended on its construction.

MR. MORROGH: Are there no workshops and appliances at Haulbowline for dockyard work?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Yes, there are workshops which are capable of doing slight repairs, though, if serious repairs were contemplated, it would be necessary to make considerable additions to staff and machinery.

MR. MORROGH: I shall put further question.

LIGHTS IN THE RED SEA.

MR. HENNIKER HEATO (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what steps are being taken for the rapid completion of the proposed lighting of the Red Sea; whether the Turkish or Egyptian Government have a large surplus at the disposal from Red Sea light dues; and whether he is aware that, in the opinion of the most experienced captains of steamers, lights are urgently needed in the Red Sea on the island of Abu-Aqaba on the island Gebel Teer, and also at Mocha?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I regret that considerable delay has arisen in the negotiations relating to this matter. It is due to the excessive demands parties to whom the Sublime Porte had granted a concession for erecting lights on Ottoman territory, which includes the places mentioned in the question. The Egyptian Government have a considerable surplus from Red Sea light dues, and an arrangement has been come to, according to which, as soon as the new Customs Tariff comes into force, the sum of £E40,000 will be set aside for the erection and maintenance of the additional lights required in the Red Sea and the Gulf of Aden. It is possible that the difficulty may be overcome by the selection of an alternative route to that hitherto followed. The matter is engaging the attention of the Foreign Office and of the Board of Trade.

HOLYWOOD PIER, COUNTY DOWN.

MR. SEXTON (on behalf of Mr. M'CARTAN, Down, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, with reference to Holywood Pier, County Down, whether he will state on what date the transfer of sale was completed, and the consideration for which the transfer was made; whether an undertaking was given by the purchasers that, on completion of the transfer, steps would be taken by them for its repair; and whether the plans of the proposed repairs have been lodged yet at the Harbour Office, Belfast, or if any steps have been taken to repair the pier and harbour works?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Holywood Pier has been transferred on several occasions since 1882, when the Provisional Order was obtained. I am not aware of the consideration for which any of these transfers were made, or of undertakings which may have accompanied them. In February, 1890, and again in April, 1891, I promised the hon. Member that whenever plans of new works at the pier were submitted to the Board of Trade the Belfast Harbour Commissioners would be consulted, and notice of the application given in the locality. No plans have yet been received, and the present owners have promised to do nothing without giving me notice.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS OFFICE, DUBLIN.

MR. SEXTON (on behalf of Mr. M'CARTAN): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware of the complaints frequently made as to the serious delay caused in making negative searches at the Registry of Deeds Office in Dublin; whether he will state the number of requisitions for negative searches at present lodged there and not yet complied with; how many of them have been lodged upwards of one month; and on what date the first requisition for a negative search still unattended to was lodged at the office?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham): The answer to the first paragraph of the question is in the negative; the answer to the second is 98, of which 21 are in progress; the answer to the third is 15, of which there are now 13 in progress; and in answer to the last paragraph, 11th January, 1892.

EVICTED TENANTS AND THE LAND PURCHASE ACT.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the resolution of the Grand Jury at the late Fermoy Quarter Sessions, requesting Her Majesty's Government to extend the time named in the 13th clause of the Land Purchase Act of 1891 for arrangements with respect to the re-instatement of evicted tenants; whether he has also been made aware of the observations of the Recorder of Cork, to the effect that he concurred in the resolution of the Grand Jury, and that everybody would like to see the evicted tenants restored on equitable terms; and whether the Government will introduce a short Bill giving a reasonable extension of time for arrangements under the 13th clause?

MR. JACKSON: My attention has been called to the resolutions referred to, and to the observations of the Recorder of Cork, and I have to say that if information comes to me that both the landlord and the former tenant desire to avail themselves of the provision contained in Section 13 of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891, but find themselves precluded from so doing through the limited time in which that section was in operation, I shall consider as to the course to be taken.

THE CONGESTED DISTRICTS BOARD —COUNTY ROSCOMMON.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether representations have been made to the Congested Districts Board from a very influential meeting in Castlerea, County Roscommon, in favour of including Castlerea and Loughglynn electoral divisions in the operation of the Act ; whether any decision has yet been arrived at in the matter ; and whether, in considering the representation made, due weight will be given to the fact that in the County of Roscommon a special sum of money, the Reproductive Loan Fund, has been placed at the disposal of the Board ?

MR. JACKSON: Yes ; representations have been made to the Congested Districts Board which, I am informed, will be carefully considered, and all the circumstances, including those referred to in the question, will be taken into account.

THE UNCOVENANTED SERVICE OF INDIA.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he can state the proportions of Europeans, Eurasians, and Indians in the Covenanted and Uncovenanted Service of India, on 31st March, 1886, under the following headings :—Rs.1,000 per annum to less than Rs.2,500 ; Rs.2,500 per annum to less than Rs.5,000 ; Rs.5,000 per annum to less than Rs.10,000 ; Rs.10,000 per annum to less than Rs.20,000 ; Rs.20,000 per annum to less than Rs.30,000 ; Rs.30,000 per annum to less than Rs.40,000 ; Rs.40,000 per annum to less than Rs.50,000 ; Rs.50,000 and upwards ?

MR. CURZON : The figures are as follows :—Salaries of Rs.50,000 and upwards, 26 Europeans, one native ; Rs.40,000 to Rs.50,000, 47 Europeans, three natives ; Rs.30,000 to Rs.40,000, 125 Europeans ; Rs. 20,000 to Rs.30,000, 346 Europeans, three Eurasians, two natives ; Rs.10,000 to Rs.20,000, 951 Europeans, 12 Eurasians, 40 natives ; Rs.5,000 to Rs.10,000, 2,078 Europeans, 111 Eurasians, 446 natives ; Rs.2,500 to Rs. 5,000, 1,334 Europeans, 545 Eurasians, 1,647 natives ; Rs.1,000 to Rs.2,500, 2,097 Europeans, 1,963 Eurasians, 6,915 natives. Total—7,004 Europeans, 2,634 Eurasians, 9,054 natives.

MR. MAC NEILL : I thank the hon. Gentleman for this very full information. May I further ask him whether it is not the fact that of all the Indian officials, both Covenanted and Uncovenanted Service, now on salaries of Rs.5,000 and upwards, there are 3,573 Europeans and 492 natives ?

MR. CURZON : That is scarcely a question I can answer without notice.

LAGOS TRADE.

SIR WILLIAM HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if the Government have any information as to the stoppage of the trade routes from Lagos to the interior and, if so, what steps are being taken to remove these obstructions to legitimate trade caused by the hostile action of the native tribes ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth) : An arrangement has lately been made with the Jebus, by which free passage for trade through their country has been secured, and the Papers on the subject will shortly be laid before Parliament. Information was received a few days ago by telegraph from the Governor that the road to Abeokuta had been closed. The Governor has been authorised by telegraph, in reply, to address a strong letter of remonstrance to the Egbas, informing them that if the roads are not opened the matter will be reported to Her Majesty's Government, who will decide what further action should be taken.

PAUPER RELIEF, 1891.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can state what was the total number of persons in England and Wales who were in receipt of relief at any time between 1st January, 1891, and 31st December, 1891; and whether he would consent to the publication of annual Returns of the total number of paupers throughout the year, in addition to the Returns now presented of persons in receipt of relief on particular days of the year?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): If the hon. Member will refer to the terms of the Return moved for on the 11th, I think he will find that the Return will include the information he desires. It is a Return which will take considerable labour to prepare, so I cannot vouch for it being laid on the Table at a very early date.

MR. A. ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if, in addition, he can give the Returns for particular days in the year?

*MR. RITCHIE: I know that the hon. Gentleman desires that and other particulars, but to avoid delay we have to limit the information, and cannot embrace all the points upon which information may be desired. I am anxious that the Return shall be as correct as possible. I am considering that particular point. I sympathise with the object of the hon. Member, and, if I can manage, it shall be done.

SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): Can the right hon. Gentleman give the ages of those in receipt of relief?

*MR. RITCHIE: Within certain limits. Of course, we could go on from age to age; but it would add enormously to the labour of preparing the Return, and increase delay. Looking at the interesting discussions going on lately, I think the House would desire to have, as soon as possible, the Return as referring to the particular age of 65.

SIR W. FOSTER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in one of the Bills introduced this Session a provision is introduced that persons in receipt of relief for a certain number of years before 65 are not eligible for pensions? Therefore, the ages between 55 and 65 become important in reference to suggested legislation?

*MR. RITCHIE: If the Return were to be prepared so as to give all the information in reference to Bills introduced, I am afraid there would be a very great extension of the time and labour necessary in the preparation.

FERTILISERS AND FEEDING STUFFS BILL.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture when he proposes to re-introduce the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Bill?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I do not propose to reintroduce this Bill at present. The subject is so highly technical, and I found so many difficulties in the preparation of the Bill, and so many objections were taken to the measure prepared last Session, that I propose to arrange for the investigation of the subject by a Departmental Committee before introducing a further measure.

MR. CHANNING: Can the right hon. Gentleman say how long this Committee will be occupied with the subject?

*MR. CHAPLIN: It is impossible for me to express an opinion at present; but I shall be very glad to give the hon. Member any further information on that point as soon as it is in my power.

TRAINING OF THE NORFOLK MILITIA.

MR. SAMUEL HOARE (Norwich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is in contemplation to remove the annual training of the Norfolk regiments of Militia from Norwich this year; and whether, taking into consideration the fact that the Corporation of Norwich has supplied a site for the dépôt barracks and suitable ground for training and exercise, he will, before coming to a decision, consider the great disappointment and loss which will be caused to the citizens of Norwich if the annual training is not allowed to take place there as usual?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Although it will be necessary that the 3rd Battalion of the Norfolk Regiment should have the same opportunity of being trained with one of its line battalions as other Militia regiments, there are reasons why I think it may this year be trained at Norwich. As regards the 4th Battalion, the men are largely drawn from Great Yarmouth, and the officer commanding considers that to train there will be beneficial to recruiting. This battalion is only occasionally trained at Norwich?

ROYALTIES ON GOLD MINING.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydfil): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the necessity of increasing the metallic reserves of the country, he has yet considered the question of reducing the royalties upon gold, so that the Crown may not take so large a proportion as two-thirds of the profits obtained from such a class of ore as gives 10 per cent. profit upon its production and treatment, as in the case of the Clonga and other Crown mines in Wales?

MR. GOSCHEN: In reply to the hon. Member, I may refer him to my answer given yesterday as to the reduction made in royalties upon ore of low grade.

MR. SHALLARD, LATE WRITER IN THE ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been directed to the case of Mr. Shallard, writer in the Ordnance Department, who was dismissed on the ground that he had uttered sentiments very unusual in a Government employé, and that he had come into contact with the police?

MR. E. STANHOPE: A writer of the name of Shallard was dismissed from the Ordnance Store Department at Woolwich for being absent without leave, with the intimation that an individual who had been convicted and fined for collision with the police was an undesirable person to employ in the Public Service. The case was brought to my notice, and I saw no reason to interfere with the action of the Local Authorities.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH BRAZIL.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the special advantages conferred by the Republic of Brazil in the duties which she levies on the cotton goods and other productions of the United States of America, Her Majesty's Government is endeavouring to obtain similar advantages for the manufactures of the United Kingdom; and, if so, what is the present position of such negotiations?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Communications on the subject have been made to the Government of Brazil, but up to the present time that Government has not been willing to enter into negotiations for a Commercial Treaty with this country.

MR. SCHWANN: Does my hon. Friend know whether similar arrangements to those with the United States have been made between European countries and Brazil?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I must ask for notice of that question.

WORK AT WOOLWICH ARSENAL.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if there is any truth in the allegations as to extra night shifts having been recently employed at Woolwich Arsenal, and if, having regard to the apprehension excited thereby in the minds of private firms and their employés in the presence of an increasing slackness of work in the iron and steel trades, he will give directions that night work is not to be resorted to, or additions made to the Arsenal working staff, plant, or shops, without his personal authorisation?

MR. E. STANHOPE: No increase in the number of men necessarily employed on night shifts at Woolwich Arsenal has taken place. On the contrary, there has been a slight decrease quite recently. Except in cases of absolute necessity, I am altogether opposed to them. No night work or extensions of the ordnance factories are undertaken without the personal approval of the Financial Secretary or myself. As some idea appears to prevail that the ordnance factories are working at high pressure while the trade is suffering, I invite my hon. Friend to visit the Arsenal for himself, id to see what is going on. Every cility shall be afforded to him.

Mr. E. Stanhope

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Bright-de): Will the right hon. Gentleman say, has there been any increase in the steel forges in the Department since he gave me the answer last year?

MR. E. STANHOPE: It would be better to give notice of these questions; but I have already said we have absolutely given up the manufacture of large steel forges, but we do employ small steel forges.

EMPLOYMENT OF NATIVES IN THE INDIAN CIVIL SERVICE.

SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it is true, as stated in the St. James's Gazette of 18th February, in an article entitled "India for the Indians," that in regard to the recruitment for the Provincial or Local Services in India, Lord Cross and his advisers have departed from the recommendations of the Public Service Commission; that the appointments which are now to be opened to the Provincial Services are to be strictly reserved for natives of India; and that not only a third of the Session Judgeships, but one-sixth also of the Collectorships will be filled by natives?

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Will the hon. Gentleman permit me to ask him a question, of which I have given him private notice, whether the recommendation of the Public Service Commission referred to in the question of the hon. Baronet is that Indians and Europeans who have lived in India three years should be equally eligible for the Provincial Service; and whether Lord Cross in his despatch, 12th September, 1889, departs from that recommendation requiring that the appointments shall be filled in India; is it in the power of the Government to make such a change by executive order?

MR. CURZON: The question put by the hon. Member varies from that of which he has given me notice. I shall be glad if he will put a Notice on the Paper. In reply to the hon. Baronet, I have to say that information on the subject will be found in the correspondence presented to Parliament in 1891.

RIFLE RANGE AT NEWTOWNARDS.

MR. MACARTNEY (on behalf of Colonel WARING, Down, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has come to any decision with regard to the rifle range at Newtownards; and whether he is aware of the strong feeling in favour of its retention?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The lease under which the Newtownards range was held has expired. To have rendered that range safe for the Lee-Metford rifle would have entailed very great expense, and a suitable range has therefore been obtained elsewhere.

A RIFLE RANGE AT PORTMARNOCK.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has yet considered the Memorial presented to him against the establishment of a rifle range and military camp at Portmarnock, in the County of Dublin; and, if so, whether he is prepared to state the conclusion at which he has arrived on the subject?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The question is still under my personal consideration. Perhaps the hon. Member will communicate with me in about a fortnight's time.

CROWN LANDS AT BILLINGBOROUGH.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what extent of land has been let in allotments upon the Crown lands at Billingborough, in the County of Lincoln, and what number of allotments have been granted exceeding a quarter of an acre, and exceeding half an acre up to one acre; and whether the statement is correct that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests have resolved not to let more than 30 acres for allotments in any one parish?

SIR J. GORST: My right hon. Friend has asked me to answer this question. There are 41 acres 2 roods 9 perches of the Crown estate at Billingborough let in allotments. There are 86 of them, few being less than a quarter of an acre, 57 exceeding quarter of an acre, and 12 exceeding half an acre. The answer to the second paragraph is in the negative.

MOTIONS.

---

TEACHERS' REGISTRATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Arthur Acland, Bill to provide for the Registration of Teachers, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Arthur Acland, Mr. Sydney Buxton, and Mr. Hobhouse.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 178.]

CORONERS' ACT (1887) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Sir Walter Foster, Bill to amend "The Coroners' Act, 1887," ordered to be brought in by Sir Walter Foster, Mr. Addison, Mr. Roby, Mr. H. S. Wright, Mr. Samuel Evans, and Mr. John Kelly.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 179.]

WOMEN COUNTY COUNCILLORS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. James Stuart, Bill to enable Women to be elected to, and to serve on, County Councils, ordered to be brought in by Mr. James Stuart, Mr. Henry J. Wilson, and Mr. Channing.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 180.]

AGRICULTURAL TENANTS IMPROVEMENTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Seale-Hayne, Bill to compensate Agricultural Tenants for all Improvements, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Seale-Hayne, Mr. Cobb, Mr. Channing, Mr. Thomas Ellis, Sir Bernhard Samuelson, Mr. Hally Stewart, and Mr. George Lambert.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 181.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

---

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

COUNTY COURT JUDGES IN WALES.

RESOLUTION.

(4.3.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I rise, Sir, to call attention to the recent appointment of a County Court Judge in Wales, and to move—

"That this House, in the interests of the due administration of justice, and in face of the Resolution of this House of the 8th March, 1872, regrets the appointment to the judgeship of a County Court District in which the Welsh language is generally spoken, of a gentleman who is unable to speak or understand that language."

Sir J. Gorst

In submitting this Resolution House I wish at the outset to dis- any personal feeling and any de- make any personal attack upon gentleman who has been fortunate securing this appointment. I have some experience of the courtes which he treats professional me- suitors; that disarms opposition at head. It is only as a matter of fact that I have brought this Resolution before the House, and I think it justified in asking from the Minister responsible some explanation of the perpetration of what appears to me only like a job. The great majority of the people of the district over this Judge has control—the well-to-do classes, the squirearchy and the men—understand the English language but the poorer classes have no practical acquaintance with it enabling them to conduct their business with anything like precision in the County Court, which is pre-eminently a Court of the poor. The artizans, quarrymen, and the agricultural labourers transact all their business in the Welsh language, and it is a gross injustice that to a district in which the vast majority of the people speak nothing but Welsh, a Judge should be appointed to determine differences who does not understand the language in which they present their causes. It may, of course, be said that competent interpreters are available in these Courts, and I have no objection to say anything derogatory of gentlemen, but as a rule the professional men, who are acquainted with the English language with the Welsh language, they very often fail to understand either the language or the questions. In Carnarvon and Bangor the gentlemen who act as interpreters have great knowledge of the language and great literary gift. Sir, it is impossible for an interpreter, however skilful, to convey to the court all the shades and differences of meaning in a witness's answers. In case words are used which have a double meaning the interpreter is responsible for the Judge. In 1872, on the Motion of the right hon. Member for East Dorsetshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), the House passed a Resolution to the effect

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable, in the interest of the due administration of justice, that the Judge of a County Court District in which the Welsh language is generally spoken should, so far as the limits of section will allow, be able to speak and understand that language."

Now, here is a Judge recently appointed a Welsh-speaking district, and it is pretended that he has any knowledge whatever of the Welsh language, though there were at least half-a-dozen barristers qualified by their knowledge of the language amongst the applicants for this judgeship. The opinion of all classes throughout Wales is hostile to this appointment. Not merely Welsh Liberals deprecate it, but gentlemen who have no sympathy with the views of those sitting on this side of the House condemn it. Sir John Treleaven, the Bishop of Bangor, and Vaughan—men who do not hold strong political views—are agreed in condemning the action of the Government. In University and in legal circles the appointment is condemned. The Law Times says:—

"Lord Halsbury has appointed his brothers, his wife's relations, his friends' friends, and occasionally those who have done service to his Party; but it never seems to have occurred to him to be necessary that a man should be a good lawyer, and have some experience at the bar in order to be a good Judge."

Similar opinions have been expressed by other legal authorities, but I rest my case upon the Resolution of the House of Lords, and I think appointments of this character, in defiance of the express order of the House of Commons, really amounts to contempt. I beg to move the Resolution standing in my name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, in the interests of the due administration of justice, and in face of the resolution of this House of 8th March 1872, grants the appointment to the judgeship of a County Court District in which the Welsh language is generally spoken, of a gentleman who is unable to speak or understand that language."—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question."

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydfil): I desire, Sir, to second the Motion, and I do so on precisely similar grounds to those upon which my hon. Friend based his case. I am sorry it should be necessary to dispel certain illusions which have taken hold of the mind of the people in England. It is suggested again that we are once more raising the cry of "Wales for the Welsh," and that we are endeavouring to foster the Welsh language. For my own part, I desire explicitly to repudiate that suggestion. We have no desire to raise any such cry, for that would imply a confession of our inability to compete with Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen upon equal grounds. Nor have we any desire to stimulate the Welsh language by artificial means. The Welsh language is very well able to take care of itself. But, Sir, what I wish to point out to the House is this: that the Resolution passed in 1872 refers particularly to this district to which Judge Beresford has been appointed, a district which forms one of the most Welsh parts of Wales. I do not know what the defence of the Government may be, or if they will set up any at all, but it has occurred to me that possibly this appointment was due to an oversight on their part. If they defend themselves by saying this is not a Welsh-speaking district, I would remind them that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Denbighshire raised the question in 1872 in relation to this very circuit to which Judge Beresford has been appointed. A larger number of people speak Welsh to-day than was the case in 1872, though I do not say that the proportion is larger; but, in consequence of the increase in population, the actual number is greater now than in 1872. The present Government has repeatedly recognised the necessity for appointing Welsh-speaking officials. That was done, for example, in the Factory Act and in the Mines Regulation Act. I have nothing to say against Judge Beresford. I have always heard him spoken of as an extremely fair-minded man, and until to-day I knew nothing about his connection with the Prime Minister. Upon his legal qualifications I do not feel competent to express any opinion, but I do say that the appointment of an English-speaking Judge to a Welsh-speaking district, in the face of the Resolution of 1872, is more or less a reflection on the Welsh-speaking barristers of the North and South Wales Circuits, and on the Welsh Stipendiary Magistrates, who are of sufficient standing for the post of County Court Judge. Selections from the Stipendiary Magistrates have already been made, as in the case of Judge Bishop and Judge Gwilym Williams. If the Government are prepared to defend the appointment, I hope the House will not hesitate to express its strong condemnation of the contempt shown by the Government for the Resolution passed in 1872. That Resolution requires not merely that ceteris paribus preference should be given to Welsh-speaking barristers, but that a Welsh-speaking barrister shall be appointed to the Mid Wales Circuit if a competent man can be found.

*(4.20.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I can assure the hon. Gentlemen the Mover and the Seconder of this Amendment that I sympathise to a very great extent with what I may call the national sentiment to which they have referred in many of the observations they have made. I have not the slightest intention of saying a word in depreciation of the Welsh language, with which, unfortunately, I am not acquainted. But I confess that as this Amendment has been moved and seconded in language which suggests that a contempt of the Resolution of the House of Commons has been committed, I think it is desirable that the House should have a few facts, and should know a little more about the history of this matter. If what the hon. Gentlemen allege is a contempt of the House of Commons it is a contempt of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and many other right hon. Gentlemen who acted when the Resolution was much more recent than it is at the present time, have also been guilty. I am not going to draw distinctions between the barristers who could and who could not speak Welsh, because I have, in my present position, the privilege of knowing a great deal of the members of my profession, and I will assume the Mover and the Seconder of this Amendment said what was perfectly right when they said that they were gentlemen at the Bar who possess a knowledge of Welsh, and would be well qualified to discharge the duties of a County Court Judge. But having regard to the history of this Resolution and what has happened since, I would submit those who proposed this Amendment, that in their somewhat severe strictures upon Her Majesty's Government they rather overshot the mark. The Resolution that was passed in 1872 was passed upon a question that referred to this particular Circuit—the Mid Wales Circuit. The first appointment made after the Resolution of 1872 was in October, 1873, when one of the most honoured of County Court Judges was appointed, and I am quite sure that that man (afterwards Sir) Horatio Lloyd, though he never was a more competent man was set upon the Bench. I believe that Sir Horatio Lloyd was not able to speak Welsh, and was not able to understand a very little of it. He was appointed on his merit. I know Sir Horatio Lloyd has constantly been in Welsh-speaking districts, and I am not aware of a single complaint ever having been made against him based upon the fact that he was not able to speak the Welsh language. The next appointment that was made was in January, 1878, and it was that of a very distinguished lawyer, the father of the gentleman whose name has given rise to this Amendment. He knew him intimately; and though he did not wear a silk gown, there was no more distinguished lawyer. He was constantly consulted, as I know, in cases of great importance. Parts of the circuit over which Judge Bedford presided were most unquestionably in the Welsh-speaking districts. He was there for 13 years. Mr. Beresford presided with great satisfaction over his Court for all these years. (Cries "No, no.") Hon. Members opposite must pardon me for saying that I spoke with an intimate knowledge of the profession, and I am not aware of a suggestion ever made that he was not one of the most distinguished and competent of our County Court Judges. The next appointment was in February, 1878,

At the time the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian was Prime Minister, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was Home Secretary, and Lord Selborne was Lord Chancellor. At that time the Resolution of the House of Commons was well known. Yet who was appointed? Why, Mr. Owen to Brecknockshire and Glaenor-ganshire, and he had no qualification whatever as to speaking Welsh. I will not argue the merits of the case; but we know that the Government, which had as a Member of it one who is as much a Welshman as my right hon. Friend opposite, made appointments inconsistent with this Resolution. It seems to me to be very strong to speak of action taken some seven years later as being in contempt of that Resolution. In October, 1884, Mr. G. Williams was appointed by the then Lord Chancellor to the Circuit also including Brecknock and parts of Glaenor-ganshire. In January, 1886, Mr. Bishop was appointed; and I call the attention of the House to the fact that the Lord Chancellor, who is said to be contemptuous of the Resolution, so appointed a gentleman who did speak the Welsh language. In July, 1885, just after our coming into office, Mr. Brynmor Jones was appointed. He also is able to speak Welsh, although he is now a distinguished County Court Judge in districts where Welsh speaking is not required. I desire, further, to point out that Her Majesty's Government, when they have had to decide these questions mainly on the advice of the Lord Chancellor, have made more appointments of Welsh-speaking Judges than the Government of the right hon. Member for Midlothian. I am not here to say that his Honour, Judge Beresford, is a better lawyer, or better qualified to sit as a County Court Judge, than other members of the Bar of that Circuit. In fact, I was a little surprised to hear the hon. Member for Carnarvon limit the number of other gentlemen equally well qualified to six. The circumstances affecting Mr. Beresford were certainly unusual. His father was a County Court Judge for 13 years in the adjoining district, Circuit 31. He had not been in good health during his later years, and Mr.

Cecil Beresford had sat for him repeatedly. I am doing no more than justice when I state that while so sitting as a Deputy Judge he gave universal satisfaction, and I do not believe that any professional Member of this House, who ever practised before him, will say anything to the contrary. And that is not all. There came from the district in which he had sat as a Judge—a district in which, according to the contention of the hon. Mover and Seconder of this Motion, a Welsh-speaking Judge was required—a very largely signed Petition asking for his appointment. I do not suppose the gentlemen who presented that Petition were indifferent to the consideration as to a Welsh-speaking Judge, and I dare say they were ignorant of the Resolution of the House of Commons, which had been disregarded on five or six occasions before. But Mr. Beresford was appointed accordingly. His Honor Judge Bishop, who was then Judge of Circuit No. 28, Mid-Wales, was transferred to the Circuit over which the late Judge Beresford had presided, and Mr. Beresford was appointed to No. 28. I have taken some pains to inform myself as to what has happened during the time Mr. Beresford has been sitting as Judge, and it is no exaggeration to say that when the question arose of his removal to another place, persons of all parties and all sections of the Press, without regard to politics, expressed a hope that he would not be removed. I think it is only common fairness to an absent Member of the Government to ask hon. Members to come to the conclusion that he fairly considered this point on its merits, especially as he had himself on two previous occasions appointed a gentleman who could speak Welsh, and I would suggest to this House that the idea of a contemptuous intention to disregard the Resolution of 1872 is an exaggeration. I do not wish to argue at any length the question of the necessity of appointing Welsh-speaking Judges. I am not going to suggest that it should not be taken into consideration; but I do know this, from barristers practising in these Courts, that repeatedly witnesses who are examined in Welsh answer in English, and also ask that questions may be put in English. I am not suggesting that there are no cases at times when knowledge of the language would be desirable, but I am referring to the general practice. I believe that for many years past every child in Wales has been taught English as well as Welsh. It is an honour to the Welsh nation that that should be so; but so far as this demand is concerned, it has been certainly decreasing in importance from 1872 down to 1891. I hope I have shown no feeling but one of sympathy with the national sentiment of Wales, for I have not the slightest intention of going in face of the Resolution of the House of Commons, or outraging the feelings of hon. Members from Wales; and I trust that those who may follow me will deal with my remarks in the same spirit as that in which I have addressed them in this House.

argue the question of appointing Welsh-speaking Judges in Welsh-speaking districts, and I am not surprised, because the question is concluded by the Resolution of the House of Commons, which, if it means anything, means that if you can get a competent man who speaks the Welsh language, he should be appointed. The Resolution which I had the honour of bringing forward, and I am sorry to say I believe I am the only Member now left in the House of Commons who took part in the Debate on that occasion, dealt with the very circuit with which we are now dealing, and there never was a question so exhaustively debated, or a Resolution at which the House arrived with such perfect unanimity. The only shadow of objection to it was an old Statute of Henry VIII., which has since been repealed. Speaking on that occasion as the representative of the Government, my noble Friend Lord Aberdare, then Mr. Bruce, said legal fitness was, of course, always the first consideration; but he was sure, after what they had heard that night, that for the future Governments would have regard to a knowledge of Welsh in making these appointments. Are we to understand that there is a Government now in Office which has no regard to the qualification of speaking Welsh? because, if it is so, it is desirable that we should know it. I see the Home Secretary in his place, and remember the answer he gave in reply to a Motion I made as to the appointment of a Sub-Inspector, who could not speak Welsh, to a mining district in which the Welsh language was almost exclusively spoken. As soon as that appointment was made I had, as Chairman of Petty Sessions, to adjudicate upon a summons taken out by that gentleman against the lessees of the mine for a breach of the Mines Regulation Act. The prosecution broke down on other grounds, but in any case it must have broken down, because the Mining Inspector could not speak a word of Welsh, and those from whom he got his information could not speak a word of English, so that the whole of the proceedings had to be carried on in a sort of dumb show. That is not exactly the same case as this, but, at any rate, if the

(4.45.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I must say I am very much disappointed with the explanation which the hon. and learned Gentleman has offered. The only defence he has set up for the Government of which he is a Member is, that other Governments have done the same thing; but even if that were so, two blacks do not make a white. I do not regard this as in any way a Party question, and therefore I shall put aside all he has said on that subject. Now what are the facts? Mr. Horatio Lloyd, who, I believe, was appointed under the Government of the right hon. Member for Midlothian, does not speak the Welsh language; but, if my memory serves me, he told me on the occasion of his appointment that he was able to understand what Welsh witnesses said, and to check any mistakes they made. In February, 1884, Mr. Gwyn-Owen was appointed to the post, and I should have supposed that anyone bearing that name would speak Welsh. He was very soon after transferred to another post, and Mr. Gwilym Williams, one of the best Welsh scholars, I know, was appointed to it. From that time every County Court Judge who has held that post has been perfectly competent to deal with Welsh witnesses, and to speak and understand the language. The Attorney General says that he does not wish to ight hon. Gentleman had heard it argued, he would have felt as I do, that it was wrong to appoint a gentleman to that office who could not speak the Welsh language. The hon. Gentleman the Attorney General did not put forward any kind of defence against the Motion, for he did not even suggest that a good man could not have been found who could speak Welsh. It used to be said, when complaints were made of the non-appointment of Welsh-speaking Bishops, that you could not find a Welshman competent to take the post, but that objection is now never raised, and whatever we may think of the political or other opinions of the Welsh Bishops, able men do not sit upon the Episcopal Bench. What I want to impress upon the hon. and learned Gentleman is the fact that it is not only important that we should have men who will administer justice duly, but that the people before whom they administer it should be perfectly confident that it is so administered; and unless you have a man who is familiar with the Welsh people and the Welsh language, it is perfectly impossible that such a feeling of confidence can be created. I do not think it necessary to argue the question any further, for it is really concluded by the Resolution, and as long as it stands on the Order Book of this House, to treat it as my hon. and learned Friend has just done is to treat it as if it were nothing better than waste paper. If the answer we have heard from him is all the Government can give, I sincerely trust that my hon. Friend will persevere with his Motion, and I shall be very happy to support it.

Sir Richard Webster

(4.55.) SIR J. PULESTON (Devonport): I have never wavered in my contention in favour of the principle of the Motion now moved by the hon. Member opposite, and on more than one occasion, when the question has been raised during the nearly 19 years in which I have been in this House, I have always taken exactly the same position as I do now, namely, that a Welsh-speaking barrister should always be appointed to a County Court Judgeship in the Principality. The right hon. Gentleman opposite found it convenient, in view of the facts presented by the Attorney General, to say this was not a Party question; but he will not hesitate to call it a Party question directly he gets outside this House, and he will take very good care not to explain his want of Welsh patriotism in failing to call attention to this question within a few years after the passing of his own Resolution. He passed over, in solemn silence, jobs committed by the Government of which he was himself a Member. Reference has been made to the case of Mr. Brynmor Jones. It was generally understood that there was no more brilliant man at the Bar, but when he was appointed it so happened he had just been defeated as the Liberal candidate for Mid Glamorgan.

MR. S. EVANS: Mr. Jones never was a candidate for that constituency.

SIR J. PULESTON: He was a well-known politician, and while I apologise very gladly for what I have said, I may explain that he was, at all events, mentioned in the papers as a possible candidate. I do not defend this appointment of Mr. Beresford. On the contrary, I condemn it in the strongest possible manner, and I shall vote gladly in favour of the Resolution; but I think that the Lord Chancellor probably did not have in his mind the Resolution of the House of Commons, and did have regard to precedents set by former Liberal Governments. He had other reasons, however, to suppose that the appointment of Mr. Beresford would be acceptable in Wales, for a memorial was presented which I believe was signed by an hon. Member opposite.

MR. S. EVANS: I did not sign the memorial, and I refused to do so.

SIR J. PULESTON: My authority is a paper published in his own part of Wales, and I regret that I have been misled into that statement. I do not admit that such circumstances ever occur that there is not one Welshman to be found in eight or ten years fitted to occupy the position of County Court Judge. I do not know how many applicants there were for this post, but I know several men eminent at the Bar and thoroughly conversant with the Welsh language—including a Member of this House—who would have adorned the position. I agree that what has been said does not suggest that Mr. Beresford had not the proper legal qualifications for the post, and I regret that the hon. Member, after stating that, should have thought it necessary to read an extract from a letter to the Law Times condemnatory of his qualification. I hope, now that the question has been again so prominently brought forward, no appointments will in future be made in contravention of the Resolution passed in 1872. Apart from the question of the Welsh language, which is a very serious matter, we claim that we have a sentimental right to have Welshmen in Welsh places, especially as a knowledge of Welsh is essential to the right administration of justice in peculiarly Welsh districts. It is impossible to administer justice with equity through the medium of an interpreter; we know the difficulty in our own English Courts. I trust that, in future, no Lord Chancellor of any Party will venture to disregard the national aspirations and national feelings of justice and right which is attached to the appointment of Welsh County Court Judges.

(5.5.) MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): I only desire, Sir, to say a few words on the observations which fell from the Attorney General, and first, as usual, I am bound to congratulate him upon the admirable tone and temper in which he dealt with the question. I did not expect anything else, but I was surprised at the weakness of the case he made out. He confessed that a knowledge of Welsh is an important element to consider in making the appointment of County Court Judges; then, I ask, what peculiar characteristics are there in the person now holding the post which led to that important element being disregarded in this case? I ask this the more because, though I have the honour of being acquainted with Judge Beresford, I am acquainted with barristers who are conversant with the Welsh language, and eminently qualified to adorn the position. What are the distinguishing characteristics which led to the appointment of Mr. Beresford in disregard of this admittedly important qualification, instead of others whom the Attorney General admits were capable, as capable, of performing the duties of the office? I think the Attorney General surrenders the whole case when he admits that there were others qualified to fulfil the duties, unless some supporter of the Government gets up and points out some distinguishing characteristics in the case. Names of other Judges have been mentioned as those of men we worthy of respect. Sir Horatio Lloyd was mentioned. He was a worthy and competent Judge, but he understood Welsh enough to check witnesses, and was imbued with a thorough knowledge of Welsh life, so that he could follow the reasoning of witnesses in describing their conduct on particular occasions. All his case proves, if he were not, that some man of great ability and special qualification may be so fitted for a post as to be able to surmount the great objection of want of knowledge of the language. There is another Judge, Mr Stevenson Owen, County Court Judge for Cardiff. The Attorney General said that he was Judge for the district of Brecknockshire and part of Glamorganshire. That is somewhat misleading. The most important part of his work is done in the English-speaking Courts of Cardiff and Newport, though he is also Judge of some small part of Brecknock. The Attorney General spoke of a memorial in Judge Beresford's favour. I do not think such memorials are to be preferred to the popular election of Judges, to which hon. Gentlemen opposite have such an objection. The right hon. Gentleman said that when it was proposed to remove him, every sect of politics and school of thought united in his favour. I should like to ask, why was it proposed to remove him, unless in obedience to a large national demand for his removal? I can hardly conceive it entering into the head of the Government, unless their conscience pricked them.—

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: I said I understood that, in consequence of some correspondence as to his non-speaking Welsh, a paragraph appeared in a paper to the effect that he was going to be removed, and that paragraph was repeated for some weeks.

MR. B. ROWLANDS: I thought he said it was proposed to remove Judge Beresford. I understand now that there was a tumult or excitement

ment in the country, which was shown by a large number of letters in newspapers, and articles pointing out that he was not so distinguished in other respects as to justify his being made an exception to the rule laid down so many years ago, which the Attorney General admits is very applicable to cases analogous to the present one. That there was this feeling—not against Mr. Beresford personally—is undeniable; there was a unanimous chorus of disapprobation of the appointment which was supposed, rightly or wrongly, not to be the work of the Lord Chancellor, who from his connection with Wales would have been desirous to do what was right and proper; it was supposed to be the result of some powerful motive with which the Lord Chancellor had no personal or immediate concern. If there were no particular motive, what was the reason of the appointment? Was it that his father had previously held the post of County Court Judge? The Attorney General referred to witnesses who spoke English. I do not quite understand the purport of it. He said that some witnesses about to speak in Welsh, the interpreter being sworn, answered in English instead. I have known great wrong to have been done in consequence of witnesses having been forced to speak in English who ought to have been allowed to speak in Welsh. They were able to understand the ordinary language of the oath in English, but were unable to follow the intricacies of a subtle argument, into which they were led by a skilful person. One of these Courts is in the county I represent, and I honestly believe, from my knowledge of these and other places, that a knowledge of Welsh is a very desirable thing. No one suggests that a knowledge of Welsh is to be so preferentially considered that eminent legal and other qualifications are to be deferred to it, but there is no claim of superior qualification in this case. The Attorney General says that one benefit of the Debate will be that the Resolution of 1872 will be brought into greater prominence, but he says the Government had taken it into consideration already. If these facts—the circumstances of the locality and the Resolution—had been committed to the hon. and learned Gentleman, he would, I am certain, have appointed a person satisfactory to the Welsh people in regard to his knowledge of Welsh. The Government have disregarded a Resolution passed by the House of Commons, and whether it be called contempt or disregard is a mere question of words. This gentleman was appointed to the dissatisfaction of the Welsh people, who expressed their feeling in every constitutional way, and they now speak through their Representatives and some who desire in the future to represent them, and the hon. Gentleman opposite found himself so placed that he was bound to rise and join in the unanimous denunciation.

SIR J. PULESTON: I particularly called attention to the fact that long ago, before the question was present to the mind of the hon. Gentleman, I had spoken in this House and elsewhere as strongly on it as I have spoken to-night.

MR. B. ROWLANDS: That is what I meant to say; he is able conscientiously, in accordance with his feelings, to join us in repeating his condemnation to which he has so patriotically given voice on other occasions, and which I cordially agree with.

(5.20.) MR. KENYON (Denbigh, &c.): I hold somewhat strong opinions on the Welsh language, especially in regard to its use and influence in Wales, but I hope not so much as to bias my judgment on this point. If we were to consider the Welsh language in all its bearings in this respect I am afraid some of us who represent Welsh constituencies might not occupy the positions that we do. When the question was raised some years ago I could only find one hon. Gentleman, the hon. Member for Merionethshire, who was capable of speaking Welsh. I do not, however, carry my loved Welsh to a ridiculous point. I am a lawyer myself, but, having never practised, I should like to look at this question quite apart from its legal aspect. It seems to me that this Resolution, passed in 1872, stands upon its own merits. It was proposed by a Welshman on one side of the House and accepted by a typical Welshman on the other side; but since it was passed, Governments, whether from this side or that, have refused to acknowledge the force of it. My knowledge exceeding half an acre. The answer to the second paragraph is in the negative.

MOTIONS.

---

TEACHERS' REGISTRATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Arthur Acland, Bill to provide for the Registration of Teachers, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Arthur Acland, Mr. Sydney Buxton, and Mr. Hobhouse.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 178.]

CORONERS' ACT (1887) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Sir Walter Foster, Bill to amend "The Coroners' Act, 1887," ordered to be brought in by Sir Walter Foster, Mr. Addison, Mr. Roby, Mr. H. S. Wright, Mr. Samuel Evans, and Mr. John Kelly.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 179.]

WOMEN COUNTY COUNCILLORS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. James Stuart, Bill to enable Women to be elected to, and to serve on, County Councils, ordered to be brought in by Mr. James Stuart, Mr. Henry J. Wilson, and Mr. Channing.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 180.]

AGRICULTURAL TENANTS IMPROVEMENTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Seale-Hayne, Bill to compensate Agricultural Tenants for all Improvements, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Seale-Hayne, Mr. Cobb, Mr. Channing, Mr. Thomas Ellis, Sir Bernhard Samuelson, Mr. Halley Stewart, and Mr. George Lambert.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 181.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

---

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

COUNTY COURT JUDGES IN WALES.

RESOLUTION.

(4.3.) MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I rise, Sir, to call attention to the recent appointment of a County Court Judge in Wales, and to move—

"That this House, in the interests of the due administration of justice, and in face of the Resolution of this House of the 8th March, 1872, regrets the appointment to the judgeship of a County Court District in which the Welsh language is generally spoken, of a gentleman who is unable to speak or understand that language."

Sir J. Gorst

In submitting this Resolution to House I wish at the outset to dis- any personal feeling and any desi make any personal attack upon gentleman who has been fortuna securing this appointment. I some experience of the courtesy which he treats professional men suitors; that disarms opposition or head. It is only as a matter of that I have brought this Resol before the House, and I think w justified in asking from the Mi responsible some explanation fo perpetration of what appears u monly like a job. The great ma of the people of the district over this Judge has control—the well-classes, the squirearchy and the t men—understand the English lang but the poorer classes have not cien practical acquaintance with enable them to conduct their e with anything like precision in County Court, which is pre-emin a Court of the poor. The artisan quarrymen, and the agricu labourers transact all their busin the Welsh language, and it is a strous injustice that to a distr which the vast majority of the l speak nothing but Welsh, a should be appointed to determine differences who does not unde the language in which they plead causes. It may, of course, be sai competent interpreters are app in these Courts, and I have no to say anything derogatory of gentlemen, but as a rule the professional men, who are acquainted with the English with the Welsh language, they very often fail thor to understand either the a or the questions. In Carnarvon Bangor the gentlemen who act terpreters have great knowledge language and great literary gifts Sir, it is impossible for an inter however skilful, to convey to the all the shades and differences of m in a witness's answers. In cases words are used which have a meaning the interpreter is real Judge. In 1872, on the Motion right hon. Member for East De shire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), the passed a Resolution to the effect

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable, in the interest of the due administration of justice, that the Judge of a County Court District in which the Welsh language is generally spoken should, so far as the limits of selection will allow, be able to speak and understand that language."

Now, here is a Judge recently appointed to a Welsh-speaking district, and it is not pretended that he has any knowledge whatever of the Welsh language, although there were at least half-a-dozen barristers qualified by their knowledge of the language amongst the applicants for this judgeship. The opinion of all classes throughout Wales is hostile to this appointment. Not merely Welsh Liberals deprecate it, but gentlemen who have no sympathy with the views of those sitting on this side of the House condemn it. Sir John Treleaven, the Bishop of Bangor, Dean Vaughan—men who do not hold strong political views—are agreed in condemning the action of the Government. In University and in legal circles the appointment is condemned. The Law Times says:—

"Lord Halsbury has appointed his brothers, his wife's relations, his friends' friends, and occasionally those who have done service to the Party; but it never seems to have occurred to him to be necessary that a man should be a good lawyer, and have some experience at the bar in order to be a good Judge."

Similar opinions have been expressed by other legal authorities, but I rest my case upon the Resolution of the House of Lords, and I think appointments of this character, in defiance of the express order of the House of Commons, really amounts to contempt. I beg to move the Resolution standing in my name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, in the interests of the due administration of justice, and in face of the Resolution of this House of 8th March 1872, regrets the appointment to the judgeship of a County Court District in which the Welsh language is generally spoken, of a gentleman who is unable to speak or understand that language."—(Mr. Lloyd-George,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, " That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*MR. DAVID THOMAS (Morthyr Tydvil): I desire, Sir, to second the

Motion, and I do so on precisely similar grounds to those upon which my hon. Friend based his case. I am sorry it should be necessary to dispel certain illusions which have taken hold of the mind of the people in England. It is suggested again that we are once more raising the cry of "Wales for the Welsh," and that we are endeavouring to foster the Welsh language. For my own part, I desire explicitly to repudiate that suggestion. We have no desire to raise any such cry, for that would imply a confession of our inability to compete with Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen upon equal grounds. Nor have we any desire to stimulate the Welsh language by artificial means. The Welsh language is very well able to take care of itself. But, Sir, what I wish to point out to the House is this: that the Resolution passed in 1872 refers particularly to this district to which Judge Beresford has been appointed, a district which forms one of the most Welsh parts of Wales. I do not know what the defence of the Government may be, or if they will set up any at all, but it has occurred to me that possibly this appointment was due to an oversight on their part. If they defend themselves by saying this is not a Welsh-speaking district, I would remind them that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Denbighshire raised the question in 1872 in relation to this very circuit to which Judge Beresford has been appointed. A larger number of people speak Welsh to-day than was the case in 1872, though I do not say that the proportion is larger; but, in consequence of the increase in population, the actual number is greater now than in 1872. The present Government has repeatedly recognised the necessity for appointing Welsh-speaking officials. That was done, for example, in the Factory Act and in the Mines Regulation Act. I have nothing to say against Judge Beresford. I have always heard him spoken of as an extremely fair-minded man, and until to-day I knew nothing about his connection with the Prime Minister. Upon his legal qualifications I do not feel competent to express any opinion, but I do say that the appointment of an English-speaking Judge to a Welsh-speaking district, in the face of the Resolution of 1872. is more or less a reflection on the Welsh-speaking barristers of the North and South Wales Circuits, and on the Welsh Stipendiary Magistrates, who are of sufficient standing for the post of County Court Judge. Selections from the Stipendiary Magistrates have already been made, as in the case of Judge Bishop and Judge Gwilym Williams. If the Government are prepared to defend the appointment, I hope the House will not hesitate to express its strong condemnation of the contempt shown by the Government for the Resolution passed in 1872. That Resolution requires not merely that ceteris paribus preference should be given to Welsh-speaking barristers, but that a Welsh-speaking barrister shall be appointed to the Mid Wales Circuit if a competent man can be found.

(4.20.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I can assure the hon. Gentlemen the Mover and the Seconder of this Amendment that I sympathise to a very great extent with what I may call the national sentiment to which they have referred in many of the observations they have made. I have not the slightest intention of saying a word in depreciation of the Welsh language, with which, unfortunately, I am not acquainted. But I confess that as this Amendment has been moved and seconded in language which suggests that a contempt of the Resolution of the House of Commons has been committed, I think it is desirable that the House should have a few facts, and should know a little more about the history of this matter. If what the hon. Gentlemen allege is a contempt of the House of Commons it is a contempt of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and many other right hon. Gentlemen who acted when the Resolution was much more recent than it is at the present time, have also been guilty. I am not going to draw distinctions between the barristers who could and who could not speak Welsh, because I have, in my present position, the privilege of knowing a great deal of the members of my profession, and I will assume the Mover and the Seconder of this Amendment said what was perfectly right when they said that there were gentlemen at the Bar who do possess a knowledge of Welsh, and who would be well qualified to discharge the duties of a County Court Judge. But having regard to the history of this Resolution and what has happened since, I would submit to those who proposed this Amendment, that in their somewhat severe strictures upon Her Majesty's Government they rather overshot the mark. The Resolution that was passed in 1872 was passed upon a question that referred to this particular Circuit—the Mid Wales Circuit. The first appointment made after the Resolution of 1872 was in October, 1874, when one of the most honoured of the County Court Judges was appointed, and I am quite sure that that Mr. (afterwards Sir) Horatio Lloyd, there never was a more competent man who sat upon the Bench. I believe that Sir Horatio Lloyd was not able to speak Welsh, and was not able to do more than understand a very little of it. He was appointed on his merits. I know Sir Horatio Lloyd has constantly been in Welsh-speaking districts, and I am not aware of a single complaint ever having been made against him based upon the fact that he was not able to speak the Welsh language. The next appointment that was made was in January, 1878, and it was that of a very distinguished lawyer, the father of the gentleman whose name has given rise to this Amendment. I knew him intimately; and though he did not wear a silk gown, there was no more distinguished lawyer. He was constantly consulted, as I know, in cases of great importance. Parts of the circuit over which Judge Beresford presided were most unquestionably in the Welsh-speaking districts. He was there for 13 years. Mr. Beresford presided with great satisfaction over his Court for all these years. (Cries of "No, no.") Hon. Members opposite must pardon me for saying that I speak with an intimate knowledge of the profession, and I am not aware of any suggestion ever made that he was not one of the most distinguished and competent of our County Court Judges. The next appointment was in February, 1884, me the right hon. Gentleman for Midlothian was Prime Minister; the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was Home Secretary, and Selborne was Lord Chancellor. At the time the Resolution of the House of Commons was well known. Who was appointed? Why, Mr. Bishop of Brecknockshire and Glamorgan, and he had no qualification whatever as to speaking Welsh. Let us argue the merits of the case; we know that the Government, and as a Member of it one who was a Welshman as my right hon. friend opposite, made appointment consistent with this Resolution, so to me to be very strong to action taken some seven years ago in contempt of that Resolution.

In October, 1884, Mr. Jones was appointed by the then Chancellor to the Circuit also covering Brecknock and parts of Glamorgan. In January, 1886, Mr. Jones was appointed; and I call the attention of the House to the fact that the late Chancellor, who is said to be in favour of the Resolution, sold a gentleman who did speak Welsh language. In July, 1885, on our coming into office, Mr. Jones was appointed. He is able to speak Welsh, although now a distinguished County Judge in districts where Welsh is not required. I desire, to point out that Her Majesty's Government, when they had to decide these questions on the advice of the Lord Chancellor, have made more appointments of Welsh-speaking Judges than any Government of the right hon.

for Midlothian. I am not going to say that his Honour, Judge Jones, is a better lawyer, or better qualified to sit as a County Court Judge than other members of the Bar. In fact, I was a little disposed to hear the hon. Member for Arfon limit the number of gentlemen equally well qualified.

The circumstances affecting Beresford were certainly unusual. He was a County Court Judge for many years in the adjoining district, 1. He had not been in good health during his later years, and Mr.

Cecil Beresford had sat for him repeatedly. I am doing no more than justice when I state that while so sitting as a Deputy Judge he gave universal satisfaction, and I do not believe that any professional Member of this House, who ever practised before him, will say anything to the contrary. And that is not all. There came from the district in which he had sat as a Judge—a district in which, according to the contention of the hon. Member and Seconder of this Motion, a Welsh-speaking Judge was required—a very largely signed Petition asking for his appointment. I do not suppose the gentlemen who presented that Petition were indifferent to the consideration as to a Welsh-speaking Judge, and I dare say they were ignorant of the Resolution of the House of Commons, which had been disregarded on five or six occasions before. But Mr. Beresford was appointed accordingly. His Honor Judge Bishop, who was then Judge of Circuit No. 28, Mid-Wales, was transferred to the Circuit over which the late Judge Beresford had presided, and Mr. Beresford was appointed to No. 28. I have taken some pains to inform myself as to what has happened during the time Mr. Beresford has been sitting as Judge, and it is no exaggeration to say that when the question arose of his removal to another place, persons of all parties and all sections of the Press, without regard to politics, expressed a hope that he would not be removed. I think it is only common fairness to an absent Member of the Government to ask hon. Members to come to the conclusion that he fairly considered this point on its merits, especially as he had himself on two previous occasions appointed a gentleman who could speak Welsh, and I would suggest to this House that the idea of a contemptuous intention to disregard the Resolution of 1872 is an exaggeration. I do not wish to argue at any length the question of the necessity of appointing Welsh-speaking Judges. I am not going to suggest that it should not be taken into consideration; but I do know this, from barristers practising in these Courts, that repeatedly witnesses who are examined in Welsh answer in English, and also ask that questions in the face of the Resolution of 1872, is more or less a reflection on the Welsh-speaking barristers of the North and South Wales Circuits, and on the Welsh Stipendiary Magistrates, who are of sufficient standing for the post of County Court Judge. Selections from the Stipendiary Magistrates have already been made, as in the case of Judge Bishop and Judge Gwilym Williams. If the Government are prepared to defend the appointment, I hope the House will not hesitate to express its strong condemnation of the contempt shown by the Government for the Resolution passed in 1872. That Resolution requires not merely that ceteris paribus preference should be given to Welsh-speaking barristers, but that a Welsh-speaking barrister shall be appointed to the Mid Wales Circuit if a competent man can be found.

*(4.20.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I can assure the hon. Gentlemen the Mover and the Seconder of this Amendment that I sympathise to a very great extent with what I may call the national sentiment to which they have referred in many of the observations they have made. I have not the slightest intention of saying a word in depreciation of the Welsh language, with which, unfortunately, I am not acquainted. But I confess that as this Amendment has been moved and seconded in language which suggests that a contempt of the Resolution of the House of Commons has been committed, I think it is desirable that the House should have a few facts, and should know a little more about the history of this matter. If what the hon. Gentlemen allege is a contempt of the House of Commons it is a contempt of which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and many other right hon. Gentlemen who acted when the Resolution was much more recent than it is at the present time, have also been guilty. I am not going to draw distinctions between the barristers who could and who could not speak Welsh, because I have, in my present position, the privilege of knowing a great deal of the members of my profession, and I will assume the Mover and the Seconder of this Amendment said what was perfectly right when they said that t were gentlemen at the Bar who possess a knowledge of Welsh, and would be well qualified to disch the duties of a County Court Ju But having regard to the his of this Resolution and what happened since, I would submit those who proposed this Amment, that in their somewhat se strictures upon Her Majesty's Gov ment they rather overshot the rr The Resolution that was passe 1872 was passed upon a que that referred to this particular circuit—the Mid Wales Circuit. first appointment made after the R lution of 1872 was in October, 1 when one of the most honoured of County Court Judges was appou and I am quite sure that than (afterwards Sir) Horatio Lloyd, t never was a more competent man sat upon the Bench. I believe tha Horatio Lloyd was not able to speak Welsh, and was not able to more than understand a very litt it. He was appointed on his me I know Sir Horatio Lloyd has stantly been in Welsh-speaking tricts, and I am not aware of a s complaint ever having been made ag him based upon the fact that he not able to speak the Welsh lang The next appointment that was r was in January, 1878, and it was of a very distinguished lawyer, father of the gentleman whose n has given rise to this Amendment knew him intimately ; and thoug did not wear a silk gown, there no more distinguished lawyer. was constantly consulted, as I k in cases of great importance. Part the circuit over which Judge B ford presided were most unquestion in the Welsh-speaking districts. was there for 13 years. Mr. Bere presided with great satisfaction his Court for all these years. (Cr. "No, no.") Hon. Members opp must pardon me for saying that I s with an intimate knowledge of the fession, and I am not aware of suggestion ever made that he was nc of the most distinguished and comp of our County Court Judges. The appointment was in February,

Mr. David Thomas

at the time the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian was Prime Minister, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was Home Secretary, and Lord Selborne was Lord Chancellor. At that time the Resolution of the House of Commons was well known. Yet who was appointed? Why, Mr. Owen to Brecknockshire and Glamorganshire, and he had no qualification whatever as to speaking Welsh. I will not argue the merits of the case; but we know that the Government, which had as a Member of it one who is as much a Welshman as my right hon. Friend opposite, made appointments inconsistent with this Resolution. It seems to me to be very strong to speak of action taken some seven years later as being in contempt of that Resolution. In October, 1884, Mr. G. Williams was appointed by the then Lord Chancellor to the Circuit also including Brecknock and parts of Glamorganshire. In January, 1886, Mr. Bishop was appointed; and I call the attention of the House to the fact that the Lord Chancellor, who is said to be contemptuous of the Resolution, so appointed a gentleman who did speak the Welsh language. In July, 1885, just after our coming into office, Mr. Brynmor Jones was appointed. He also is able to speak Welsh, although he is now a distinguished County Court Judge in districts where Welsh speaking is not required. I desire, further, to point out that Her Majesty's Government, when they have had to decide these questions mainly on the advice of the Lord Chancellor, have made more appointments of Welsh-speaking Judges than the Government of the right hon. Member for Midlothian. I am not here to say that his Honour, Judge Beresford, is a better lawyer, or better qualified to sit as a County Court Judge, than other members of the Bar of that Circuit. In fact, I was a little surprised to hear the hon. Member for Carnarvon limit the number of other gentlemen equally well qualified to six. The circumstances affecting Mr. Beresford were certainly unusual. His father was a County Court Judge for 13 years in the adjoining district, Circuit 31. He had not been in good health during his later years, and Mr.

Cecil Beresford had sat for him repeatedly. I am doing no more than justice when I state that while so sitting as a Deputy Judge he gave universal satisfaction, and I do not believe that any professional Member of this House, who ever practised before him, will say anything to the contrary. And that is not all. There came from the district in which he had sat as a Judge—a district in which, according to the contention of the hon. Mover and Seconder of this Motion, a Welsh-speaking Judge was required—a very largely signed Petition asking for his appointment. I do not suppose the gentlemen who presented that Petition were indifferent to the consideration as to a Welsh-speaking Judge, and I dare say they were ignorant of the Resolution of the House of Commons, which had been disregarded on five or six occasions before. But Mr. Beresford was appointed accordingly. His Honor Judge Bishop, who was then Judge of Circuit No. 28, Mid-Wales, was transferred to the Circuit over which the late Judge Beresford had presided, and Mr. Beresford was appointed to No. 28. I have taken some pains to inform myself as to what has happened during the time Mr. Beresford has been sitting as Judge, and it is no exaggeration to say that when the question arose of his removal to another place, persons of all parties and all sections of the Press, without regard to politics, expressed a hope that he would not be removed. I think it is only common fairness to an absent Member of the Government to ask hon. Members to come to the conclusion that he fairly considered this point on its merits, especially as he had himself on two previous occasions appointed a gentleman who could speak Welsh, and I would suggest to this House that the idea of a contemptuous intention to disregard the Resolution of 1872 is an exaggeration. I do not wish to argue at any length the question of the necessity of appointing Welsh-speaking Judges. I am not going to suggest that it should not be taken into consideration; but I do know this, from barristers practising in these Courts, that repeatedly witnesses who are examined in Welsh answer in English, and also ask that questions may be put in English. I am not suggesting that there are no cases at times when knowledge of the language would be desirable, but I am referring to the general practice. I believe that for many years past every child in Wales has been taught English as well as Welsh. It is an honour to the Welsh nation that that should be so; but so far as this demand is concerned, it has been certainly decreasing in importance from 1872 down to 1891. I hope I have shown no feeling but one of sympathy with the national sentiment of Wales, for I have not the slightest intention of going in face of the Resolution of the House of Commons, or outraging the feelings of hon. Members from Wales; and I trust that those who may follow me will deal with my remarks in the same spirit as that in which I have addressed them in this House.

*(4.45.) MR. G. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I must say I am very much disappointed with the explanation which the hon. and learned Gentleman has offered. The only defence he has set up for the Government of which he is a Member is, that other Governments have done the same thing; but even if that were so, two blacks do not make a white. I do not regard this as in any way a Party question, and therefore I shall put aside all he has said on that subject. Now what are the facts? Mr. Horatio Lloyd, who, I believe, was appointed under the Government of the right hon. Member for Midlothian, does not speak the Welsh language; but, if my memory serves me, he told me on the occasion of his appointment that he was able to understand what Welsh witnesses said, and to check any mistakes they made. In February, 1884, Mr. Gwyn-Owen was appointed to the post, and I should have supposed that anyone bearing that name would speak Welsh. He was very soon after transferred to another post, and Mr. Gwilym Williams, one of the best Welsh scholars, I know, was appointed to it. From that time every County Court Judge who has held that post has been perfectly competent to deal with Welsh witnesses, and to speak and understand the language. The Attorney General says that he does not wish to argue the question of appointing Welsh-speaking Judges in Welsh-speaking districts, and I am not surprised, because the question is concluded by the Resolution of the House of Commons, which, if it means anything, means that if you can get a competent man who speaks the Welsh language, he should be appointed. The Resolution which I had the honour of bringing forward, and I am sorry to say I believe I am the only Member now left in the House of Commons who took part in the Debate on that occasion, dealt with the very circuit with which we are now dealing, and there never was a question so exhaustively debated, or a Resolution at which the House arrived with such perfect unanimity. The only shadow of objection to it was an old Statute of Henry VIII., which has since been repealed. Speaking on that occasion as the representative of the Government, my noble Friend Lord Aberdare, then Mr. Bruce, said legal fitness was, of course, always the first consideration; but he was sure, after what they had heard that night, that for the future Governments would have regard to a knowledge of Welsh in making these appointments. Are we to understand that there is a Government now in Office which has no regard to the qualification of speaking Welsh? because, if it is so, it is desirable that we should know it. I see the Home Secretary in his place, and remember the answer he gave in reply to a Motion I made as to the appointment of a Sub-Inspector, who could not speak Welsh, to a mining district in which the Welsh language was almost exclusively spoken. As soon as that appointment was made I had, as Chairman of Petty Sessions, to adjudicate upon a summons taken out by that gentleman against the lessees of the mine for a breach of the Mines Regulation Act. The prosecution broke down on other grounds, but in any case it must have broken down, because the Mining Inspector could not speak a word of Welsh, and those from whom he got his information could not speak a word of English, so that the whole of the proceedings had to be carried on in a sort of dumb show. That is not exactly the same case as this, but, at any rate, if the right hon. Gentleman had heard it argued, he would have felt as I do, that it was wrong to appoint a gentleman to that office who could not speak the Welsh language. The hon. Gentleman the Attorney General did not put forward any kind of defence against the Motion, for he did not even suggest that a good man could not have been found who could speak Welsh. It used to be said, when complaints were made of the non-appointment of Welsh-speaking Bishops, that you could not find a Welshman competent to take the post, but that objection is now never raised, and whatever we may think of the political or other opinions of the Welsh Bishops, abler men do not sit upon the Episcopal Bench. What I want to impress upon the hon. and learned Gentleman is the fact that it is not only important that we should have men who will administer justice duly, but that the people before whom they administer it should be perfectly confident that it is so administered; and unless you have a man who is familiar with the Welsh people and the Welsh language, it is perfectly impossible that such a feeling of confidence can be created. I do not think it necessary to argue the question any further, for it is really concluded by the Resolution, and as long as it stands on the Order Book of this House, to treat it as my hon. and learned Friend has just done is to treat it as if it were nothing better than waste paper. If the answer we have heard from him is all the Government can give, I sincerely trust that my hon. Friend will persevere with his Motion, and I shall be very happy to support it.

(4.55.) SIR J. PULESTON (Devonport): I have never wavered in my contention in favour of the principle of the Motion now moved by the hon. Member opposite, and on more than one occasion, when the question has been raised during the nearly 19 years in which I have been in this House, I have always taken exactly the same position as I do now, namely, that a Welsh-speaking barrister should always be appointed to a County Court Judgeship in the Principality. The right hon. Gentleman opposite found it convenient, in view of the facts presented by the Attorney General, to say this was not a Party question; but he will not hesitate to call it a Party question directly he gets outside this House, and he will take very good care not to explain his want of Welsh patriotism in failing to call attention to this question within a few years after the passing of his own Resolution. He passed over, in solemn silence, jobs committed by the Government of which he was himself a Member. Reference has been made to the case of Mr. Brynnor Jones. It was generally understood that there was no more brilliant man at the Bar, but when he was appointed it so happened he had just been defeated as the Liberal candidate for Mid Glamorgan.

MR. S. EVANS: Mr. Jones never was a candidate for that constituency.

SIR J. PULESTON: He was a well-known politician, and while I apologise very gladly for what I have said, I may explain that he was, at all events, mentioned in the papers as a possible candidate. I do not defend this appointment of Mr. Beresford. On the contrary, I condemn it in the strongest possible manner, and I shall vote gladly in favour of the Resolution; but I think that the Lord Chancellor probably did not have in his mind the Resolution of the House of Commons, and did have regard to precedents set by former Liberal Governments. He had other reasons, however, to suppose that the appointment of Mr. Beresford would be acceptable in Wales, for a memorial was presented which I believe was signed by an hon. Member opposite.

MR. S. EVANS: I did not sign the memorial, and I refused to do so.

SIR J. PULESTON: My authority is a paper published in his own part of Wales, and I regret that I have been misled into that statement. I do not admit that such circumstances ever occur that there is not one Welshman to be found in eight or ten years fitted to occupy the position of County Court Judge. I do not know how many applicants there were for this post, but I know several men eminent at the Bar and thoroughly conversant with the Welsh language—including a Member of this House—who would have adorned the position. I agree that what has been said does not suggest that Mr. Beresford had not the proper legal qualifications for the post, and I regret that the hon. Member, after stating that, should have thought it necessary to read an extract from a letter to the Law Times condemnatory of his qualification. I hope, now that the question has been again so prominently brought forward, no appointments will in future be made in contravention of the Resolution passed in 1872. Apart from the question of the Welsh language, which is a very serious matter, we claim that we have a sentimental right to have Welshmen in Welsh places, especially as a knowledge of Welsh is essential to the right administration of justice in peculiarly Welsh districts. It is impossible to administer justice with equity through the medium of an interpreter; we know the difficulty in our own English Courts. I trust that, in future, no Lord Chancellor of any Party will venture to disregard the national aspirations and national feelings of justice and right which is attached to the appointment of Welsh County Court Judges.

(5.5.) MR. BOWEN ROWLANDS (Cardiganshire): I only desire, Sir, to say a few words on the observations which fell from the Attorney General, and first, as usual, I am bound to congratulate him upon the admirable tone and temper in which he dealt with the question. I did not expect anything else, but I was surprised at the weakness of the case he made out. He confessed that a knowledge of Welsh is an important element to consider in making the appointment of County Court Judges; then, I ask, what peculiar characteristics are there in the person now holding the post which led to that important element being disregarded in this case? I ask this the more because, though I have the honour of being acquainted with Judge Beresford, I am acquainted with barristers who are conversant with the Welsh language, and eminently qualified to adorn the position. What are the distinguishing characteristics which led to the appointment of Mr. Beresford in disregard of this admittedly important qualification, instead of others whom the Attorney General admits were capable, as capable, of performing the duties of the office? I think the Attorney General surrenders the whole case when he admits that there were others qualified to fulfil the duties, unless some supporter of the Government gets up and points out some distinguishing characteristics in the case. Names of other Judges have been mentioned as those of men well worthy of respect. Sir Horatio Lloyd was mentioned. He was a worthy and competent Judge, but he understood Welsh enough to check witnesses, and was imbued with a thorough knowledge of Welsh life, so that he could follow the reasoning of witnesses in describing their conduct on particular occasions. All his case proves, if he were not, that some man of great ability and special qualification may be so fitted for a post as to be able to surmount the great objection of want of knowledge of the language. There is another Judge, Mr. Stevenson Owen, County Court Judge for Cardiff. The Attorney General said that he was Judge for the district of Brecknockshire and part of Glamorganshire. That is somewhat misleading. The most important part of his work is done in the English-speaking Courts of Cardiff and Newport, though he is also Judge of some small part of Brecknock. The Attorney General spoke of a memorial in Judge Beresford's favour. I do not think such memorials are to be preferred to the popular election of Judges, to which hon. Gentlemen opposite have such an objection. The right hon. Gentleman said that when it was proposed to remove him, every section of politics and school of thought united in his favour. I should like to ask, why was it proposed to remove him, unless in obedience to a large national demand for his removal? I can hardly conceive it entering into the head of the Government, unless their conscience pricked them—

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: I said I understood that, in consequence of some correspondence as to his not speaking Welsh, a paragraph appeared in a paper to the effect that he was going to be removed, and that paragraph was repeated for some weeks.

MR. B. ROWLANDS: I thought he said it was proposed to remove Judge Beresford. I understand now that there was a tumult or excitement in the country, which was shown by a large number of letters in newspapers, and articles pointing out that he was not so distinguished in other respects as to justify his being made an exception to the rule laid down so many years ago, which the Attorney General admits is very applicable to cases analogous to the present one. That there was this feeling—not against Mr. Beresford personally—is undeniable; there was a unanimous chorus of disapprobation of the appointment which was supposed, rightly or wrongly, not to be the work of the Lord Chancellor, who from his connection with Wales would have been desirous to do what was right and proper; it was supposed to be the result of some powerful motive with which the Lord Chancellor had no personal or immediate concern. If there were no particular motive, what was the reason of the appointment? Was it that his father had previously held the post of County Court Judge? The Attorney General referred to witnesses who spoke English. I do not quite understand the purport of it. He said that some witnesses about to speak in Welsh, the interpreter being sworn, answered in English instead. I have known great wrong to have been done in consequence of witnesses having been forced to speak in English who ought to have been allowed to speak in Welsh. They were able to understand the ordinary language of the oath in English, but were unable to follow the intricacies of a subtle argument, into which they were led by a skilful person. One of these Courts is in the county I represent, and I honestly believe, from my knowledge of these and other places, that a knowledge of Welsh is a very desirable thing. No one suggests that a knowledge of Welsh is to be so preferentially considered that eminent legal and other qualifications are to be deferred to it, but there is no claim of superior qualification in this case. The Attorney General says that one benefit of the Debate will be that the Resolution of 1872 will be brought into greater prominence, but he says the Government had taken it into consideration already. If these facts—the circumstances of the locality and the Resolution—had been committed to the hon. and learned Gentleman, he would, I am certain, have appointed a person satisfactory to the Welsh people in regard to his knowledge of Welsh. The Government have disregarded a Resolution passed by the House of Commons, and whether it be called contempt or disregard is a mere question of words. This gentleman was appointed to the dissatisfaction of the Welsh people, who expressed their feeling in every constitutional way, and they now speak through their Representatives and some who desire in the future to represent them, and the hon. Gentleman opposite found himself so placed that he was bound to rise and join in the unanimous denunciation.

SIR J. PULESTON: I particularly called attention to the fact that long ago, before the question was present to the mind of the hon. Gentleman, I had spoken in this House and elsewhere as strongly on it as I have spoken to-night.

MR. B. ROWLANDS: That is what I meant to say; he is able conscientiously, in accordance with his feelings, to join us in repeating his condemnation to which he has so patriotically given voice on other occasions, and which I cordially agree with.

(5.20.) MR. KENYON (Denbigh, &c.): I hold somewhat strong opinions on the Welsh language, especially in regard to its use and influence in Wales, but I hope not so much as to bias my judgment on this point. If we were to consider the Welsh language in all its bearings in this respect I am afraid some of us who represent Welsh constituencies might not occupy the positions that we do. When the question was raised some years ago I could only find one hon. Gentleman, the hon. Member for Merionethshire, who was capable of speaking Welsh. I do not, however, carry my loved Welsh to a ridiculous point. I am a lawyer myself, but, having never practised, I should like to look at this question quite apart from its legal aspect. It seems to me that this Resolution, passed in 1872, stands upon its own merits. It was proposed by a Welshman on one side of the House and accepted by a typical Welshman on the other side; but since it was passed, Governments, whether from this side or that, have refused to acknowledge the force of it. My knowledge of Welshmen is sufficient to enable me to say how deeply it touches the Welsh people that, in matters connected with their official arrangements, in matters where their real interests are concerned, where evidence is tendered in the Welsh language, the officials are not able to understand it. Surely, Sir, the spirit of the Resolution meant that, where possible, Welsh Judges were to be appointed. Now that the question has been brought up, I think we may fairly ask the Government to give us a further promise that the spirit of the Resolution shall be acted on honestly and in the full sense, and every sense, of the word. I have had some little experience of the smaller Courts, and I can honestly say this : that it has been a great trouble to me that I have not been able to master the Welsh language. I would venture to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether something more positive than a mere reiteration of his promise can be given to us, and whether in the future we may congratulate ourselves that, in the interests of the administration of justice in Wales, those difficulties which have hitherto attended it in the Principality, and of which we complain, shall be removed, and that fair-play will be given to the Members of the Principality, independent of politics or creed.

(5.35.) MR. ABEL THOMAS (Carmarthen, E.): I think it is impossible for the Attorney General to maintain that the appointment to which the Resolution refers was made upon its merits, having regard to the choice the Lord Chancellor had at the time of several other gentlemen of large practice at the Bar, and of large experience, who could speak and understand the Welsh language. I think I can say with accuracy that I have had as great experience in Mid Wales and some of those districts just referred to as most other people. I know the whole of the district, and I know the gentlemen whose names the Attorney General read out, and all the facts connected with their appointment. Those appointments by no means meet the point in dispute, and it is therefore no answer to the case put forward by the Welsh Members to-night. Sir Horatio Lloyd was a man of very large practice. Mr. Judge Beresford, although it was a mistake to have appointed him to a Welsh district still would have made a most excellent Judge if appointed to England. I cannot understand why he should be sent into Cardiganshire, where he would have Welsh witnesses before him. But he was a good man at the same time. The next appointment to which the Attorney General referred was that of Mr. Gwynne Owen, who, it is true, was appointed by a Liberal Government. He was a Welshman, and a well-known Welshman—but neither speaking nor understanding Welsh—and he was removed from Mid Wales to an English-speaking district. He was a most excellent Judge. There was a large settlement of English-speaking people in and around the district, and the fact that he was removed to it from Wales because he was unable to speak Welsh shows the force of the case we are now complaining of. The next appointment was that of Mr. Gwilym Williams. He speaks Welsh very well. The next is Mr. Judge Bishop, who was appointed for Mid Wales, and who speaks Welsh very well ; I have heard him many times, and he both understands and speaks it. The next was Mr. Brynmor Jones, who was appointed to Mid Wales, but who was removed to another district. These were the appointments to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, and I say it is no answer to the case. I know the circuit well, and I could point to many names of men, some of them of longer experience, and some of infinitely greater worth at the Bar than Mr. Cecil Beresford ; three of these were of greater ability and could speak Welsh, and they were passed over for a man who could not speak Welsh. Having had before them the Resolution of the House, that in Welsh-speaking districts like Mid Wales gentlemen who had a knowledge of the Welsh language should be appointed, if possible, for County Court Judgeships, I say it is absurd to contend that the appointment of Judge Beresford was made upon its merits. It has been said that there were petitions presented in favour of the appointment of that gentleman. Are we going to appoint our Judges upon petitions ? Surely that is no proper reason for the selection, seeing how easily etitions can be got up upon one side or the other, and I am surprised that petitions should be put forward as justification of the appointment. Just imagine a man who is seeking for an appointment as a County Court Judge having to rely upon a round robin in his favour, or having to rely upon petitions in order to get the Lord Chancellor to give him the appointment. Why, we all know how easy it is to get up such petitions. It has been stated by the Attorney General that the appointment has been received with acclamation, and that it has been regarded by the public with favour, but he did not go to the proper quarter for evidence of this.

Mr. Kenyon

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: I stated that I had it from all sections and parties, and from quotations from public newspapers.

MR. ABEL THOMAS: I suppose he has had copies of newspapers sent him, it that is not the way to arrive at what is the public sentiment. Mere statements in Party newspapers go for little in such matters. Nor is it conclusive when a certain number of gentlemen practising in Mr. Judge Beresford's Court sign a document stating that they believe it to be a most excellent appointment. Let the hon. and learned Gentleman go to the bar whose cases are to be tried in Court. The vast majority of cases are generally only relating to small debts of a few shillings, and most of the visitors speak only Welsh, and have to rely upon the Court interpreter provided for them. It is in such cases that injustice is done; not in big cases, where solicitors can be employed who understand the case. In Cardiff and in other large and populous centres, where those heavy actions are tried, there may be little injustice in having a Judge who is not acquainted with the Welsh language; but in small places in the Welsh-speaking district, where poor men go into Court, it is of the greatest importance to have a judge who speaks and understands the language. I have seen injustice done over and over again in consequence simply of the Judge's ignorance of Welsh. It is done inadvertently; he tries to do his best. Take the interpreter. He generally is an educated man, and yet you have the solicitor correcting him over and over again because of the fact that the idioms of the languages are so different. Such a Court is that to which Judge Beresford was appointed. I say if you are going to appoint County Court Judges because of the fact that they sit for their father, you are not likely to find the right man. The Lord Chancellor must have known of his own knowledge the South Western Circuit of Cardiff, and he must have known that there are men of much larger business and experience than Mr. Beresford at the Bar who would have thoroughly understood the language and been popular with the people if any one of them had been selected. If it were a matter of politics these were men who were known to be Conservatives, and not Liberals. I say this was not an appointment on its merits, and I hope the House will show that it is not going to permit a definite Resolution passed by it to be set aside without any decent pretext, and that the House will accept the Motion.

(5.45.) MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): As an independent supporter of Her Majesty's Government I regret I cannot upon this occasion go into the Lobby with them. I feel it to be my duty to vote with the hon. Members opposite in case of a Division being taken. I had confidently hoped that the Government would have been able to say that the reason why they did not appoint a gentleman who was able to speak Welsh was because they could not find any member of the Bar having that as well as the other necessary qualifications. But the Attorney General did not take that ground of defence. It was not suggested that there were not such gentlemen; the only defence was that the Liberal Lord Chancellor had also disregarded the Resolution of 1872. Now, two wrongs do not make a right—and that is no defence at all. Having regard to the Resolution of 1872, which I think is more required at present than when it was passed, and looking at the case as put by the other side, and the way it has been answered, I shall feel it my duty to vote against the Government.

(5.50.) MR. SAMUEL T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid.) : I think it is observable, and everyone who has spoken, with the single exception of the Attorney General, has spoken against the conduct of the Lord Chancellor. It is a curious fact that we are discussing an appointment of a County Court Judge to the very Circuit in reference to which this Resolution of 1872 was passed. Nobody has been able to deny that this is a Welsh district, that the vast majority of the people speak Welsh, and Welsh only; and that it is, therefore, a district which came within the Resolution. There are also many barristers on the Welsh Circuits who could speak the language, who are otherwise qualified. Let me say that we are not attacking the Government upon this matter. The appointment was made by the Lord Chancellor, and it is his conduct we challenge. The Attorney General seemed to take it for granted that the Lord Chancellor did not act in forgetfulness of this Resolution, and one hon. Gentleman told us that the Lord Chancellor did not have this Resolution in his mind.

SIR J. PULESTON : I said that I assumed he had not; I had no authority.

MR. S. EVANS : I so understood the hon. Member. We may now take it for granted that the Government is the keeper of the Lord Chancellor's conscience. In regard to the defence of the Attorney General, it appears to me to be this : that Mr. Cecil Beresford was appointed by the Lord Chancellor, who knew that he had not a knowledge of the Welsh language, who knew that it was a Welsh-speaking district, and who knew that there were other men on the Circuit well qualified. I think the whole defence of the Lord Chancellor has crumpled into atoms. As for Mr. Beresford's merits—

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER : I said I would not discuss the merits of Mr. Beresford; but my refusal must not be taken to indicate that the gentleman was not considered to be the best candidate for the appointment.

MR. S. EVANS : We hear it now for the first time that those applicants for the post who could speak Welsh were not well qualified in other respects.

SIR RICHARD WEBSTER : So well qualified.

MR. S. EVANS : I venture to affirm that they are. I have had the honour of practising before Mr. Cecil Beresford, and although I do not say he is unfit to discharge the duties of a County Court Judge, I will answer without hesitation that there are other men attached to the Welsh Bar who speak Welsh, and who are quite as well qualified as he from a legal point of view. It might be interesting to know that when County Courts were first established in Wales the Judges were most perfectly conversant with the Welsh language. If we only brought this matter on for the first time to-day, we should have an abundantly strong case, but we have the Resolution of the House to further strengthen it. This is a Resolution of the House of Commons; the Lord Chancellor is the Speaker of the House of Lords, and if we have any respect for ourselves at all as a Democratic Assembly we will express the sense of the House at the Lord Chancellor in another House conducting himself in such a way as to disregard the Resolution of this House. The Attorney General has expressed his sympathy with Welsh national sentiments; but we should be much more thankful if he practically illustrates it by going into the Lobby in support of the Resolution, as there is little use expressing sympathy with nations sentiments and then disregarding them.

*(5.55.) MR. CHARLES J. DARLING (Deptford) : It appears that not only are Members prompted by a desire to abuse the County Court Judge for Mid Wales, but that they are prompted by a desire to attack the Lord Chancellor; that the desire this Democratic Assembly to pass a Resolution because it welcomes an opportunity to inflict some injury, some stigma, some insult upon him as Speaker of the House of Lords. How is the Lord Chancellor to meet this? He is not able to come to this House, fortunately, perhaps, for some Members. But it has been shown by the Attorney General that since the Resolution was passed appointments of a similar character have been made by the other side. Understood the Attorney General to say that the Lord Chancellor had not this Resolution present to his mind. ("No.") I understood him to say so. I understood him to say that the Lord Chancellor had forgotten it when appointing Mr. Beresford, as Lord Selborne had forgotten it when he appointed Mr. Owen, a gentleman who could not speak Welsh, but had only a somewhat Welsh name. Nor is this forgetfulness to be wondered at, having regard to the number of Resolutions of this House. I admit that it is not likely that any appointment to a Welsh Judgeship will be made in the future by Lord Halsbury without some regard being paid to this Resolution. What may be done when a Liberal Government comes into Office I can only judge of by the case of Mr. Owen. It seems to me that the matter might be allowed to drop, because no good can be done by the passing of this Resolution more than has been done already. That being so, I have no difficulty in voting against it.

*(6.4.) MR. ALFRED THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): I have to say that I believe it is almost impossible that justice can be done under any other circumstances than those indicated in the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvon. I heard of a very remarkable case that occurred some months ago in the Court in which Judge Gwilym Williams sits. I wrote to Judge Williams and asked him to give me the particulars of the case; and with the permission of the House I will read his reply:—

"Miskin Manor, Pontyclun,
"February 18th, 1892.

"Dear Mr. Thomas.—The case, I think, to which you refer is that of a man who had failed to make himself understood to the Registrar, and on whom an order was made and a judgment summons issued, and on this being heard before me I discovered his utter ignorance of English, and that he was not indebted to his creditor, the result being that I struck out the case. I am of opinion that the mistake arose from the man's ignorance of English, and my knowledge of Welsh prevented a further miscarriage of justice."

I consider that a very strong case indeed, and no comment is needed upon it. I have also known similar cases of the miscarriage of justice in the Criminal Courts. I know one case where a man was tried for murder, and was sentenced to the extreme penalty of the law. The man did not know that he was sentenced to death until the gaoler who was putting him into the cells explained to him in Welsh that sentence of death had been passed upon him. I have heard a great deal in this Debate regarding appointments. I have no wish—I disclaim any desire—to cast any aspersion on His Honor Judge Beresford. Except that he does not speak the Welsh language, I believe he is a most excellent Judge. But with regard to the appointment, I am sorry that the Lord Chancellor did not follow the precedent which occurred with regard to the appointment of Judge Gwilym Williams. There never was an appointment made to a County Court judgeship in Wales that was more popular than that of Judge Gwilym Williams, who was promoted from being a Stipendiary Magistrate. I regret that the precedent has not been followed in the case of Judge Beresford, and that the Stipendiary Magistrate who succeeded Judge Gwilym Williams has not been appointed, or another Stipendiary Magistrate, the Stipendiary Magistrate for Cardiff, who, I believe, would have been equally qualified to fill the position. Let me say, in conclusion, that I heartily hope that some good will come of the present Debate, and that gentlemen will be appointed in future who can be reasonably expected to do justice to this position.

(6.7.) MR. DAVID RANDELL (Glamorganshire, Gower): In rising to support this Motion I have no desire to say anything against Judge Beresford. On the contrary; from my experience of him he seems extremely courteous to suitors and gentlemen practising in his Court; and he shows consideration for the disabilities of Welsh witnesses in allowing their evidence to be interpreted. But the very anxiety and solicitude shown by the late Judge Beresford in getting the evidence of Welsh witnesses interpreted into English seems to me to be the strongest argument in favour of this Motion and the appointment of Welsh-speaking Judges. I have often heard the late Judge Beresford defend Welsh witnesses from unjust attacks made upon them in reference to the allegation of perjury. Indeed, the Judge has himself many times in his Court alluded to the difficulty of Welsh witnesses in making themselves properly understood. I would wish to call attention to the fact that gentlemen, when appointed to judicial posts in India, are supposed to possess the indispensable qualification of a knowledge of the language of the native population; and if that is a precedent that has been established in this House in reference to appointments in India, surely that qualification ought to be indispensable in relation to judicial appointments nearer home—namely, in the Principality. I think, myself, that it is a somewhat humiliating position for Judges in County Courts in Wales to occupy; to be helplessly in the hands of Welsh witnesses, and oftentimes ignorant interpreters. I am of opinion, having had considerable experience in County Courts in Welsh districts, that it is absolutely necessary to appoint Judges conversant with the Welsh language. On personal grounds I wish to say that I would have much preferred that this discussion had arisen on another appointment; but, on general and public grounds, I must unhesitatingly, and without any qualification, vote for the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Carnarvon, and I trust it will have support from all sides of the House.

(6.10.) MR. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Glamorgan, Rhondda): It needs no apology on the part of the Welsh Members to call the attention of the House and the Government to the important question of the necessity of giving due recognition and consideration to a knowledge of the Welsh language in the case of judicial appointments. The present Government, I hope, will not think that all the Welsh Members here are attacking them on this question. Unfortunately for Wales, the previous Government have been guilty of the same thing. I quite agree with the Attorney General that the question should not be made a Party question. It is not a Party question, and I am very glad to find that there are Conservatives, inside and outside of this House, that have raised the question above Party considerations, and pride themselves on defending their own language, the language of their Mother Country, and the necessity thereof, especially in all judicial appointments, in Wales. More than that, I believe that a number of the right hon. Gentlemen who are sitting on that Front Bench this afternoon, if we were to know their inner thoughts, their heart of hearts—that they are in full sympathy with us on this question—and that they are compelled to be there to defend the bungling and stupidity of the Lord Chancellor. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary has already recognised this necessity for Wales in a less important question than this one. I believe there are other gentlemen who are quite as ready to give a proper recognition in this matter. I am very glad to find that there is such a unanimity of opinion on this question outside of the House as well as inside of the House. I should like to call attention to the fact that this district is one of the most essentially Welsh districts in the Principality. Mid-Wales County Court district extends along the west coast of Wales from Aberystwith to Pwllheli, including large portions of the Counties of Cardigan, Merioneth, and Carnarvon, where Welsh is the only language which the inhabitants easily understand. To say that His Honor Judge Beresford was able to conduct the business of his Court in another district which was an industrial district, and where English is largely spoken, is no justification whatever for his removal to another district which is essentially a Welsh-speaking district. I think a great mistake has been made, and I would call the attention of the Attorney General to this fact. This is not a Party question. It is a national question, and I am very glad to be able to inform this House that there is such a unanimity of opinion among typical Welshmen outside this House as well as inside this House as there never was upon any other question before. I should like to refer, among others, to a great number of letters which have been written to the South Wales Star condemning this appointment, and, in fact, bearing upon the general principle. I should like to read a brief letter from Sir John T. Llewelyn, Bart. He says that—

Mr. David Ranellid

"In consequence of my absence from home I have not received the South Wales Star, which you tell me you sent. I have, however, received your letter of the 23rd this morning; and in answer to your question, I beg to say I have always considered a knowledge of the Welsh language desirable as a qualification for legal and some other public appointments in the Welsh-speaking parts of Wales."

There are others representing the other side—from Sir William Thomas Lewis, a gentleman well-known in Wales for his ability, who has been appointed upon at least four Royal Commissions, and is now a member of three Royal Commissions; from Sir John M. Stinstin, and Mr. Lewis Morris. All these gentlemen hold different political opinions, still they are unanimous upon this necessity. In this House you have a wonderful combination. Imagine for a moment; just think of it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan), a Gladstonian Liberal; then you have another, the hon. Member for West Denbigh (Colonel W. Cornwallis West), a Liberal Unionist; and the hon. Member for Denbigh Boroughs (Hon. George T. Kenyon), a Conservative. All these gentlemen are at one on this question. Take another group; you have the hon. Baronet the Member for Swansea District (Sir H. Hussey Vivian), representing Wales that was, with no professed knowledge of the Welsh language. You have the hon. Baronet the Member for Devonport (Sir John Henry Puleston), representing Wales that is, with a smattering of the Welsh language, but not quite sufficient for the continuity of Welsh arguments nor conversation. You have another; he is not a Baronet by title, but he is a true Welsh Baronet, the Member for Merioneth (Mr. Thomas Edward Ellis). He is a son of the land; he is able to speak the language perfectly, and makes no mistake about his letters. Here, again, you have three gentlemen, and these three are at one upon this question. You may go over Wales in this way, finding them in triplets here and there, and find them all at one upon this question. Allow me to say again, Mr. Speaker, that this is not a Party question, nor is it a question of a religious sect nor of religious creeds. I have a letter upon this very appointment, in the South Wales Star, from the Very Rev. the Dean of Llandaff (the Very Rev. C. J. Vaughan), in which he says—

"Sir.—The general principle can scarcely be gainsaid, and it is desirable that the Law should be administered, as well as the Gospel preached, by those who understand the language of the people. What practical difficulties may beset this application of the principle to particular cases I am scarcely competent to say."

I have another letter from Principal F. C. Edwards, D.D., Bala College, in which he says—

"Dear Sir,—I agree with you that a knowledge of Welsh is an essential qualification in any person, however eminent he may be, for legal and other public appointments in the Welsh-speaking parts of Wales. It is now practically acknowledged in ecclesiastical appointments. It is notorious that injustice is often unwittingly done in a Court of Law, because the jury understand neither counsel nor Judge. This accounts, in a measure, for the tendency of a Welsh jury to acquit the prisoner against the evidence or the Judge's summing up. I take exception only to the implied inference that every appointment of a Judge who does not know Welsh is a job. It may or may not be. My belief is, that those who make such appointments do not know the hardship they inflict upon the Welsh people generally. For this reason I thank you for raising the question and eliciting opinions upon it."

They all agree upon this question. It may be said of Wales on this question, that they have the Radicals and the Nonconformists on one hand, the Conservatives and the Churchmen upon the other hand—the lions and the lambs of Wales all lying down together, and led by my young friend, the Member for Carnarvon. They are perfectly unanimous upon the point; but I believe that the question is a question of justice and a question of necessity. I am not a lawyer, but fortunately I have a number of legal friends around me. I have been told that there is a maxim of law that a man should be tried by his peers, and I am told, also, that this is carried out as a general rule almost everywhere but in Wales. Why should the monoglot Welshman be placed at a disadvantage that no other member of the British Empire, that belongs to a distinct nationality having a language of its own, is placed at? In fact, Wales ought to be considered by England as the nearest of kin, as it were in a sense the loveliest, nay, I would almost say the best of her children. I claim that the relationship of England with Wales is closer than any other part of the United Kingdom. You cannot have a King in England without his being first a Prince of Wales. Why, then, should Wales be treated in such an exceptional way as it is—to have its national rights disregarded by this or any other Government? I do not think that any lawyer in the House would for a moment question the ability of the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General as a lawyer to sit upon Welsh questions. But supposing for a moment that this House was a County Court, and the right hon. Gentleman presided in that Court, and that I, a Welshman, appeared before him, and could not understand exactly what was going on, and supposing I would say "Mae'r Achos i'm erbyn yn holol annheg Siaradwch Gymraeg—parablwch eich geirian—Bhowch i'm chwaren-teg," what would he say? With all his knowledge of the law, and with all the kindness of his heart, he would be still unable to do me justice. Therefore, if that would be the case between him and me, what would it be between a Welshman and a gentleman who could not understand Welsh in the same position? That is the real difficulty; and, at all events, I have this opinion of the great English nation, that if they could for a moment substantiate those difficulties they would remove them at once, that they would do everything in their power to remove them. My position as a miner has given me occasion oftentimes to appear in Courts with some of my legal friends defending the cases of workmen, and I could point to a number of special occasions where, by the kindness of the Judge, I was allowed to interfere between Englishmen and Welshmen. I remember a case where an English employer, who did not understand the language of his workman, shouted out in Court that the man was perjuring himself; and the Judge, who was not a Welshman, but a kind-hearted man, of himself would have had no power to question this man had it not been for the fact that there was a Welshman in Court. Although I had no standing there, still I stood up in the Court, begged pardon of the Judge, and asked to be allowed to state the case. Again and again have I jumped up in Court and begged pardon of the Judge, and asked to be allowed to explain to him. When the case was explained to him, not only did the Judge declare that the man was right, but the manager would say the same thing. I could cite many instances of that kind, but I will only say that I have confidence that the Leader of the House will help us in this matter.

MR. J. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): Sir, I should have thought that the attention of the Attorney General having been drawn to this matter, the hon. and learned Gentleman would have sought the earliest opportunity of repairing the mistake he has made. The Attorney General has not been instructed to do anything of the kind. That being so, I can only say that if this gentleman is left to administer justice or injustice, and half of his Circuit is in the division which I represent, then, as opportunities will arise every Session on the County Court Vote for the discussion of his salary, this Government and succeeding Governments will not hear an end of the matter until the grievance of which we complain is removed.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Sir, I think everybody who has heard the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Rhondda Valley will have listened to it with very great sympathy, and certainly, so far as I am personally concerned, I may tell the hon. Gentleman that I heard it with a very large measure of agreement. The hon. Gentleman had two points in view in his speech. One was, if I may say so, the sentimental or national point of view; the other was the practical and legal point of view that arises when a Judge who presides in a Court does not understand the language of those who are called before him. With regard to the first point—the national point—I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I believe all the Judges in the County Courts of Wales who have been appointed for many years past have been Welshmen; and although, unfortunately, it is true that many of them do not understand the Welsh language, it has never occurred to the present Government, or to any of their predecessors, so far as I know, to do anything in the disposal of their Welsh patronage which could by any possibility hurt the feelings of even the most sensitive of the hon. Gentleman's fellow-countrymen. With regard to the most important issue raised by the hon. Gentleman and those who preceded him in Debate—the point connected with the language spoken by the County Court Judges—I would lay down a general proposition. I entirely agree with every single word that has been said as to its being an enormous advantage, other things being equal, that the Judge who presides over a Court should understand the language of every person called before him, whether as litigant or witness. And, Sir, I do not think that the Lord Chancellor or any of his predecessors have ever taken any other view, though perhaps the terms of the Resolution of twenty years ago may not always have been present in full strength in their minds. But while concurring in that general proposition, we cannot deduce from it that every County Court Judge who is to be appointed in Wales should be a gentleman speaking the Welsh language. If hon. Members will look back to the Debate of twenty years ago, in a House of very different complexion and composition, elected by a very different constituency, they will see that the Government of the day, headed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, did not accept the Amendment or Resolution in the terms in which it was put forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Denbighshire. On the contrary, they thought it necessary to add qualifying words, which were inserted obviously for the purpose of allowing the Lord Chancellor, if he thought the interests of justice or the interests of local administration required it, to appoint other than Welsh-speaking Judges. How has that Resolution been interpreted by successive Governments? Of course, I am not mentioning this point for the purpose of raising Party strife, or for the purpose of making comparisons between the merits or demerits of the various Parties. I think that, with perhaps one exception, we have avoided anything in the nature of Party recrimination in this Debate, and I am the last man to desire to introduce it. I only draw attention to this fact: that of all the Judges appointed by the very eminent men of both Parties who have filled the office of Lord Chancellor since 1872, only two, or possibly three, gentlemen have been appointed who actually spoke Welsh with facility, and decidedly the larger number, though Welshmen, were not acquainted with the Welsh tongue. The reason of this is that, rightly or wrongly—very likely wrongly; I do not pretend to prejudge the matter—the various Lord Chancellors in question conceived that though there were real objections to appointing a man who did not know Welsh, those objections were outweighed by the other qualifications possessed by the candidate. And I conceive that some such licence of judgment must be left to the Lord Chancellor, unless you are going to circumscribe, much more than was done in the Resolution passed by the House in 1872, the area within which there must be a Welsh-speaking Judge. The Circuit which is in question to-day, as in 1872, is, I am informed, the most Welsh-speaking Circuit. Yet I apprehend that even in that Circuit a very large proportion of the inhabitants know English as well as Welsh. I daresay the larger number know Welsh; many of course do not know Welsh, and a very large proportion know English as well as Welsh. I am informed that while Aberystwith is no doubt the centre of a very large Welsh-speaking population, that even there probably the majority of the inhabitants speak English as well as Welsh; whilst the important districts of Newtown and Welshpool are both very broadly composed of English-speaking rather than Welsh-speaking people; whilst that same district includes Radnorshire, which is, I am informed, an almost entirely English-speaking county, and part of Herefordshire, which is not only an English-speaking county, but is actually in England. Even in this most Welsh-speaking district there is an enormous population which is well served by the English County Court. Now, Sir, though Welsh is largely spoken in that Circuit, you would do a great injury to the purely English-speaking population if you limited every Lord Chancellor, under every circumstance of the case, to choose a Judge not from the relatively enormous number of members of the English Bar as a whole, but from the relatively restricted number of those who were Welshmen, and who are not only Welshmen, but speak Welsh. I am not suggesting for a moment that you may not find suitable men who can speak Welsh; but I say that, so far as the English inhabitants are concerned, if you lay down a rigid rule that a Lord Chancellor is to be bound to make his selection not from the English Bar as a whole, but from that practically small fraction acquainted with the Welsh tongue, then, to begin with, some inquiry should be held in order to mark out that area where the number of Welsh-speaking inhabitants is so great that a practical injustice would accrue to them from the appointment of an English-speaking Judge. It has not been maintained by a single speaker on the other side that Judge Beresford is not fitted for his office, or that he has not shown himself absolutely adequate to perform his duties. (Opposition cries of "No, no.") I do not wish to press the point too far; but, from all the information which has reached me, I am disposed to believe that Judge Beresford, who has already had experience as a County Court Judge in a part of Wales where Welsh is largely spoken, has given satisfaction. If the House were to adopt the Resolution it would be not merely a reflection upon the Lord Chancellor, but upon a gentleman who has for many years been carrying out the duties of a County Court Judge adequately in the past, and who is likely to do so efficiently in the future. That is surely a step we should not take. It can do no possible good. I should be perfectly ready to assent to any reasonable plan, if one can be proposed, for the delimitation of the Welsh-speaking area, so that in those districts where the Welsh language predominates it should be obligatory to appoint a Welsh-speaking Judge. So long, however, as you do not make that delimitation, you must allow licence to the Lord Chancellor; and by re-affirming the Resolution of 1872 and carrying this Amendment we shall do nothing to strengthen the Resolution already passed by the House of Commons. The Government fully agree and adhere to the terms of the Resolution of 1872, and our views of the importance of that Resolution have been strengthened by the Debate that has occurred. I can assure the House that a note will be taken of all that has been said this evening, and if it falls to the Government again to deal with the question of legal patronage in Wales, it will be guided by what has been said. But unless some plan can be devised for delimitation, I would earnestly deprecate the House taking a step which cannot serve the cause the Welsh Members have at heart, namely, the appointment of gentlemen speaking the Welsh language to deal with Welsh legal business. If the House were to pass the Resolution it would cast a most undeserved slight upon a very distinguished County Court Judge, and they would, at the same time, make an attack upon a Member of the Government which I, at all events, as his colleague and a Member of his Party, cannot admit to be justified and cannot acquiesce in.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman and with those who have said that this discussion ought to be kept quite free from Party politics. The right hon. Gentleman says the Government desired to adhere to and carry out the Resolution of 1872. But in order that they may abide by that Resolution, I should with great respect recommend that they should read it. It is perfectly plain that that preliminary process has not been performed either by the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down or by the Lord Chancellor. The right hon. Gentleman said the Resolution applied to the whole of Wales, and that unless you limited it, it would be impossible to carry it out. The Resolution does not apply to the whole of Wales, but it is specifically pointed out that it only applies to those parts of Wales where the Welsh language is generally spoken. Therefore, Sir, the delimitation which the right hon. Gentleman desired has already been made, and is the basis of the Resolution, and the only qualification is, "as far as the limits of selection will allow." The Resolution does not speak of Wales generally, but of limited parts where the Welsh language is the predominant language; and the right hon. Gentleman thought he removed that argument by pointing out that in Welshpool, Radnorshire, and Newtown the English language is spoken. It is not suggested that you should appoint a man who cannot speak English, and it is astounding that logic should be expended upon a proposition of that character.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I must contradict the right hon. Gentleman's version of my speech. The injury I anticipated in the English-speaking parts was not in the fact that the Judge knew Welsh, but that if you made that necessary, the choice must be made from a very restricted number of men.

SIR WILLIAM HAROURT: I will come to that directly. I am now upon the Resolution, which is to this effect: that in the districts where the Welsh language is predominant, the Judge appointed shall be able to speak and understand the Welsh language—with this limitation, "so far as the limits of selection will admit." Now, what does that mean but that you are bound to appoint a man who can speak the Welsh language, and upon you lies the onus, when you depart from the principle laid down, of proving that within the limits of selection there was no such man available, possessing the necessary qualifications. I do not go back upon former cases, for I have no means of knowing what were the means of selection. What we have to do with is this particular appointment. Now, Sir, the Government have to show one of two things. They have either to show that this was done when the Resolution was not fully in view, and from that standpoint the hon. Member for Deptford (Mr. Darling) felt the weakness of the position. The Attorney General has not accepted it; the First Lord of the Treasury has not accepted it. The Lord Chancellor might say he had not the Resolution immediately under his notice. That was what the Member for Deptford tried to put into the mouth of the Attorney General; and I may say that it is not quite professional for a junior to put an argument of that kind into the mouth of his leader. The Government must either show that a properly qualified Welsh-speaking barrister could not be found, or that the Lord Chancellor acted per incuriam, without having fully in view the obligation imposed upon him by the Resolution of the House. If the Government had said, "This was an oversight, it was not done deliberately, and we will take the earliest opportunity of removing this gentleman, against whom nobody desires to say a word, and who, no doubt, is perfectly qualified, and put into that district a gentleman who can speak Welsh," that would have been what I call a business-like way of dealing with the matter. Nobody would have desired to press unduly on the Lord Chancellor. But that is not the course that has been taken. They have said this is a justifiable appointment, and that places us in a very difficult position. The Government are bound to tell us what were the overwhelming reasons which induced them to override the Resolution of 1872, and what was the great superiority of this gentleman over other gentlemen that made it necessary for them to depart from the Resolution. I listened to the elaborate ingenuity of the argument of the First Lord of the Treasury, but it never came near the real point, which is, that the House of Commons has said that you ought to appoint as Judges in Welsh-speaking districts men who can speak the Welsh language. If the House of Commons had not said so, every man of common sense would have held that opinion. Why have you not done it? Because the limits of selection did not allow it in this particular case? If so, it means that this individual was so greatly superior to every man who could talk the Welsh language as to overpower his ignorance of the Welsh language and oblige you to place him in that position. But has the right hon. Gentleman attempted to make that statement to the House? The Government have not asserted that, and it is a statement which they would find it very difficult to prove. That being the case, it seems to me that this appointment was distinctly contrary to the Resolution of 1872; and unless you wish to bring that Resolution into contempt, and to fly in the face of every obvious principle which it asserts, I do not think that you can do otherwise than vote for the Resolution. There has been no attempt whatever to show that, in this particular case, there was any necessity for departing from the principle of appointing a gentleman who could talk the Welsh language; and in the absence of any allegation of there being any reason or general principle

why the Resolution should not be adhered to, I cannot conceive, independently of Party considerations, why we should not give a unanimous vote on this occasion.

(7.3.) MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) : I cannot but express the great disappointment with which my hon. Colleagues on this side of the House have listened to the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury. We had hoped he would give us something besides a very clever dialectical argument. But no amount of dialectics will do away with the grievance felt by the peasantry on this subject. In this matter we have had to fight not only against the patronage of the Lord Chancellor, but against the patronage of every Minister. We have brought conviction home in the case of the Education Department; and the Home Secretary, in the matter of factory and mine inspection, has admitted into an Act of Parliament the principle for which we have contended; and the Prime Minister, in appointing Bishops, has admitted the same argument. No Prime Minister would think now of appointing anybody but a Welsh-speaking Bishop to a Welsh see. But in two Departments, the Inland Revenue and that of the Lord Chancellor, we still meet with this difficulty; and the appointment of County Court Judges, the Clerkships of Assize, and Revising Barristers is still a scandal to the administration of justice. I venture to ask the Government to give us a promise that His Honor Judge Beresford shall be removed to some English County Court District, and that on the first opportunity they will appoint a Welsh-speaking barrister to this thoroughly Welsh-speaking district.

Question put.

(7.10.) The House divided :—Ayes 166 ; Noes 143.—(Div. List, No. 4.)

Main Question again proposed.

THE BALLOT ACT—ILLITERATE VOTERS.

(7.20.) MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) : I rise to call attention to the infringement of the object of the Ballot Act for the protection of the voter from intimidation, practised by means of certain clauses in that Act permitting the illiterate to vote; and

Sir William Harcourt

I should have desired to move that, in the opinion of this House, in the interests of true freedom of election, the clauses in the Ballot Act which permit the illiterate to vote should be abolished. It appears to me that the Ballot Act tends to defeat its own object, for some of its clauses have lent themselves to the perpetration of intimidation of the worst description. What are the particular provisions which I maintain require amendment? They are contained in 35 & 36 Vict. (Parliamentary and Municipal Elections Act C. 33, Section 26), which permit that—“ Any voter who makes a declaration, a hereinafter mentioned, that he is unable to read, shall, in the presence of the agents of the candidates, cause the vote of such voter to be marked on a ballot paper in manner directed by such voter,” &c.

I find that in Italy, where they have universal suffrage, in America, where the electoral franchise can be obtained by all males after a short residence, no such system prevails which permits, or allows those who are so uneducated as to be unable to fill up a ballot paper, to exercise the franchise. My objection to this section is not based solely on the undesirability of giving to the uneducated electoral power; but that, under cover of this permission, intimidation can be and is practised—worse intimidation than, I believe, ever was practised under the old system of open voting to all, and of a more flagrant character than in elections in any other civilised State in the world. Those are the provisions with respect to illiterate voting, and in theory there may be little that is objectionable in them. But what have they been in practice? What was the object and intention of the alteration of the system of open voting in this country? Why was the sweeping and radical change from open voting to voting by ballot made? The Attorney General for Ireland, Mr Dowse, who was a Member of the Government of the right hon. Member for Midlothian at the time, said—

“ That it would secure the elector from land lord coercion on the one hand, and from intimidation on the other.”

It is not material now to discuss whether there was any necessity for the Act from the point of view of “ land lord coercion,” except to say that there is no such allegation made now. By what is the state of the case with respect to the prevention of intimidation? Why is it that intimidation is still largely practised, and how? I maintain that it is practised through these illiterate provisions. The object which the Government had in view when these provisions were added to the Ballot Bill was the prevention of disfranchisement by reason of illiteracy. This was unmistakably set forth by the late Mr. W. E. Forster, who said—

"All the Government wished to determine by this Amendment was that persons who could not read should not be disfranchised."

But there is no secrecy in the existing law, and the present system allows persons who are not illiterate to pretend that they are illiterate, for the purpose of intimidation. I find, with regard to the election of 1886, in Ireland, the agent of the Roman Catholic candidate for one division of the Midland Counties states that if a voter were doubtful he told him to say he was illiterate; and I have evidence of such practices elsewhere, and of a more recent date. The Daily News of December last refers to intimidation of a totally different class. I would point out that at this election at Waterford a totally different condition of affairs existed. We are aware that on that occasion the hon. Member for Waterford was a supporter of the policy of the late Mr. Parnell. On the 24th December, 1891, the Daily News, writing on the subject, says—

"At noon more than half the expected total had been polled, and at that time large crowds had collected round the majority of the polling booths, many voters being intimidated by the displays of Party feeling. The crowding round the stations of demonstrative crowds had great effect upon the illiterate voters, the result being that in this class Mr. Redmond obtained a large majority."

I speak on this question as one of broad public policy, for, as far as London is concerned, the right has been legitimately exercised in a bona fide manner by bona fide illiterates. In my own constituency at the last General Election I believe only four persons claimed to vote as illiterates. The number who voted in this class in England and Scotland was infinitesimally small. The Education Act was passed 20 years ago, and, therefore, every person under 30 ought to be able to read and write

